Desiderata of a Dragon

- When you are treated unjustly and become slandered and buried in lies, retain honesty, preserve dignity and distance, devote yourself to Gods and spirits.
- When enemies scheme against you, learn all their tricks throughout years in order to subvert them, when they destroy the other.
- When you lose your own family, wife and kids, learn paternal and maternal attitude towards the children and families of others.
- When brutes and simpletons try to vulgarize your mind and heart, retain scholarly, critical attitude, and remember the meaning of great honest forces and feelings,
- When you no longer feel fear, anxiety, arousal, and you retain composure during physical assaults and mental combat, remember about those who are still sensitive and broken, damaged and downcast,
- When you are destroyed and assaulted, and you are helpless against that, use it to train resilience, patience, and preserve a better stance in order to derive the better perspectives.
- When you meet ingratitude, contempt of the swine, leave them to their own devices, when they come back to you, treat them with reserve and patience, if they don't, you lose nothing of yourself, and let them unleash their foolishness against their old age of reflection.
- When you have spare time, put it to good use, train yourself in useful arts, sciences, and crafts, to participate in the labor of teachers, and the arts of philosophy and magic
- When you are reminded about death, put your efforts into training of splendid things worthy of Gods and make yourself worthy of being immortalized in spirit.
- When you are enslaved, always find a notion of freedom through the cracking walls of your prison, this is where your focus point is, expand it thoroughly.
- When you meet kings and emperors, treat them as you would treat a beggar that is dependent on you, on the wheel's of fortunes they are alike, the good kings and emperors took care of their people like fathers and mothers, by kingly and treat them like your mothers and fathers, just like the beggar.
- When you are disposed to great natures and deeds, let it mature first, parallel growth is required, simultaneously engage in all worthy things, fight your wars and battles of gigantomachy as the years pass by, you won't emerge unscathed, but of a noble character and wiser.
- When wretched things befall you, guide yourself at every second of their activity, if you fall to them, you will become wretched, if you don't, judge and decide what is better that will shape you and derive methods to combat the things wretched.
- When the world is upside down, and the wretched are praised in the upper society and noble are scorned everywhere, embody things you would like to see in the upper echelons of power, instead of falling prey to the ignoble rulers, that is kings-worthy.
- When strong and mature within, be soft and approachable without.
- In the end, reserved kindness always wins strangers and people, no matter how brutish and vulgar they are, amongst thieves simulate a greater thief, amongst murderers, a greater murderer, amongst cruel, be more cruel and ruthless, amongst the weak and subtle, be weaker and subtler, amongst the wise, wiser, if you may, that is a mark of great character and nature.
- There is thousand lives and adventures in one life, expand experience and coin it into a silent ethos, speak only when necessary, adapt rhetorics and persuasion to the audience, be a chameleo, but be steady in virtuous and high things, transparent and honest with a few people and Gods, the rest of society hates things that they are not by nature, hence you need to be strong to be integral, and adaptable to survive.
- If you can't combat hells, win them over with things they lack, friendship with Gods is secured by aspiring to excellent things, and keeping this honest aspiration towards the stars throughout manifold years of life.
- If you can't win a frontal war, engage in a war of subversion, while gathering silently armies of the dead, cohorts of hell, and squadrons of wings in Stars in heaven, strike only when the decisive tipping point grants you Alke, immortal armor, and the sword of Dike is on your side, otherwise bide your time.

..and all my scales worn damaged and peel off, Akkadian kings lions-headed, serpent-tongued, alike to Muśkuśśu of Marduk, shepherds for Igigi-Gods should be like kings, otherwise they are not worthy of the names of the sun-born sons of Nephilim.

Axiomathes

Every generation learns and rediscovers anew, building upon the shoulders of giants; every deification, every immortalization within the procession (Ancient Greek: pompeuien) of the Gods, is a particular and individuating process—which it must bindingly be along the paths of an essential soteriology that is not a collective delusion or a religious lie. Hence, the heroization of life within the gigantomachy, theurgic divinization, deification, or its cultivation in arete, art, science, and civilized affairs is unique each time; yet—by treading the old paths—it strives toward the alchemy of the Genius or Juno, those holy daimons, in a manner suited to the given individual.

Experience is not acquired, but lived through; pure theoretical knowledge must become experiential, as in any magical, theurgic, or psychagogic art. Every generation has its own Great Work to fulfill, and yet apophatic axioms remain nonetheless apophatic, far beyond the total reach of comprehension.

If someone out there in the world were to "know absolutely everything about the universe," they would be busy polishing, delineating, rounding out, and essentializing to perfection—that is, to fullness (akin to knowledge, beauty, science, and arete)—and even if left entirely alone, they would attempt to surpass themselves in this struggle, which is by necessity built into the cosmos. De may be granted by Heaven, but the Tao must be eternally completed within through reforms compelled by the laws of change contained in the Book of Changes, or—to paraphrase Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa: "If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change."

Concepts, ideas, and feelings coincide with the Tetraktys.

Every solution must contain an individualized and scaled beauty and arete for a person's true, un-universalized syntony with objective metaphysics. The latter, however, in that Hölderlinian tragedy, always remains out of reach, yet it is proportioned, measured by ratio, and coordinated as reference systems and approximations—as opposed to appropriation.

This is realization, as opposed to delusion, proper to human particularity, which possesses an ethos of truth within the aesthetics of both beauty and turpism. From this, we can derive and reconstruct the divine spectacle from corpses, vermin, and feces just as well as from great civilizational works, so long as one can extract Aletheia from it—non-forgetfulness, the truth that is identical to Mnemosyne, the atavistic memory of the totality of oneself.

Every act of genuine recollection is a heroic act; therefore, in the Orphic Gold Tablets, the term Eroi (Heroes) was used to describe the one who remembers, and thus knows Aletheia as a "child of mother earth and starry heaven." Such a soul dives like Dionysus-Zagreus into the world of generation, of Aphrodite-Genetrix, finding itself again and remembering itself as a demigod in Tartarus, bathed in the waters of Tantalus, like the demigod-magicians of Apollonius of Tyana's caliber, or the initiate of the Eleusinian mysteries, Heracles.

Always like psyche—the soul that clings to Eros, that titanic creation of the Gods—it is a soul in love with its stellar origin. This is sometimes reflected in the ritual-initiatory epic texts of Hellas, like the tale of Odysseus (the Wanderer), who ultimately reclaims what he lost, returning after his adventures to Penelope, or of Proserpine, who returns time and again into the embrace of her mother: Demeter Rhea Ge Meter Hestia Deio.

Cold machines and automated, rigid solutions—which are sterile without the aforementioned transcendent yet concurrently coexisting element—renounce correct perception from this insight. They renounce Sia (the hieroglyph) belonging to Heka—that is, the perception of power in all its manifestations and currents, of that which is noetic, noeric, and sympathetic—falling directly into sterility and cosmic alienation. This leads to nihilism and decay, just as the latter leads to despair, exclusion from the vortexes of the Numinosum, and internal implosion.

The phenomenal world—post-protean (where Proteus appears as the Monad of the Cosmic Egg, Phanes of the self-born Cronus encircling the Abyss), post-tritogeneic (meaning Chaldean, post-triteletarchic)—the born universe of spacetime, matter, energy, and information, is a simultaneous war of natures, particles, energies, currents, and elements within the cosmos (originally understood as order and ornament). It is conceived as tension in harmony or cacophony, governed by the yogic principle of solve (dissolve) and coagula (coagulate). All movement, purpose (teleology), and force derive from their knotting by the Tetraktys, enclosed within the philosophical, supra-Platonic decade, which constitutes the prototypization of the ideal generator.

This decade, reflected in phenomena, descends into the pentacontahexagon (according to Plutarch—the Typhonian, 56-sided polygon), which manifests in the black fires of sol niger autophaneia as the green-masked Hecate Physis. This is the underworld further divided into philosophical particles in their chthonic aspects: black fire, black water, black air, and black earth, enclosing embryonic force through Tiamatic entrapments in azotic forms—hence the Styx, Hades, the mighty abyssal cosmic winds of Acheron, and Tartarus.

Hence, too, Giordano Bruno most perfectly delineated Nyx, Orcus, and Chaos in his work Lampas Triginta Statuarum. Therefore, the world of the Starry Gods (asteriai) and the higher spheres is mirrored and retained by hyperchthonic, chthonic, and hypochthonic forces. Arreton Kai Agnoston, that is, the "virtue unconscious of itself," which is Proteus-Cronus, emerges from the Chaos of Night as a filtered force of divine procreation; it is neither distinct nor separate, yet it remains indissoluble in its transcendent, Artemisian, dyadic Third.

The intelligent operator of theology, theurgy, and philosophy will derive other worlds: worlds of the dead, of black entities, of "hells" and cemeteries of past worlds and forms that have withdrawn as rectified. In a Jüngerian sense, these are the goat and the lamb, distilled into a hybrid form as Capricorn, where they meet as power, vigor, and eudaimonistic harmony; or the lion and the eagle in the Gryphon, where self-sufficient divine pride (identical to its own nature) and all-encompassing insight and foresight (protonoia and pronoia) reunite. Hence, all bestiaries ought to be interpreted in precisely this manner.

Just as the Pythagorean Tetraktys, expounded in Iamblichus's Theology of Arithmetic, is like a "two-way mirror" for phenomena, so the destructive, violent forces of forms are a black mirror for phenomena and the Tetraktys, simultaneously stripping these forms of ousia (essence) and existence. The Eleatic principle dictates: that which has power and that which has an effect, consequently exists. That which possesses essence regardless of this constitutes proper ontology.

Every nature possesses its quality, deriving from its a priori ontological seed of the Tetraktys within phenomena and from transformations within the phenomena themselves. These are determined by the pluriuniversalist, pantheistic, polytheistic (E Pluribus Unum), and pandemonic laws of the Opera Omnia, self-emerging from between, from within, and from outside possible worlds, constrained by them, and existing in the process of realities as a post-prioric mutation, blending, and compounding of the aforementioned. Nature loves to hide.

Within the imperceptible boundary lies a perceptible infinity; the laws of Ma'at or Rta are profound, yet they contain multiplicities. Not every reality is possible, and not every imagination is essentialist or true, but every reality contains within its boundary impossibilities, and every fantasy can happen—as an illusory form—if it is imagined. In other words: imagination may be infinite, but the world is not—hence the boundary. If an army of monkeys were to type on typewriters for millions of years, one of them would eventually type the exact words I have written here, but the rest would wrestle with the mathematical archetype, producing only false trails, mimicking their true meaning with crumbs from the table of the Gods.

A parable: Operative magic is effective when the laws and perception embodied within the magician relate to a segment of objective laws in a correlated and compatible manner. Objective laws are the same everywhere, but measuring a mere fragment of them yields physical, objective reality—physics as a magnificent science, yet one dealing with the shadows of phenomena, investigating the possible and verifiable paradigms of statistical, observable, measurable laws of conservation in detectable phenomena (for instance, the behavior of matter and energy) and deriving equations and applications therefrom as a shadow of metaphysics in an essentialist philosophical sense.

Every nature can be derived from an uncompounded a priori force as an ontological idea and scatter into ontological currents of power and their frontiers. Divinities and Laws coincide with the universe—they are of it in the Whiteheadian sense as a process, emerging from it and generating it, thereby defining themselves. They are discovered by the mortal human species because they exist a priori. The foundation rests on the fact that a human being, an animal, or a plant is a category of the world and categorically reveals that world according to its capacity and ability to properly focus these forces. This occurs through the limited apparatus of the biological cocoon and polypneumatic, extrasensory interfaces of contact with these forces (in accordance with the theory of functional souls across various practical and descriptive frameworks—see the Egyptian twelve-part specialized souls, the Scandinavian tripartite souls, and the Greco-Roman quadripartite souls).

Ideas as forces reveal themselves in concepts through bios-zoon (the animal part), reason, and intellect (reflected concepts) within the realm of intelligibility. Swedenborg's idea of "affection"—the relationship of concept to feeling—is to intelligibility what sympathy (sympatheia) is to likeness or, in Chaldean terms, what Apollo (Intellect) is to Hecate (Anima Mundi).

An example: Fusion, magnetism, and diffraction (for instance, through lenses) in relation to the Diotimic proposition of the relationship Eros : Philia : Agape.

The entire catalog of forces can be named in this manner because human language is a category of the world. By reconstructing, one can arrive at meta-identity and ideation—for instance, at the power of growth in plants, "common-sense" growing and flourishing, the Husserlian Ding-an-Sich within the phenomenon, and the "capacity for growth" in reality conceived as a process (in the view of A. Whitehead).

Spirits of the Stars

"Witless are you mortals and dull to foresee your lot, whether of good or evil, that comes upon you. For now in your heedlessness you have wrought folly past healing; for — be witness the oath of the gods, the relentless water of Styx" — [260] Hymn II to Demeter

"If you have suffered for your weakness, do not blame the Gods! You yourselves allowed these men to grow great by giving them power, and therefore you have fallen into shameful servitude!" – Solon, frg. 8, Diog. L. I, 51 ff in Jaeger Werner. 1986. Paideia: The Ideals of Greek Culture. Volume I: Archaic Greece – The Mind of Athens. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, p. 143.

Before she left, she ordered me to write under triple, unnamed stars, so I write, she ordered me to wage war, so I wage war, she ordered me to destroy, so I destroy, destroy, without remorse: ruthlessly destroy, more cruel, disciplined, stern with each day and night.

Sacrificial altar of things left behind that do not ensnare me anymore, I came to terms and found peace a long time ago, what I cannot let go however, is the black melancholy, it is the memories of the most beautiful face in the world, an image that I chase relentlessly, that is by and by substituted with illusions, that I never trust, because I know the essence of this face, because it is out of my reach forever.

I wanted her to excel me in everything and understand the universe in a surpassing manner, she desired that on Earth; her spirit in the stars is perfected, all worldly things left behind, as she is united with the great stars above in utter synthony, and in this she is perfect, it is this vision of perfection of her that I seek, and can no longer find.

The mystery of her face is that of understanding sadness, that I cannot interpret – whether it meant that we shall never meet again, that the transience of the world is ultimately a horrendous revelation, or that she understood what we were and what we lost on Earth? As her carnal image and mind are left to lies, forgetfulness, madness, deceit, away from our tormented great gesture that we committed to once and will never commit anymore.

When her golden silver-threaded wings attempted to console me, I ordered her to leave and hid in shame, I didn't want her to wait, and banished her, she returned back home to the Mother of the Stars, to her mother, as I wanted her to, and I find her mysteries unveiled everywhere, wherever I remember and commemorate her, whenever I celebrate her sacraments laid upon my intellect and dead tall shadow that over-arches my body and this world like a giant.

Perhaps these are the giants I've once seen, covering the stars with their mighty arms, they point down to their misery, effectively, attempting to prevent another catastrophy of destinies to unfold. Hamartia, that fatal flaw in great natures and gargantuan lives, monstrously strong and deliberately beautiful may often turn unexpected taint, the Gorgons, when they may not find an Achilles' heel, will besiege Eros, until its citadel's gate is torn down, and love withering away destroying the lovers.

Non omnis moriar, Pyrrhic victory is to set just one spirit free from the chains and charms of this world, no matter what is the cost. The same longing I felt for the stars, years ago, stripped to bare cold winter, staring at celestial vaults in dreadful awe, I feel for her departure into the stars each winter, as I celebrate our meetings and partings, into forever.

Introduction

This collection of notes attempts to pick up some of the long forgotten ancient threads. Although modern advances in physics, medicine, and other rigorous sciences are praised, the point is not to marry these sciences to the ancient view, but to illuminate a different perspective in which, above all, beauty and ethos are preserved without contradiction. The main argument is that the world is indivisible and that the animate worlds are ontologically parallel to the worlds we normally perceive with our senses, that various anomalies, entities, structural dimensions can affect the functioning of the human and animal body and mental constitution because of their parallelism, simultaneity, coarization, co-dependence, essentializing them beyond the shadow of empirical convenience. It is not a matter of relegating everything to a "demon-haunted world", but of having an open mind to consider a holistic polimodel approach.

At first glance, it seems like a jumble and a chaotic network of eerily interdependent variables, merely a figment of the imagination captured, extracted, and disconnected from the whole, like a strange cacophony of ideas, words, and sounds. The further we progress, the greater the insight into a coherent universe of thought, the greater the means that leads to an excellent penetration of the divine ritual. We know that if we present it in fragments, it will only cause displeasure. If we present it in a longer form, people will yawn and move on to something more attractive, or they will pick up on our mistakes and passionate subjectivities and let the whole work disintegrate into nonsense or unexamined personal gnoses.

Forgetfulness is the enemy, there are weapons of mass distraction that lead us away from the great quest, but in a balance between an engaged, affirmed life and a psychagogic journey, a step too far into the latter risks a derealized ignorance of life and its laws, a step too far into the former thrusts us deeper into the den of opium-like attachments that ensnare our hard-won vision and replace it with the mistaken perception that there is nothing to search for there, that we have already found what there was to find.

Mastery is a key that opens all those doors to understanding that are only told in this or another form, it must be so or it would not be communicated. It is best read by those who wear their own key to the mysteries on their belt and have the lamp of an illuminator before them. Mastery can be defined as the discovery of a patterned, ordered whole in conjunction with the attempt to integrate that cosmos into one's ethos, nature, intellect, soul, feeling, behaviour, performance and action.

We, the mercurial humans, are changing. Only the most mature individuals climb to the high level of virtue, ethos, siddhi and stay there, but even for these tough, sturdy minds it is a gigantomachy. The rest of us vary in degrees of oscillation, bifurcation, complex, often irrational, unreflective behaviours.

Sometimes we are profound, sometimes we are just begrudging jerks. Sometimes we are benevolent, sometimes bitterly spiteful. Sometimes sophisticated and sublime, sometimes vulgar and hateful.

We show so many faces and masks in how we relate to others, how we manage and govern them, and likewise — they are not all the same to us when we look in the mirror. What is emphasised in our nature, perceived by the other, generalised, induced, inferred, is a field of impressions, perceptions, manipulations, illusions, persuasion.

Once a modest gentleman can be seen as a nosferate, dry wretch, while a cunning alcoholic thief appears as a poor man in need. This is not just a matter of psychology, there are occult dimensions to enticing and repulsive sensations.

So many souls and spirits that express their essence through our own characteristics are told by their tormented or beautiful voice when we look through the glasses of our own lives. Many inhuman, distant forces are struggling to tear to pieces what we have built — our bodies, our minds, our souls as the Great Temples. Many support our efforts, lift us out of despair and form in our hearts, minds and souls a nobler image of man, a possible image, depending on our abilities, daimon, potential. Perhaps it is the closeness to man that makes him recognisable, the distance is frightening or powerful in radiant awe. The laws of difference, otherness and movement do not tolerate silence, excellence that could contradict it and misery that lasts.

What is transient is changeable. People who empower themselves take control of this mutability to shape it, forming their minds and bodies into eukrasia, to quote Galen of Pergamum (129–?199/216 AD.), a physician at the court of Marcus Aurelius: The creation of eukrasia, by whatever means, is a prerequisite for the excellence of the soul, and the functioning of the soul depends on the krasia of the body as a whole; likewise, diseases of the soul can force the mind and body into disruption; a soul destroyed by severe trauma or separated from the body can carry away the mind, deprive of the spirit, memory and intellect, leaving the body and mind shattered and defenceless against aethyrian attacks and the detritus of astral 'fauna and flora'. The laws of change are mastered only when we can bring our nature, temperament, soul, emotions, instincts, drives, mind and senses into a self-restrained, well-tempered and self-controlled equilibrium based on ethical and moral self-cultivation, codes conducive to the perfection of training.

There is not a single refined system of thought that would speak for itself if interpreted by base, bigoted, vulgar and condescending ignoramuses and turned into their own copy of a disaster that gives the whole act of idea generation a bad name. Paradigmatic philosophies and superstructures of ideas harbour many good people and many scoundrels, but historically it is the sum effect that testifies to the system of ideas under which minds have flourished or degenerated. When they strengthen our ethos and our inner natural structure, when they consolidate our inner truth and lead us to wholesome effects, they serve as points of reference in times of chaos, disorder, confusion, suffering and pain. In such times, they should consolidate and sublimate the good in us and discard, change or heal impurities in our nature, character and mind.

The insightful can see through our own faults because they know what else they have found. They know what can be harvested from someone else's field because they have tilled their own. They observe our travails with a compassionate and non-judgmental eye, just as we acquired our acumen from our masters, who incarnated and inspired us with a silent idea, a gestureless movement, and a wordless, thoughtful determination — they never criticised us, but supported us in our ascent and averted our falls.

May I be my own interpreter in this task, for I cannot bear witness in words to what I have projected after inspiration. There is never a revelation, but at best a hypophetic interpretation, according to one's abilities, according to the closeness to the core of the silent utterance and the song of its soul.

A short creed produces ignorance and leaves much room to read anything into it; a great theological tome is rarely readable and kills mediocrity by making one's projection too conceptual. The philosopher's stone has a double meaning: It is a heart acquired in the abyss, conducive to the posthumous ascent of the spirit as the third great stage of the hermetic ars vivendi et moriendi, it is an intellectual and sensitive spirit that reads the pages of the sacred and occult arts with great understanding for its benefit and enlightenment. Be the one who discards the debris and accepts the wise, assisted by the intelligencers of the spheres, the stars, the manifold worlds and the genii, who render their service and assistance to the young aspirants in the chain of the divine procession.

It is the immortality of Aletheia, the presence of memory, of recollection, of reminiscence. Finally, it is not a question of religion, but of proposing a practical tool for psychagogy and successful pneumatism, a God-creating epiphany, an apocalyptic epithomization and heroization, the attainment of mastery, of method and means, of daring, of action, of silence, to be crowned with a caducean staff, wielding a Hercules club and holding on to the Ankh, Wat and Whip with a hawk-winged soul that carries the breath of the stars between its sacred, silent words.

Everything is more human than anything else, at least in the human worlds. The worst thing for any being, including man, is to lose something of its essence and identity, torn apart from its conscious genius. The loss of wisdom for the wise. The loss of strength for the strong. The loss of innocence for the innocent. Loss of stoutness for the stout, loss of self-control for the balanced. Loss of intelligence for the intelligent, loss of eloquence for the eloquent. When virtue becomes dull and turns into backsliding and rottenness. When the wise becomes a pathetic fool, when a strong person becomes as weak as a meek bundle of nerves. When the innocent is robbed of all sentiment and becomes a chaotic depravity. When the self-controlled becomes a kin to hatred and anger. When the intelligent becomes a fool; when the eloquent becomes a stammerer. When everything is taken from you, the last treasures you can hold on to are your nature, your dignity, and your freedom. If you lose your freedom, you preserve your dignity; if you lose your dignity, you preserve your nature. If you lose your nature, you are in dissolution. It can be taken by malice, when envy arises, or by old age and illness. Yet, all that you encounter is your life, what is given to tantric transmutation is heroic. Spasmed in wrath, an affliction that is common among Vajra families, when I still in discipline, it develops into diamond-like clarity, when transmuted it becomes fierce compassion and bright kindness.

People who have never bled into their works will never perceive the war that led to superior positions. They see only the effect, never the effort. They despise the great man, the great woman, because in their fanatical zeal for significance and equality, they cannot comprehend their steps. They want instant gratification.

What is difficult or reproachable to their mind and character is their enemy. Amusingly, they applaud personalities that emancipate the desires and sexual urges of their stomachs and gestative passions. Embody the desires of others, create them, let them need illusions that you serve, do not let them master themselves! Their lot admires people who sell them dreams of becoming a bigger participant in an ugly feast than they already are representing. Ultimately, it's not about recognition, because work does not need praise as long as it's done and accomplished. Outstanding achievements find their own way into the world. The forgotten are usually poorly managed or have goals too high for others to achieve. But the lower the goal in society and the higher the goals, the greater the tragedy of the visionary. It would be beneficial if fools did not spread their stupidity to destroy the lives of others without gaining anything. Stupidity is worse than theft. The latter gain something, the former recklessly harm without a second thought. Do not find me praising thieves, they torn my life away from me and offered it back at a higher price! Denying the offer of Earthly worms, I bargained for a greater justice from my Gods which I received in complete elevation of my daimon among the stars! My secret name and my spirit are present in the book of destinies, my duty is to help you to receive from the treasuries of Gods, likewise!

In all my explanatory notes, dissecting the rich discoveries of the mind and souls with my scalpel, alike to an anatomist of an angel, I discovered a truth that will run through this work: The beauty of an autumn leaf floating in the air just before it falls on the grave of a loved one is the tyranny of the moment. It is the rare, radiant moment of victorious glory, of great and noble love — it is the unreproducible moment of pure life, the honesty of the thunderous word that resounds through all worlds, that lies between the divine idea, the human one, and its decaying shadow. It is the tyranny that beauty was only once and then turns into fleeting memories that fade and die away, giving way to the duties, obligations and oaths that weigh us down with their heaviness. The rest is just a pastime before the final encounter with the gods.

Time only shows us how indestructible our nature is, quoting a witch from the shadows: "Do not point your finger at me, you bastard!". Without understanding all the twists and turns of fate, hold back on judgments, because you never know how many wars a noble man has fought before becoming a penniless wretch.

Nature or nurture? Nature is the ethos and the genius, it is innate, a relative of the daimon and the spirit, it takes precedence over circumstances, a good upbringing, socialization fixes a bad or mediocre nature, strengthens the good, a bad upbringing, socialization makes a bad nature worse, and a bad upbringing, socialization makes a good nature troublesome!

Let us not pretend that we are born equal and that our efforts and pursuit of excellence make us equal to everyone else. The difference lies in meritocratic hierarchies and a broad embrace of all, ideally arising from these differences and variations in human affairs, or in unjust profiteering, the alienation of all against all, in whatever political arrangement plays out on the stages of the ages.

From an order arises a world of war, a war of differences on the cosmic stage within the laws, a war of forces and powers in rapid interaction, harmony, chaos and discord, everything is conflict, movement — peace rarely found! Do not stand still! Never stand still! You will be drawn into its laws.

Only the wise find refuge in supreme peace, there are people who are drawn in and thrown wherever their inclination goes, the simple-minded, the superficial, the weak, the meek! There are heroes who dance in conflicts and move restlessly and to the extreme of determination! Take your sword and cut the Gordian knot with a single blade cut! Or at least climb the steps of the Ziggurat! Even if you are thrown down, at least you have taken a step! The joys of life are few for the brave, the pigs rejoice in pleasure, the masochists in pain! Clench your fists and grit your teeth, Saturn's harvest is waiting, there's time to reap and there's time to sow.

I publish these writings at the beginning of my third Saturn cycle as a gift for having survived fourteen years of my uninterrupted alchemical work. Sealed, for better or worse, written in my mortal shell. I would not place myself under this life, but we cannot return to the past. Adyton Kronion. Dei Sol Invictus. Pater Noster Sataurnos. Hieros Cosmos.

All that remained unwritten was not to be written down, a Socratic irony: what was not to be written down was written down in a most vulgar manner, all that remained unsaid remains a secret of the Way to the Divine. This volume is merely a token of appreciation for the Way, it is not the Way itself. This work was born from struggle and war, from the blood of my toil. It is therefore an individual narrative of an attitude that will not be repeated. To each his destiny, as it leads to the greatest joys or the greatest remorse!

Council for young Lions, Lionesses

Open up! I proclaim the dance-crazed madness of the storm catalyst, which I once was! Oh, the unhuman prism of tainted art, Shakti dancing with all her might! Long were the days when, as reapers, I shaped the writhing mass of chaos, what I tore from it, had necessarily to find its way in the order of the Gods. Building bridges through stars, worlds, chthonic, celestial, telluric, igneous, terrestrial, aerial that I invoked, casting into the world as great ideas of great magnificence contained not in words, but in infinite gestures inexpressible!

Now working writer, artist, philosopher, stop! The gesture of Rimbaud's relaxation, the obsession of madness sinking into the will of grandiose dissociation, do you wish to risk greater danger, do you wish to vomit your fixation, your limit, regulation, to let go of order! You will suffer thrice, aware of your madness, until you cleanse yourself of accusations against yourself, your wild need for safety! Coward! The heavy regret of Saturnian lead is nothing compared to the bitterness of the slave emperor, the beggar emperor, who, caught on the strings of the imperative of responsibility, moves like a blind man through a forest of tricks, delusions, where “as if”, is “must”, and “even if not”.

Do not fall! Do not dare! You will be like the darkness of obfuscation, great disorientation, fury, or gentle babble of nonsense, closed in your misery, broken desire to be free from the world, from its primary seriousness! I! I deserve contempt, not charging in youth, dissipating it on clandestine spectacles of dance with madness, oh if I were wiser, overcoming everything, restrained, balanced! There is no guilt in me, only sorrow! Yet, yet! Rise with victory, master, mistress, commander of the authentic star that is born from you, if such is your wish.

Initiates of Eleusis, those who have passed as mad gods and goddesses, or reconciled themselves to the demarcation of order torn from chaos, their epiphanies victorious, their gaze wide, their intellects hungrily greedy, hearts! Stop, have you experienced the storm of voracious locusts? You need order, child! Order! Order! It is deadly when it does not undergo reform! It multiplies corruption, invites chaos to attack tearing apart order, so you need Vision, you crave Vision, otherwise you are lost to disdain, the shadows of the dead sing “if we knew, if we could” whispering in their melancholy!

Affirm life at every step, this is the only moment to give birth to a star, bypass the resentful image of received suffering, pain! You have suffered, you will suffer again, until you overcome by method, until you grit your teeth, tearing flesh, crushing bones, sucking marrow, appearing in the image of your epiphany victoriously! Otherwise — perish in pain, suffering, you cast a curse on yourself! Armies of the meek, slaves already shout angrily like sheep, when they are led to the slaughterhouse of Thanatos! You must take the risk, if you want to shape order, to command, to conquer! Where others have fallen, there you tame the world!

Let your thoughts and ideas be flighty, stellar, spreading prolifically through all worlds in a charge, be first in rank, great in understanding, terrible in insight, wise as a dragon spreading its wings through worlds! Let the oceans of the depths, the cosmic spaces of Poseidon be shamed by the abyss of your mind, the substance of stars, glorified, child of time, you rise as a disciplined master who divides fortunes, and forces through streams of worlds, directing them in a perfectly mastered madness of the world, its manifold fertility!

Do you stop for yourself? You have already lost your head, Akephalos! What are you trying to stop? The feeble movements of your monkey mind? The rigor of capturing moments, the melancholy of passing time? Your mind has been conquered thrice, is preserved like a prism, your heart thrice immortalized in gold, is the light of the prism! Cartographies! You wish to draw a new map of matters that others have not dreamed of, take your tools, visualizing the abysses and transcendent worlds!

In this house dwell your forces, the secret of understanding is the power of cosmic justice, the secret of the scepter, son, daughter of Heaven is the continual charge, the fought-for position of higher attributes that resound through the world — there you will gain audience with worlds, because those who are one with the world, are commanders of vital divine expression! Let your enemies sink into the earth, biting with slavish envy, shamed by your conquests, intimidated by your greatness, diminishing everything they never conquered, never experienced, their natures like grubs! The word "enemy" is the word of a stranger, powerless in the mirror of their deceptions!

Do the heavens receive impressions? They stand undefeated, it is you who are impressed by them! Yet give great impressions like the Gods, shine more flamingly, you will be one with them, acting like a royal cobra, like a lion, like a condor! No one will stand in opposition to those who are allied with the highest, greatest forces of the world. The heavens support them, the hells elevate them, the abyss looks through them, the transcendent world shines through them in glory!

Do you seek this in your studies? In your act? Be damned, you seeker who rises with the life of Heaven, it is natural, they will block your path of conquest! If you are powerless in the flash of the storm of greatness, how do you want to be an imitator? Until you understand, embrace the cosmic force, the divinity of the world, being one with it, cosmic swindler, you will follow the projections of a small history, pathetic repetitions. Break free from the chain, the yoke of history! Stand among the ancients, with a huge gaze look at all the events of the world, examine them, free yourself from the present!

Do you want to be like the Gods? Be like the Gods! Not like pigs, who think they are Gods. Gods to Gods! Do you want to bring this to the earth, Tybil of the tree of life? You already know! You read the world as a philosopher-alchemist, emperor-mage! To get dirty in details does not befit, an obstacle to intuition is the restraint of greatness, let forces lead you, your mind, the fabric of the world is one, the rest is structure, content, spirits, muses, ghosts of time!

If you do not know what you want to do, do not dare to start, you will lead others to ruin! If your motives are unclear, deluded, hold back! You will be the ruin of others, and yourself! If you are certain, transparent to the heavens, crystalline in intentions, do not stop until you conquer! The world is only a net in which you let yourself be caught, to pull it behind you, until you tear apart illusions, there you will stand free! Such was the secret of the heavenly daughters and sons, he who understood this, is a man of the way!

— Yours, young lions, lionesses — an old, tired spirit.

Philosopher-Magician

> For the versatile mind, for the ingenious magician, everything is an inspiration.
> — Saturnin.

The majority of misunderstandings of ancient philosophy do not stem from its infantilism, but from the infantilism of contemporary minds, which sooner fundamentally, without insight, treat the most beautiful philosophies, rather than delve into the mind of ancient genius. They play with them like dry toys, discarding them when bored, or treating them as a passionless academic discipline. However, sometimes — someone sees through the brilliant mind of the past, the genius breadth of mind, deep understanding of thought, not discarded as "too simple or primitive." Indeed, understanding something is tantamount to insightfulness; if we understand nothing, or fundamentally look only at the surface of an issue, it only indicates our laziness, lack of interest, or ignorance — but never understanding.

I would like to start this chapter with an analogy of Nicolas of Cusa, who brilliantly developed the theory of monadic growth, the Pythagorean Tetractys, as a growth of endless mathematical patterns that arise from unity, contained within it. Combining this with the idea of the Nolan, Giordano Bruno, we come close to the philosophy of contemporary mathematics — i.e., the science of relations occurring between patterns: on one hand, we have endless mathematical libraries, on the other eternal change, reciprocity of reference, immensity. Movement is essentially defined by change.

Bruno wrote in 'De Immenso' that the individual is never finite, seeking forms, the infinity of everything calls forth ever newer forms as potential, possibility, reception, variability, matter. This brilliant thought applies to the language of mathematics, as well as to physics, natural philosophy, metaphysics, and magic. It has serious implications in the alchemy of the cosmos, subject to continuous rectification, updating of forms, not only through biological evolution but also through spiritual sublimation, arising multitudes of non-corporeal forces, in various natures, functions, sizes, inclinations, with many masks and identities, yet delimited by the deep laws of the world, and also the limit of forms, a priori in the topography of entropy of organization built into these laws. Thus from the One and sameness to the chaos of manifold forces which in a radical point are violent forms, at the zero point total potential for dressing in the Monad point, from creative forces, to receptive forms, through gradation, emanation, harmony, and disharmony defined by initiation, stabilization, regeneration, decay, destruction, cycles of time, differentiated levels of transcendent, generative, metamorphic, and cosmic forces.

Here comes the concept of "Minima," which in Giordano Bruno's view is a grouped diverse multitude, which is in eternal motion, in constant metamorphoses, yet always with an inclination to return to its nature, place, according to its laws and deeper laws. This was to be the cosmic metabolism, so death is only a transient value, as a change in the aspect of substance. Nicolas of Cusa saw salvation, or as I prefer to reason — liberation after a crowned, heroic life as a line of union between opposites; the Nolan wrote similarly: "He who would know the greatest secrets of nature should contemplate the maxima and minima of opposing bodies. For the great magisterium [magic] should crown the work by discovering opposites, after they have found a point of unification"[1]. Just as the senses, which stimulate the mind, the mind reflects the idea, and everything is integral in discovering metaphysical laws, seeking magic, practicing it, in accordance with the analogy of laws, which are identical with truth, for where to seek truth, if not from the necessity of natures that point to themselves, following according to their identity? The Chinese concept of nature is similar to the definition of truth, "zi ran" can be translated as "so from itself" or "so from its own consent". This suggests the spontaneity of truth as sameness, instead of pointing to its objectivity.[2]

Due to the complexity of systems of worlds and their laws, it can be safely assumed that the results of magic are not certain, but only potential, not objective, but only inter-relational, i.e. In a specific internally coherent system, they may work in interaction with others. One must be honest; we cannot prove the effects of magic by scientific method, only subjectively or inter-subjectively affirm them, most magical phenomena are not solvable by a linear mind, and those that are, rarely stabilize.

It is a delicate art, which requires seriousness, similar to the work of a watchmaker, but also a trickster who creates porcelain, filigree figurines, yet can encompass both subtlety and storms in them. It is a dangerous art, as by mixing with invisible worlds, we also expose our minds to many dangerous reactions, quoting Confucius: "Keep the spiritual worlds and Gods at a distance, but above all respect them". It is a treacherous art, full of possible delusions, poorly invested beliefs, insincere approach to the world, setting traps for the unprepared mind. It is an art that requires precise recognition in the territory of its action, is a certain step of faith of the blind, and to the blind we can compare ourselves — yet we step confidently on the ground, knowing where we are going, and also understand with some skill, how to avoid major obstacles. Here, not only the Horus step of faith of the initiate — Parsifal is required, but also commitment, motivation sustaining work and outstanding memory, which preserves trophies, as well as operational knowledge of actions and magical technologies.

We can extract some general laws of magic operation, but these are dynamic laws, with a large number of variables, and also various laws interacting, they can cancel each other out, accumulate, enter complementarity, or compatible action. Therefore, the ability to dynamically improvise is important, to keep pace with changing rules of the game, to play strategically where they are permanent.

A skilled magician is a person who approaches their own actions apophatically, with reason, a certain dose of skepticism, but positively affirmatively, not resting on laurels, when — the effect of their work is visible. A magician who wants to deal with high magic is patient, seeing the effects of his actions after weeks, months, years, the immediate ones are not impressive, from uncertain sources of personal magic, and often binding to unknown quarters.

This is a person who has an infinite arsenal of "I can," but knows that they operate within the system of limitations of the world of phenomena, also knows that one acts regardless of whether something leads to results or not, but without stubbornly plodding into error. Experiments until training themselves in skillful operation of techniques that have proven effective. Finally and above all, it is a person with a vision, who wants to implement their ideas, and also rise above the world acting with higher worlds. The philosopher-magician is in the world, but beyond it, is an architect, but does not submit to their idea, exhibits the greater will of the world, but retains individuation, which is the source of his genius, and also the essence of his inclinations and nature, this he discovers among countless others.

Magical philosophy is not a recreational toy of the illusionist, nor of a person who wants to enrich themselves, gain objects, find love, or power, or fame, these latter matters belong to the earthly sphere, they may be dependent on life's fortunes, meritocratic work ethics, but do not prostitute high magic for them.

The point of understanding is to discover what actions actually lead to results. The field of ritual, energetic, theurgic, ceremonial actions is limited only by imagination, but the effect is always delimited by what has been determined as pointless, or ineffective, sometimes it may be only temporary — skills that do not come from us, but act by the power of Gods, demi-gods, angels, daimons, the dead, or chthonic worlds are not ours, they are borrowed. Of course, the hierarchical classification of beings is conventional, but this is not the time to write bestiaries of the richness of these worlds!

Some people may often wander in the desert all their lives, so often magic is also relegated to the phantasms of human imagination, after which all attempts at further training are nipped in the bud. Similarly with people who will be terrified of their adventures, light dabbling in magical arts, without commitment, without sacrifices, without understanding. How good it is! This eliminates discouraged, bored, intimidated, uninvolved people, as well as stubborn idiots. The first will return to their usual life, finding happiness in it to their measure, the second will find pleasures in their pleasures, the third will seek the solution to their fears in religions, which will compensate their helplessness, fear, and the next will engage in something closer to their calling. The latter will not pose a threat to themselves and others, and will not give a bad name to occult practices. An unsuccessful amateur who considers themselves a magician usually remains a fool, or enters the ranks of religious bigots, or leaves metaphysics and magic behind, boasting that they "already know," that they "have already been enlightened," looking down on people of the way, though they never even approached the mysteries. Mastery is not achieved in a lifetime, mastery is strived for through life — when this path is filled with commitment, seriousness, sacrifice, passion, joy, it is the most beautiful, worthy activity that brings us closer to the stars, and also makes us true humans.

If the field of magic's action is consciousness, phenomena are its substance, but this is not a consciousness reduced to agency in one's own mind, but rather to the interaction with invisible worlds, and also with the minds, wills, hearts, and souls of other people and beings, whether collectively or individually.

The priest-magician is a shepherd-king in the Chaldean understanding, setting new directions, traditions, establishing values, reforming the logos, moving mountains in silence in a way imperceptible to others, and with the consent of the world's forces, is their trustee. He is simultaneously a fortress that prevents chaotic worlds from entering the world, a catalyst and negotiator of regulating forces, of intervening forces.

Magic is the wise art of discerning effects produced in the world amidst causality in a way that extracts the actual patterns of the magical process, rejecting cognitive errors, delusions, blinding tricks, obscurities concerning both the world and oneself – and the latter most easily, because we deceive ourselves most effectively.

Magical rationalism (sic!) is essentially a clear, precise, accurate, strategic, tactical perception of the world, its causality, and also engaging in weaving one's own causal networks, observing oneself, the world in a neutrally engaged manner, i.e., not subject to perceptual disturbances, perfectly excluded from the sea of phenomena, ideally detached from one's stream of mental processes, while perfectly engaged in one's work, mastering perception, and also cognitive-emotional processes.

Encountering a plethora of esoteric writings, visions of individuals, grimoires, I have learned one thing – they are useful insofar as you overgrow the vision contained therein, if they are read like compendia of experience. Otherwise, you make yourself into a victim of someone else's vision. Become a visionary yourself, charting new wayward signs in territories unknown. Intuitionists oft say that the value of experience is greater than that of theory and knowledge. Yet, these who surpass them in experience and are equipped with robust theory and knowledge are ardent students of the universe, not some boorish dilettantes.

The value of critical conjoining of multiple fields of science and arts in order to give them an ever-fresh look is the juvenile gladness of exploration and synthesis of information and ideas in the laboratory of imagination and notion intersecting with great laws of the world, the Glass Bead Game of infinite libraries of understanding, play, appliance and inventiveness, they provide unexpected results and bring about the intellectual pleasures of voyaging into terra incognita in a world in which "everything was discovered, thought already, everything invented" – that sentence is blatantly incorrect, it is held as valid only by the defeatists.

In the process of the discovery of magic, of the Divinities, I found that there are several components that are required: gathering life experience to draw from, a spacious, large, solid and vivid mind and great nature, a great imagination, a studious inclination, a will to experiment, order and discipline that sets co-ordinates aright, a principled ethos and wayward direction, resilience to damage and danger, discernment and strength, focus and concentration, daring to create new theories and test them, an intelligence to sieve the realization from delusion, a piercing insight into causalities, a heroic stance in opposition, an invincible spirit, a focused will, a golden mean, an inner truth, a perseverant unshakable character (not to be confused with foolish stubborness!), a strong guiding daimon, a durable commitment to fortunes, a love of the strange, awe and terror, clinging to beauty and virtue, fates and destinies, and a reverence for the the universe and its teachings. A grand will to return to the beautiful, the strong, the just, the great, the noble, the free, the victorious, no matter what ordeals of life we must surpass and traverse.

This is a mere enumeration, but where to get these qualities from, you ask? They are coined along life, through confrontation, traumas, wounds and scars, decisions and judgments, reaction to fortunes and fates, affirmations of despair and eudaimonia, losses and gains, weighing and setting aspirations, once and for all ask yourself a question – who would you like to be in five, ten, twenty years time, who do you want to be posthumously? It is a question about your essence, your daimon, your ethos and character, your nature and qualities, your attributes, for what constitutes a man, a woman, is this single sentence: "Omnia mea mecum porto", everything I have, I carry with me. "Memento mori" – Marcus Aurelius, "Invictii Genii" – I might add, the spirit that you coin of yourself may be victorious, but what you make in the battles and wars of life is yours forever.

A goal set must be pursued recklessly, you can't imagine to succeed if you don't embark on the Pythagorean journey. If the bowl is empty, you can't draw clay from it, in other words, if your life is empty, dispossessed, underprivileged, you must find the clay, if you find the clay, you must shape it.

The first move to find the clay is the enchantment with the world, to find the little gods of life, perspective changes everything – when you walk through a park, you may see nothing but the tip of your very nose, when you look at people, you are observant, but when all of a sudden you observe a leaf of a tree and think about the greatness of nature, about harmonies, intervals, sounds it conjures, about the sylphen spirits wondering amongst it, when you take the dew and draw warpaint across your face, the ancient thoughts of the forest superseding the thoughts of men, the continuity of the cycles, sequences, the impermanence, the well of the abysmal past immemorial, the moon, planets and stars above observed by so many ancient civilizations. At this point you re-divinize your gaze, you acquire truly "Edenic perception".

When we think "Edin", an old-Arabic world for long, dry plain, pasture land, we may think of Ubar of the King Shadad, buried under the deserts of Rub Al'Khali, it is hidden from view, occulted, just like our perception of the world. When we recognize this, we may shed the veils of Isis, at first delicately, giving us a cognitive glimpse, some of us are rewarded by the great Goddesses, that makes us see among the blind-men, we find Divinities everywhere, not as imagination, but a truthful spectacle of muse-like inspired beauty. Some posited that nature and matter is the source of all evils of the world, in contradistinction to an en-souled life, I prefer to treat it as a gift of Aphrodite Urania Generatrix, or tripartite Hekate-Drakaina Epipurgidia: The Divine fire, the Cosmic Aethyr, the Abysmal Voids.

Ah, so you've been assaulted by all hells combined? Bite through the rotten flesh, cold, scorching heat, turmoil of winds, bare survival, and barren deserts, thirst, hunger, slay if you must, be slayed if you can't defend yourself, grind your teeth and feel the pain, overcome suffering, emerge triumphant, there were people that died frozen in the Antarctic or Himalayas, those who were slayed in wars, tortured and mutilated, murdered by bestial men, raped, those who died of parasites, lepers, illnesses, committing suicides in great torment, insane out of pain and sorrow; there are so many ways to die, get yourself killed, in great or small pain, with or without dignity, violated in body, soul and mind, so many ways to suffer in torment, to be deprived of humaneness, good name, honor, vendettas of humans against humaneness are great.

Gods don't contradict nature, nor add more meaning to all this. It is the anthropocentric view that made this infantile complex to scream: "Injust, injust, save me, oh you mother, oh you father, who nurtured me!". It is the self-importance of humankind that attaches the idea that "Retribution is nigh, there is justice, some justice, any justice!". Laws of nature don't contradict laws of Gods, yet they are different, laws of humans oft contradict both laws of nature and of Gods. Yet, by oath under heavens, I may swear that by heroic memory of those who made something of themselves in this world despite all of that, those who out of their titanic commitment pitched to the Divinities, to nature, to the world are recognized as heroi – no matter what was their status, wealth, "material" fortunes, an imperial beggar is an emperor among humans in perception of Gods, an emperor that is a wretch is nothing more than a wretch among humans to Gods.

Metabolism of Concepts

Navigating through the dynamics of spinning any content, it's hard not to catch the deeper structures that scaffold and skeletonize them. In interpreting content, a conscious recipient can engage in deconstructing the author's intentions, and the author, if aware of their actions, engages in the metarhetoric of shaping this content. This is where the flirtation in narration lies, as in subtle erotica, there are plenty of unsaid things.

The starting point is motivation, clothed in a media form, which in this way manages the narrative to deepen and further specify the fabric of intentions.

This means as much as moving in an ideational world, which is reduced to a medium of transmission, to psychagogically direct the mind, emotions, and soul of the content user towards a closed, intended goal, which not only conveys the content itself but movements beyond the text, touching the engaged reader with a brush of wings. If metarhetoric moves something in an individualized reception in a set way, the success of the text is measurable. I once used this kind of thinking to consider five concepts, at the definitional, deep, and metabolic levels in idea transactions. These are just examples: Thus, knowledge was interpreted as information saturated with data organized into structural libraries, at the meta-level as information contained in every form of energy metamorphosis. Thus, experience was interpreted as subjective critical masses that allowed for the absorption of practical knowledge, and at the meta-level means the sum of codified experiences, or agency information in a certain system. Thus, perception I interpreted as the way experience is lensed through the mind, and at a deep level as pattern shifts relative to each other in a certain modal reference system. Thus, thought I defined as the construction of patterns and constellations of structures in patterns, and at a deep level as differences between states of experience, perception, and knowledge. Thus, memory I defined as a storehouse of states of experiences in relation to states of perception, and at the meta-level as an archive of all potential states. Imagination, on the other hand, I understand as the ability to manipulate libraries beyond their fixed limitations, at the meta-level it is the freedom to change, modify data, and also its possible states in the network from one ambivalence to another in constant metamorphoses. The last element in this model is aesthetics, which I understand as the ability to shape, sense significant data systems in subjectively pleasant patterns, at the meta-level these are moments of change between super-symmetry and chaos which are entropically corresponding to the actual dynamics of a given system. To add another level, beauty can be defined as the aspect of the total expression of the highest worlds' principle in the delight of the immanentization of the most perfect, objective exponents of the deep laws of the world in its continuous manifestation.

This model is instrumental, like a toy trying to illustrate an exemplary geometry of thought and its codification, but the construction of the structure of the metabolism of ideas in the user is a useful tool to deconstruct the ready form of transmission in a conscious way. Bearing in mind that the act of deconstruction is limited by the psychic settings of the deconstructing individual, their field of vision, and experiential apparatus, and the direction of re-construction is equally dependent on their psychic settings, motives, desires, goals, the latter is subject to the projection of a psychomorphic process during this operation.

The illustration aims to make present and future operators of magic aware that in reality they are weaving a pseudo-solipsistic vision that, to be effective, must be inter-subjective not only with human actors but also with worlds of spiritual intelligence, so that communication, the transmission of intentions is effective.

Training perception in such a way is an exceptionally difficult task because it is counterintuitive, i.e., it goes against the nearest resting point or pleasure principle, but this is why effort is put into exercises to break the impasse and sustain the state of meta-perception, or at least return to it in moments that require it, after prior training.

Some peak experiences, similarly: ecstasy, laughter, delight do not last forever, they are only a temporary state. When they are strictly linked to biopsychological experiences, they are a knotting of human psychological functions, when they have a sacral function, and also essentially essential, effective – they temporarily establish a secret thread of contact with forces, which unforgettable solidify the personal ritual, pointing towards a personalistic religion, its hermeneuin (boundary) of individual drunken fusion of the subject, man as a catalyst of divinity "from the world, through the world" to the extent of man in the act of union.

In this book, I offer similar interpretative-narrative games, as in the previous ones, which coded, and also encrypted try to be both obvious and concealed. Sometimes I am satisfied with the intended effect, sometimes I would correct a few things. In none of these cases do I intend to replace others' visions with my own, at most to serve as a finger pointing at the moon, a hound and lunar hare of Artemis-Hekate, her faithful dragon. Counting on the reader, and also keys in his mental continuum that are contained in thought-forms during engaged reading, I would like this form of mythopoetics to become a real mystery, performing psychagogic functions, albeit in a masked form – to lead to success in approaching matters that are untransmittable and experiential nuances, imponderabilia, a certain realization – even in the smallest possible degree."

Doorway of heaven, Shamash, sun with dragon spell, Ea's mighty son, Ea, the abysmal father, promise of immortality, forerunner of the seven Annuna gods, equipped with weapons of wisdom, wise noblesse, mastery of heart, young men praise you to defeat enemies. The morning light over the steppes, deserts and mountains. All earthly treasures are formed by your hand. Enlil, king of the earth, rejoices in your splendor.

May the stars I invoke protect me, Shamash, most worthy God, far from countless Beru, distances from Assuraku, towers of millions of millions of cubits built in my heart to kiss the palaces of the night sky and their sons and daughters.

What would make another pale as a tamarisk, I have survived at the behest of the gods. May the gates of Ereshkigal's Namtar and Erra bind the demons so that they do me no harm. May the three gates be closed and cause me no harm May the fourth gate Mutabriqu cause me no harm May the fifth gate Sharabda cause me no harm May the sixth gate Rabisu cause me no harm, May the seventh gate Tirid not harm me, May the eighth gate Idibtu not harm me, May the ninth gate Bennu not harm me, May the tenth gate Sidanu not harm me, May the eleventh gate Miqit not harm me, May the twelfth gate, Beluri not harm me, May the thirteenth gate, Umma not harm me, May the fourteenth gate, Libu not harm me, May Hurbashu, fear and terror, never harm me, May Namtar let me pass through the gates of the underworlds so that I may find my shadow and the shadow of my loved ones, Spare me like the port of Agade from three hundred and sixty thousand troops from whom I received blows, and return safely to the land of the gods.

May Enlil, father of the gods, hear my request. Whoever cancels this will to return or tries to obscure it, erase it or use any movement of my entire mortal life and all the movements of my original and future existence, may Shamash uproot his or hers foundations and tear out their progeny.

On the boat of the stars: Ishtar-Annunitum, Anu, Enlil, Ilaba, Sin, Shamash, Nergal, Umu, Ninkarrak. Mighty the palaces of the gods:
Ishtar who dwells in Eannaki, the star of Venus, Enlil who dwells in Nippur, Dagan who dwells in Tuttul, Ninhursag who dwells in Kesh, Enki who dwells in the hidden palace of Eridu, Sin who dwells in the lunar palace of Ur, Shamash who dwells in Sippar of the Sunfire and in Sippar on Earth, Nergal who dwells in Cutha on Mars, and the holy city of Cutha on Earth,

May no demons enter, may they be judged and imprisoned in their domains. Returned to nature and to their thrones, without molesting a single soul.

Ishtar, the daughter of Sin, and Ishara, may the spell of Lamashtu be broken. May the spell of the Magi Ninkillim be preserved and active, that spell against furious, fearsome vampire who was cast out by the gods. As Ninkarrak commanded by his example.

Ishtar, splendor of the gods, the beloved who stands in Shamash's mighty eyes. Nannay, Venus triumphant, a younger daughter, a sure power of the sun's mighty eye. Children of a radiant red-gold lightning, dancing around their mothers before the gods of this world fold their hands in joy. Irnina, the female Igigi, brave in battles, frenzied with splendor and dignity, a heart of stormy white and radiant gold.

Even if I am granted a radiant destiny, may I be vindicated against my enemies, for not out of cowardice but out of plagues have I done nothing heroic in my own eye. Adapa, the wise man who rejected immortality, was not a fool. He bided his time in wisdom to free himself from the toils of mortals and gods.

Glory to Horus of the Twin Horizons, the Great Judge of the Ennead Glory to Seth, the Vanquisher of Apep, who judges the Underworld Glory to Hathor, who with Sekhmet and Bast guards the Mighty Eyes of Providence Glory to Alpha and Omega, Isis and Nephtys, who are blessed and guarded by the Twin Crowns! I, Neb ntr-san-tep, scribe and Isiac priest, compose here a prayer and incantation to promote all who read it with blessing and joy!

May the tribunal begin, May their undertakings be pardonable, May my weary heart be judged on the scales of justice Blackened or blessed, May my life be drawn accordingly from the blood of my kheper-hati-ba May my movements be balanced against those of my enemies, wherever they may be! May all be heard, but the objective judge decides by resolving injustice against me and my enemies. May I be assigned according to the necessity and the need, golden Osiris or black Isis, rainbow or Nephtide, avert! Protect my shadow and my soul from sinking in the pool of fire Rejoice, rejoice! For the powers have taken me under their mighty wings! I follow a great feast of the Yaaru, as many have done before! I tie Isiac knots around my spirit I secure the sacred bonds.

Hieros! Hieros! Hieros! Hosios! Hosios! Harpos! May the serpents of the Ureus adorn my temples and my forehead, for I have spat out and bound the enemy! Cursed him thrice and seven times! Heal the pain! For justice dwells in the fortress of Re, for Septad, the virgin, holds her scales on the tritogenic foundation of the cosmic spring of profundity! I am a young god and wear my starry garb on May Akh like an ibis on the stars A dragon amid the vastness of the cosmos Rejoice! For I have eaten the plums of Ankh! My mother Sothis, Isiac star, she rises above the horizon, that star of the solstice! Mighty is her name above the stars! May she make me bright and drive the desert black storms from my heart, may she uproot and tear all wrongdoing until my robes shine gloriously again! Thoth, adorned with dignity, bestowed by the Lord of the Universe, Atum, on Lotus, the infinite face, may the scribe of destinies, the poet and keeper of order, who delights the eternal twins, decide everything and anything, from the beginning to the end.

May the plums of righteousness and immortality be given to the participants of this noble feast! May they be reconciled! May suffering be dispersed May sorrow and grief be no more! Rejoice at the end of your stay in the mortal world, for the Lady Seshat has accepted you into the other world and the wolf-headed Wepwawet has paved the way for you!

May I wear victorious laurel wreaths May I wear a magnificent ureic tiara, For I have arrived in the company of the stars, For I am welcomed by great and small, Spirits rejoice!

I approach to pay homage and honor thee, Oh, splendid, noble, shining, glorious beings! May the shadow rejoice as an active spirit, May the doubles, the souls and the spirit rejoice as one! May you rise as Osiris, dismembered by Seth, sewn by Isis, resurrected as Sah!

Heru-Khuti descends at the top of Tmu-Khepera, Souls travel from east to west and from north to south, On the great ascent! Tuamutef of the horizons, open the gates! For he watches over the abysmal descent, Night divides the Sacred Breath, Alas great cosmic void! Osiris Un-Nefer watches over the slain underworld. Great Qebensennuf from the South Pole, Commander from the Summer Equinox to the Autumn and Winter, ruling the Mother, from the Great Lady are born all the visible forms of Heru-Khuti and the divine hosts! Osiris, Seb-Erpat rises as her son, the Holy Breath Earth marries the Star Goddess Isis, the Foundation As Earth and Justice sews the rising stars of Osiris, guarded by Seven Shining Ones. Osiris Hu-Nefer rises, rises, rises! Ra-Hamarchis rises in the west, guarded by Mestha of the western horizon, Isis summons the rites of spring! Osiris-Tet enthroned, greeted by Hapi of the north pole! The cycles interpenetrate. Isis, Osiris rise on their rightful thrones!

O thou whose spirit of the bull, the Taurus, the triple dew shines! Whose serpents rise to the stars! May you be protected at this word, heed me, bull queens and bull kings of heaven, free yourself, rejoice! Protect me from evil and promote the magnificent battles of my heart! May the Protectorate of Neith bring joy and righteousness to the living and a feast of brilliant spirits and souls to the dead! Mighty Vulture Khabet lick the newborn with a blessing that is your own! May you traverse, traverse the winding firmament of the abyss, and the waterways of ascension will be opened to you! As from the night you will pass into the days of Yaaru! For you will wear robes of your true form and shape, Immaculate, pure, rejoice! You are pure and innocent on the steps of Re! Do not retreat, like a child treading on the bark of millions and millions of years, find your home as a star in the dancing, glorious fields of Yaaru. Teferet nourish you with immortal food, you splendid daughter of Re! May nothing bind me, may nothing examine my shortcomings on earth May I not be imprisoned, not confined, may I find my true form and shape, among the immortals and the stars, in the joyous field of Yaaru! May I be like a hawk, protecting and seeing what was given to me by the gods to see! May I sanctify the covenant with my mage staff and my Isiac robes, and shoot the enemies with straight arrows! May I cut off the heads of the enemies, so that their limbs cannot rise against me!

Falcon calls me back, magnificent two Kites are showing my way, Anubis protects me, Wepwawet opens splendid paths for me! May entry and reemergence from Amenti be opened for initiates. You initiates! Gather around your mighty Bull-Queens and mothers That cry and weep for you, that call you back from joys and woes of Earth, That call you back upon your seats and thrones! May your secret names be preserved and made effective, may your Ren Thrive, vaulting spirits with joy, triumphantly! May you be free!

„We do not understand except by observing phantasies." — Giordano Bruno.

"3:23: The Master, speaking with the Grand Music Master of Lu, said, Music can be understood in this way. The players first in unison, then freely harmonizing, playing separately or carrying on from one another, and thus the piece is completed."[1]

Thus born of the earth, another example of a human life. We live out our fantasies and imaginations, through honest and resonant intellectualizations. Then comes the deep feeling, the transparency of the perceived world, which resembles a naivety. Here we reclaim something like a consolidated inner truth. Defiantly we oppose oblivion and forgetfulness. According to the law of self-reflection, we look up between the hypostatic mirrors. We reflect on this world and on ourselves, ascending through proportion, observation, and cognition. We find signs, tokens, and notions of the divine, and thus erect, furnish, and construct an inner temple. Ultimately, we want to leave the spectacle of illusions, the great hall of mirrors. We expand vertically and horizontally, stripping away the veils until the essence returns to infinity.

Resurgent atavisms are signs of true archetypes. In the language of symbols, what is not superficial is always essential.

All deeply living ideas are older than human existence. They live as cosmic forces that exist a priori. They are only temporarily drawn into the intellect and the soul. They are touched by our measure. With the means of a child of nature and the starry sky, woven into the fabric of the human idea, discovered and focused.

Ideas are the substance of the forces that bind our common destiny. They are revealed through brooding, pondering, acting out, feeling and experiencing. Sometimes this happens to a greater extent than fate may forgive. The destinies that do not allow such transgressions force them upon us so that we learn from them. When does a child of nature meet the roots in the stars. When do the lovers become one, united in harmony, united in liberation?

There are three kinds of heroism, I believe. That of conquering the world in an overarching triumph. That of conquering the interior in an overwhelming gigantomachy. The creation of cultural and civilizational foundations that make societies flourish. What distinguishes a hero from a villain is the impact he or she creates in the world in the long run. A malevolent intention that leads to good is a Mephistophelian prerogative. A benevolent intention that brings about good is holy. An evil will that brings injustice to the fore is that of a conscious destroyer. A good will that brings about evil levels hells.

„In order to grasp the power of the images, the interpreter must in some way participate in the beliefs of those who are frightened and fascinated by them"[1]

How would the understanding of the world evolve in a binary star system with three moons orbiting an inhabited planet? Would the beings inhabiting this world grasp different configurations of forces? Their astronomy and therefore their astrology would be different. Their technology and evolution might be different. Perhaps the nature of life that evolved in such an environment would exhibit a different kind of contact, beings and forms. Apophatic between itself and the deep world. It is aware of the autochthonous forces of all its being and the deep grammar of the cosmos in many ways. Obviously through itself in contact with the world through knowledge and interfaces of interaction. Perhaps as lost as we are in our being? Perhaps as natural as their innate inclination? If a human were to travel to such a system, torn away from this world, how would he react to the nature of such a strange, remote solar system? If he were affected by the three moons, two stars and all the planets, how would he react, how would he respond?

We are all immersed in an eerie world. It is more or less interconnected and understood by scientific and astronomical axioms. And yet, by and large, it is unfathomable. Multiple hidden physical, transcendent and occult parallel factors and variables have their influence. Just as I believe planets have their natures, so do stars have their natures as ensouled entities, hidden worlds full of strange life.

It is remarkable that we too often limit the concept of life to something organic, living in the biological sense. Visible neutering the invisible force, the idea, the omnipresent being, the panentheistic intelligence. Between these forms of life there are worlds that we can rarely describe with our divisions and ideas. We often refer them to ancient fantasies and bestiaries. We may think them all fantasies and the mythomania of an overstimulated or psychotic mind. Or we may flirt with the idea that these worlds were once closer, more obvious, visible to the human participant. Without relegating them to unconscious, anthropological structural symbolism, but in interaction with each other. Not holistically objective, but also not totally dependent on the mind of the individual. We forget we are dreaming and think the spectacle is reality, or we observe events in the dream as if they were real. Lucid dreaming while awake is a sincere attitude. In dreams, we re-virtualize sleep with waking. Yet we act through the same tissue, both in lucid dreaming while awake and in lucid or incestuous dreaming while asleep.

Memory and history are not the same thing. That what is now was not always so is the repeated phrase of Whilists and Presentists, "It has always been so." Nothing new under the sun! And yet it is ever changing, like the flow of time and events you enter. Any worthy thing raised to a metaphysical level by an act of hypostasis becomes a wonder, a horror, and an awe of unimaginable proportions. It depends on the perspective of the observer and his ability to go beyond what is comfortably known. Everything that is reified and yet belongs to the sphere of the sanctuary becomes a living sign. Like the temple of the spheres in Harran. Like the ziggurat in ancient Borsippa, later called the Tower of Babel, or the city of Ecbatana, built by King Dioces of Media. Its mighty walls were modelled after the planetary spheres of heaven.

When the reification of the divine becomes too materialistic, too naively realistic, it descends and forgets itself. This causes the human spirit to reproduce itself with itself. It happens in a conceptual swamp through the separation of analogy, the confusion of referential proportions. It passes into a horizontal reflection that no longer even separates itself from transcendent factors, but more and more from its own content. This situation leads to an infinite variety which is superficial. Because of the flatness of the horizontal spread, it is the spawn of the postmodern fantasy, in which the infantile fantasy itself is cherished, reified and real. The magical transcendent hybrid, which is a perpetual motion machine, becomes the hubris of man-made hybrids. They need to be constantly animated and cease to function without the animators. This is the main difference between the objective world and its envelopes and virtualities. It cuts off human participation in the flow of the living world and the world soul. It becomes detached from the source of life and builds sand castles on the beaches of dried up lakes.

Emperor Wu of Chan (156 BME – 87 BME) asked himself a fundamental question. What is the relationship of heaven to earth, so that man is in the world of nature in relation to the cosmos and heaven. He invited the best minds of his time to participate in measuring proportions, exchanging observations and sharing insights. In order to let the thoughts rise in great depth to the sky, bases were created once again. So again something was settled – not about individual and superficial things, but about deep insights gained from the world as it is. The times, the changes, the place of man and woman in the world in the midst of nature in a civilized refinement. So what manages the movements of the starry sky. How to interpret in a symbolic way the observations of astronomers, philosophers and Wu, Xi and Shu (magicians, shamans). How nature works and how natural philosophy elevates it to the Numinous Fires. And later – how to relate all this to the world of human affairs to guide them? We can approach the omitted, unknown, inexpressible deep laws of the physical, objective universe, which are discovered to a possible extent. After that, we continue with metaphysical measurements and directed realizations. They are communicated in the human symbolic language that laid the foundation for all advanced civilizations in their beginnings. There is no question that astronomy was the most important mother for any form of philosophy.

I present a henoteistic panentheistic view in which the antecosmic, pre-phenomenal transcendence is also the point of return. It is a non-Abrahamic view of the world. Everything is enveloped by an intelligible force. In a world of multiplicity in change, of gradations of force, the harmony of tension unfolds from the infinite point to the whole sphere of the great game. From the simplest to the most chaotic, it has laws that generate themselves from the simultaneous states. From the point to the abysses, all worlds have their own laws. Consequently, all beings that inhabit them show their tendency that corresponds to these laws. The transcendent point is that of silence and simplicity. There is an equality. Chaos is a potential of everything, the point of monadic singularity, where chaos generates laws that wrap themselves in the stability of possible worlds. Later, they are attracted by the pull of the void, chaos, or return to the monadic point. However, this is not a process of unification and separation, but a seamless integration. The great movement, the difference, the war – it's all in between. Observe the archetypes in the movements of the stars and planets. If we observe the archetypes of nature and human beings, we can deduce the changes on a small scale, that is, on a human scale.

The interpretation of these laws, grasped according to the possibility of fragmented or unified, topographically unequal perceptions, is a matter of hypophetic efforts. The knowledge, experience, skill, socio-historical environment, history of ideas, inventions, and history of perception itself have been expressed in different ways. Different peoples in different cultures, ethnicities, tribes, and civilizations related their wholeness to the world with different standards. Some of them measured in unison, others measured different parts of the world. Comparativism in mysteries and religious traditions is as useful as it is inaccurate. It allows us to explore different perspectives and perceptions – if practiced – they can be realized tools, or ineffectual, deluded attempts and ordeals. Their mystical, affective, and intellectual configurations toward the perceived world have changed over time. It depended on what people in these social formations understood and what their traditions were. Based on signs and concepts that were possible to think, changes allowed by taboos. What was considered sacred and profane, clean and unclean. These clusters of shared perceptions formed threads of kaleidoscopic ideas and kaleidoscopic phenotypes of being. These views flowed in the mental, emotional, and spiritual bloodstream through group and individual vistas and breakthroughs. They had their pioneers, actors and participants. History is viewed backwards from the present and reinterpreted through cultural concatenations of scientific, social, political, and religious precepts that are currently established. This does not take into account that people in history have perceived the inner territories and the exoteric worlds differently. Some have not even made a distinction.

The variations throughout the ages in terms of metaphysical patterns, forces and worlds, visible and invisible, have been static, dynamic, chaotic, but most of the time – orderly. Attempting to establish man-made laws, foundations on planet Earth and structures that reflect them in a world of nature is an arduous task. The foundations, which were long-lasting, aspired to be approximate. And yet, they were prone to decay, degeneration, and corruption if not renewed and reformed. This is the fate of all civilizations that have long been buried under the desert sands. People who thrive around their sacred and profane – may we respect their dust and breath – have long since been blown away by the winds.

What blinds the mortal who now chases this and that with surrogates that smother his longings and give him temporary relief. Until one is alone with being alone. Alone in the world of forgetfulness, embraced and in the company of those who have never forgotten us. The gods have never been subservient to man. Since all things are reflected in each other through the analogy of being, they can be influenced in passionate objectivity. In the sense that they receive impressions and deliver them again, but remain unmoved and lose nothing of their essence. The objective truth is most certainly beyond human comprehension. It can be too terrible to bear or too glorious to outshine and burn our eyes like the transcendent sun. It is a conceptual sign that is perfectly holy and noble in absolute form. It is not a retreat, but an invitation to study, to experience. To climb the ladder of the spheres through practiced epiphanies and realized, practical illuminations. The myth of the powers thrives in spite of the futile attempts of the exclusive religions to discard it. The forgetfulness of the human race has not harmed or damaged these powers. Whether they are stellar deities, cosmic, noetic-noeric, essential, aeonic, chthonic, cosmic-telluric, elemental, those of life, death, or stranger worlds. Whether small, humble spirits or higher deities. Whether they belong to the earth or to another world. Whether they are favorable to our race, or neutral, or quite the opposite, whether they can understand us, whether we are accepted by them as lesser gods. Whether they love us, despise us, ignore us, or have no such instincts. Interact in a way that suits their nature, essence and inclination. In a reactive and impressionable world of diversity, this is often difficult to predict. Confucius wrote in the Analects that it is sometimes better to keep "gods and spirits at a distance." Primarily, to respect them. As humans, we have hardly mastered ourselves, so how can we know anything about other worlds?

The ancients understood that the stars, nature and their existence were a sacred phenomenon, and so they understood the gods in this way. The gods as powers came first, as it says in Pymander, before the solar system was even formed. The world followed, the human race being merely one of the recent brief spawnings of life on planet Earth. And what are we as a whole now, deprived of wonder, of harmony, convinced we know everything without knowing anything, but taking for everything a figment of the largely invisible? Apophatic perception or negative theology is the "knowledge that we know nothing". We need to find some certainties, great certainties, some hard-won experiences, solutions, realizations, beliefs, tunnel realities, understandings that we can rely on, that is a necessity for all foundations. Without it, the continuity of our reality function falls apart into derealization. When we behave properly on the personal level, we discover beauty, harmony, great corrections that resemble the cosmos — it is not chaos. Quite the opposite. It is in harmony with it and we try to approach this discovery by bringing our self-reflective animal self into resonance with these forces. To become a human worthy of the name, and in the process of homoiosis Theio, Theion Ergon, in the mutual impressions between deities and humans: to ascend as deified mortals.

We are not a Tabula Rasa

This work was evoked by a selection of carefully chosen narratives, styles of thought, esthetics and emblematic realities. They are not relative, but they are not entirely true either. The author has chosen to open the gates of wonder, horror and humanity. It is a mere trail that never assumes the role of "right or wrong", "true or false". It is a journey to personal understanding, an interpretation. When a human being refers to a part of a vast ocean of being, different in its characteristics, it evokes personal cosmographies. They are both merely a human measure of what they measure. He perceives only what presents itself to him for such understanding. It is never a static process. The perception of a Delphi pythoness, her language of mind and heart, is certainly different from that of an eighteenth-century Orthodox Christian Moscow priest. A mechanical engineer from the United States of America in the 1920s has a different perception than a modern network analyst of the twenty-first century.

On the scale of the present, there are so many differences that when we leave history behind and perceive from the present, we reinforce present seeing. If we go beyond the history of perception, we can not only look at history from above, but also try to understand the language of the mind and heart in the history of other peoples. It did not put everything in perspective, nor did this ocean of human phenomenology work as a whole. In one way it did, in another an Orphic hierophantid caught "the golden thread of understanding." In another way – and as a completely harmonious process – it was not only effective, but magnificent. Why should we discard the traditions of ancient cultures, the mysteries, even if we leave them to scientific, purely academic explorations. Try to revive them as they thrive – indeed – within and without. Dare to do so and make up your mind. Think of others, the equanimity of all beings in depth is a fact. But if you define the differences according to the rules of levels of organization, hierarchies, a-hierarchical topographies of being, orders, chaos, parity and cooperation or conflicts about values and weights – then they are indeed opposite. Thus, the sameness of all phenomena in their depth does not exclude them from what is diverse and different. The radiant emptiness of the void makes all phenomena dreamlike, the monad rounds everything to numinous perfection.

Austine Osman Spare wrote that "this is the only moment of reality". For a human being it is the only true instance of his life as he could be. Therefore, this moment is the last from our point of view. Let us enjoy every moment. Our mind travels on in the wanderer's awe of the continuous flow that is in a man and shapes him into a mortal man. Distractions rush in as we focus on ten thousand things. If our life is empty and boring, we have not recognized life itself. We can project compassion, kindness and beauty onto the world, or we can do terrible things to ourselves. Just as we can project many things onto the body of the living worlds and uplift them or harm them. What regulates is justice. It is nothing but a regulating force of the cosmos. Unlike human justice or the justice of nature, it is difficult to imagine. Some have tried to reflect this concept in order to lay the foundations for order on earth by motivating and inspiring people. But only insofar as they reformulated it, understood it, and opened themselves to the continuity of the cosmos. Whatever obstacle blocked the view caused a flood elsewhere. How it was interpreted and established, what was written, conceived and made — all this was a human endeavor.

The Golden mean is a solar method for finding the relationship between deep and relative metaphysical laws. Based on the observation of physical, natural, philosophical and emblematic laws, that is, human science. Rigorous and social sciences, art, theology, we raise them by penetrating this world with an inner vision. Constantly we discover deeper laws with the help of flawed and limited human instruments. These instruments are connected with feelings, intellect and ideas that produce the content. It is a mere reflection of these metaphysical laws on the human level in the minds, hearts and souls of men and women. In this way, we discover them within us, hold them, and radiate them into our lives whenever possible. Thus, the aeonic light of the sun is evident by its nature and represents in the world the radiance of truth. Its autophaneia is self-identity. In the solar cults, it was considered as a visible deity; in the human orders, oaths and contracts under its light were a reflection of the sun as a reified approximation of its nature in the world of human affairs. Thus, the laws of nature are obvious, the laws of men are different, the laws of gods, spirits and forces rarely resemble those of human affairs. Man-made religious and mystical orders essentially attempt to reflect metaphysical laws by trying to measure, reflect, absorb, and consolidate them into traditions, rituals, and meanings. At a certain level of cognition and maturity of understanding, one imbues the ritual with insight. The discovery of laws through observation is later communicated by means of symbols, emblems that transcend the limits of human language. Since we are symbol-creating and symbol-manipulating, time-binding species, written signs are used to bridge these worlds through execution, catalysis, rites, persuasion and manipulation. Realization has many means and resources and is a consequence of openness. Delusion is limited and corresponds to one-sided dilettantism, short-sighted bias, adherence to concepts, belief systems, and clinging to oneself. Ratio is always a friend, even with seemingly irrational solutions. Remember that viewing the world through a limited instrument amplifies the view through the instrument's own "aggregates" – seeing, perceiving, feeling, sensing, understanding, knowing, thinking, and so on. It is never a complete view.

For example, a telescope that directs our eye to a star is really a negative observation. It is limited to what is known, observed, sensed, perceived, known. In astrophysics, such an observation must be supported by scientific knowledge, and it is within its framework. In metaphysics, the whole act of observation is useful in that it is not limited to the act of observation, but reaches into realms of gnosis through observation. The beautiful moment of seeing a star does not exclude all instances of a deep context limited by perception. It can be seen as a physical star with all the properties known to modern science. From another point of view, it can be seen as an object among other systems in this galaxy. An ensouled powerful spirit, son and daughter of the Great Star Mother, star maker, if you will, depending on the model or simulation of cosmogony. Seen with mystical or second sight, a reality of powerful beings in hypostasis. A stream of photons, solar winds with variable plasma density, electromagnetic radiation, a total flux that reaches into unknown spectra, but also into those that are obvious. He is the combustor of deserts and harbors drought and pestilence. In Chaldean belief it is the eye of the third transcendent, like many other classes of stars connected by a thread, a divine hecatic fire of the world soul. An aeonic eye with cosmic powers, an entry port from the worlds of infinity (noumenal) into the physical universe (phenomenal). A sign of the greater world like a star – a monolith of various spirits of the eons, plunging into the vastness of the universe. The belief that a mortal can be rewarded with a star is somewhat nostalgic. It was the belief of the Hellenes and Egyptians. Repeated by Giordano Bruno in his work "The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast". Countless monoliths may recall the eternal return of spirits to infinity, as living signs to others under the vaults of the stars.

Metaphysics is a way in which the human totality, opening itself to the world with sufficient understanding and perceptual acuity, enters into a conscious relationship with the intelligible worlds. We need a point of reference against silence. In fact, any reference point is useful, be it a force, a deity, an astronomical observation, a model of things, another human being, or something more transcendent and elusive, as long as it is indeed alchemical and metamorphic. We cast the fishing net when we enter into a relationship, and then we pull back the net, leaving silver threads of memory. Then we catch the fine proportions of these nets to understand more and admire all the spiritual beauty with which we endow our inner temples. Our inclination and vision moves with the focus. Du fu (712–770 C.E.), a Chinese poet of the Tang dynasty, wrote of one of his friends, "His thoughts, floating in the air, reached the highest peaks of refinement." Confucius advised not to occupy the mind with base things, but to focus on the finest in order to feast on the refined nourishment of mind, heart and soul. The mind moves toward the starry sky, but it should be comfortable in any environment, somewhat detached and in control of the mind. It is ruled by its own geniuses and enters and exits relationships with the phenomenal world playfully, gracefully and with ease. In other words, it is the way the microcosm inherent in the human form, the senses, the intellect, the feeling and the spirit, reflects and is reflected by the world. When we exclude nature, the divine and daimonism from this world, we reduce ourselves to our kind. In truth, we cut out all the worlds that flourish in the background of our vision and knowledge.

Ethical science informs us, and it is necessary to enlighten us, but it does not complete us. Basic work in many disciplines is an attempt to be a general scientist. Whether in the social sciences or in the discrete sciences, it is useful to bridge mindsets and to illuminate the world from different perspectives. It is also useful in the ordinary affairs of politics, society, life, profession, science, technology, grassroots work, research, and so on. Simply put, being an educated, intelligent, critical-thinking, open-minded, principled person with ethos is enough to help ourselves and others. To know if we are, confrontations and tests in the world are necessary. So also in the study of the occult, metaphysics, the performance of magical rites and ceremonies, theurgy, when we are confronted with the "other side" and the "foreign". With united forces, we should expand our understanding, ethics, principles, and obligations to the rest and take advantage of what we can. We are the disciples of the world, but only to the extent that we are entitled to be, only to the extent that we are willing to prepare and participate. If we violate our responsible freedom, if we move with too much ambition and without restraint, our work will be doomed to failure and that of others will be destroyed.

If we live in Plato's cave, we are more likely to live in the background of the essential worlds. And we do so until we consciously perceive them and begin to participate in their work in order to become complete again. We never confuse them with the ultimate, the established, but we must order our minds. With reverence and gratitude to the worlds that have taught us that we essentially move through the illusions and the illusion moves through us, the point of will is the catalyst of design. It is not a matter of negating conventional reality, but of raising it to a dream-like level while maintaining our commitment to freedom and detachment. All sensations, the workings of the mind, the world around us should be consistent with Yu, the Way of the Miraculous. Nurture this perception before you become attached to or captivated by the world, and move through it seriously, profoundly, or lightly.

Religions were created by codifying the above relationships. They were sustained by traditions, stories, legends, ceremonies, roles, magical rituals and gestures. They were a way to penetrate and remember human discoveries about impossible worlds. They captured certain powers within their astralistic resonances through ceremonies, codes, beliefs, rituals, celebration of events and occurrences in an act of reminiscence and repetition. The superficiality of a belief system begins when it is empty, when it is reified into nonsense and gives the appearance of having an essence by being a mere repetition. It preserves the function of social cohesion, it preserves the function of power, it preserves the ordering principle of reality. But from the perspective of mystagogy, it becomes void.

So it is with the living ideas in the whirlwinds of the universal currents of power. When they are replaced by counterfeits, illusions, deceptions and surrogates, longing is stifled by constant distractions, it clogs the spiritual bloodstreams and the spiritual veins and leads to terrible diseases of the unspoken genii, soul, heart and mind. Matryoshka-like illusions may not even contain the essence, like shells they are empty, but wrapped in an exquisite garment they look tempting. It's a matter of finding the right treasure chest and then skillfully cracking it so as not to damage the mysterious elixir inside.

Some religions may be closer to realization, others have strayed into projections of fear, guilt, self-enslavement, and martyrology of flawed doctrines often based on misunderstandings of human bestiality and idyll. In the end, it is the cognition, not the belief system. A belief system is a cognitive mapping that can only be elevated by hypostasis when subtle constellations of mystagogical threads operate to put things in proper perspective. It may be that a belief system impedes the realization of greater insights by inhibiting them. It functions like a trap, serving no purpose other than a mental prison. Some defend themselves with consistency and intellect, others have had to destroy and convert outsiders and subtler minds and hearts with a vulgar display of brutality. But even in these religions mystics were born, like the Sufis, who tried to speak through the language of the existing religion so that others might better understand themselves. Masquarade continued — to convey the realization through the religions that prevented the essential techniques from being known or even mastered. Masquarade was confused with charlatanry, charlatanry with teaching, and so the practical methods were diluted, contaminated, and sent into obscurity. The discovery of relative truths, cognitions, and the dispersion of the darkness of ignorance, the attempt to resonate synthetically with higher orders of deities-not by imitation, but by wise incorporation-in harmony, freedom, fulfillment, completeness, and happiness. Application to life, cognition, and feeling is paramount. It is all human, all too human.

Mnemosyne

"Those who built in granite and constructed [halls] in goodly pyramids with fine work, when the builders became gods their stelae were destroyed, like the weary ones who died on the riverbank through lack of a survivor, the flood having taken its toll and the sun likewise, to whom talk the fishes of the banks of the water"[1]

"You will find in the halls of Hades a spring on the left, and standing by it, a glowing white cypress tree; Do not approach this spring at all. You will find the other, from the lake of Memory, refreshing water flowing forth. But guardians are nearby. Say: "I am the child of Earth and starry Heaven; But my race is heavenly; and this you know yourselves. But I am parched with thirst and I perish; but give me quickly refreshing water flowing forth from the lake of Memory."[2]

Mnemosyne is not a memory of our earthly life, but of all memories withheld from us in human existence. It is a total memory of all instances of our being, of this life and every other life, incarnate and disincarnate. What good is the memory of the little lives we have led and our stories as droplets on the sea of life and death? And yet, it is the absence of forgetting that has been considered aletheia in both life and death. A transcendent memory of everything, the roots, the destinies, the fates.

The gods may be as they are, in the eyes of men they may be a constantly moving whirlwind of detached forms [masks], detached from totality, as Democritus would put it. Captured for a moment in human impression with bated breath, silenced with a divine awe that flows brightly through us. Never violent, but with a glorious, luminous power that we can feel as something beautiful, pure and high. Temporarily personified, for example – as if we were walking with a superior friend who shines through our being. He or she inspires by idea, brilliance, intellect and feeling, with different characters and natures. Unique yet whole and harmonious. Ancient wings unfold with magnificent power. Eight-armed deities conquer all ignorance in an instant with a subtle thought. We are inspired because we want to be, because we are free and recognise ourselves in that freedom. We engage because we walk through a desert that we animate with our breaths. In the past, the philosophers of the Neoplatonic school perceived it as Providence. The great civilizations see in it a solar origin. Thus, the second Mithraic axiom is: "Harmony of tension in opposition". This was the bow of Artemis, with which the soul was to be erected. They were united in the supremacy of the Sun, which protected the numinous gates and the worlds of infinity. Wonderful ways of understanding hierarchies or ideas of the invisible and the divine were presented. All theology and philosophy, Iamblich wrote honestly, was [and is] a human endeavour. No revelation was ever imparted-this does not deny metaphysics, but reinforces seeing in a different way. This was known since the Parmenid doxa: Mortals have opinions about the divine, but these are only opinions. In theurgic Neoplatonism, participation in the world was perfectly embedded in a rite within a theological structure. It elegantly conveyed what was most significant and essential. Thus the fine intellect of Sosipatra, probably the most outstanding of all the Neoplatonists, trained in the Egyptian, Eleusinian and Chaldean Mysteries, must have been forged by the Sun, the Moon and the planets. The seventh conqueror, the conqueror is the dragon and Artemis, verily. Iamblich, who in De Mysteriis refers to the Elder Races and develops a subtle philosophy, means the personified divine essences. Hypatia, the Alexandrian philosopher and preacher who excelled in the sciences and astronomy, must have referred to something true and attainable – not in vain. Just like Proclus, who classified the chain of being, whether mortals, deified mortals, daimons, heroes, angels, demigods, high deities – he must have had an intention to understand the world. He was no mere cartographer of his fantasies, but an interpreter of the divine in tangible categories. They all understood this flourishing world in one way or another – as long as it was conducive to truth and liberation, it was the embrace of truth.

Without wanting to give the impression of being a chaotic syncretist, it is a notion of understanding that connects and leads to greater insight the mystagogical narratives that gradually measure a complex and diverse spiritual world. It provides ease of movement and discovery, and assembles new gnoses into a whole. In ancient times, it was common to travel from master to master, mistress to mistress, temple to temple — to be initiated into the mysteries, just as we study at universities today. Far too often today, in our Western-centric view, we are static, our minds moving within their boundaries. Confucius wrote, "Those who are well versed in ancient times but penetrate and understand modern times are good teachers." Timeless mysteries have never lost their value, and modern times need people who understand them as never before. They are not anachronistic triviality, they are alive and yet forgotten.

"Knowing this <one> thing, that great natures produce great evils when corrupted, and the greatest enterprises are in all cases the most harmful when they go to the bad. — Iamblich in a Letter to Eustathius".[1]

As far as nature is concerned, we are adapted to our environment, as all nature is, which is shown by it. We are imperfect in evolutionary terms, from the standpoint of utility, for example, our spines are not fully adapted to an upright posture, newborns need to be fed for months, etc. A Hindi woman who has given birth to a child has nurtured it for a few years and then symbolically gives it to the world as a gift. She wishes for her child to excel after her son or daughter enters the earthly stage.

Our existence, which is located in a deep, objective universe, arises in interpenetrated, pre-existing relationships. We are an inseparable part of configurations interpreted by our somatic system, our sense organs, our mind, our spiritual carriers, our cognitions and feelings, which make up the content of our lives.

[1] Iamblichus of Chalcis: the letters / edited with a translation and commentary by John M. Dillon and Wolfgang Polleichtner (Society of Biblical Literature, Atlanta: 2009)

We are in a biological cocoon that recapitulates ontogenetic, phylogenetic and psychogenetic evolution on planet Earth in a stellar environment, the solar system. We are immersed in this environment and express ourselves within it without knowing how open, essential or empty this space is. We do not know how our lives resonate within the world of nature, planetary and stellar forces. To what extent do the unknown, manifold divine and abysmal factors influence the earthly stage? How alien, distant, dear, near or uncanny it can become. How overlapping, connected or separated the star systems, world systems and their inhabitants may be in whatever form. What is unknown to man, worlds that thrive without bodies, worlds that are in a tangible or intangible form. As united and condensed in great fields of brilliance above the stars, whose power is manifest even in our sun, once praised as the gateway and manifestation of the creative powers of heaven. We are thus in an operative framework limited by our form. We repeat a system of a priori deep forces, deities, ideas, symbols, types and archetypes, concepts, their traces and signs. They are anchored in us and in the world that our race lives through, modifies, focuses and creatively interprets. All this in fragmented, tragic ways, according to the measure that our understanding of ourselves allows, never in absolute numbers.

Only by understanding ourselves beyond the boundaries that lie before us can we expand the territory of possible relationships to phenomena and noumina outside our cocoon. By opening strange forces within to connect with vast forces outside, we inhabit a flawed human perception and yet attempt to draw a map that is not territory.

Then we experiment or are exposed to new meaningful content that gives us greater psychonautic and transcendent, if not terrible, insight. It can elevate us above our own history to see the larger context with a hawk's eye and illuminate the search for knowledge, for truth, within the safe confines of common ground, intelligible worlds. The appropriation of human existence has been called a treasure by Buddhists, to give it a healthy, wholesome order of expression and to clarify the gaze of consciousness a lifelong task.

And for good reason – human existence with all its fine self-reflective intellectual-sensual aspects and its spiritual interface is a mystery. What a tragedy for humanity that even this worthy birth is reduced to nothingness by chasing after unworthy things, by practicing things that no longer represent humane aspiration. Chuang Tzu wrote that Confucius felt he was being punished by Heaven to lay the foundations for a civilized order. Confucius once thought about a dragon sage and then when he met Laozi, he exclaimed, "Now I have met one!". Chuang Tzu praised the sages of the true path as "the cosmic clods" who traveled detachedly without evaluating or weighing anything. They were free from the world, as companions of the heaven that lives them out. In the Tarot, the card of the Hangman can stand for a mortal man or woman who has been turned upside down by Heaven. Their roots are planted in the stars, in the transcendent. But who shines in the world, in nature, in the past, in the future?

Hermits guard the star of the lamp that illuminates their path, and thus power, justice, regulation and harmony are carried out into the world with a completely empty, selfless mind. This is the case when the star of one's consciousness is one with the feeling and reason of the beyond. In divine moments, when all our movements are raised against the obstacles, we arm ourselves regenerated against attackers when we are down. Filling the void of space with the divine, we play out our star and focus with a power that directs the finest of our daimon's possibilities. Filling our inner temple with splendor, we chase away the thieves, the destroyers, the insignificant ones who stuff us as if we were mere puppets feasting on our mental movements (Anathema of Zos), we grab them all by the throat and drive them away if possible!

Below the sewage and shrapnel of a besieged spirit, above the power of our star, which gives us the will. So that all these who abuse our physical temple, force our mind to move in our autonomous trains, convinced that they live us like puppets, sometimes stealing an instance of our being, but never the genius of the star. At least until we are torn to pieces and our will turns unnoticed into the will of the adversary crawling around inside us. When it is perverted by the adversaries and twisted to our worst, we try to give up the will only when the divine concentrates through us to catalyze it. In the end, we may all break – but what a magical battle it was!

Anchored deeply in the positive void, we dispel madness, terror, cruelty, delusion, anger and ignorance, and uplift the things for which the ancients lived. We try to represent the higher worlds with all our heart and mind. We make a man or woman realize the heavenly vaults and throw the thoughts that do not come from the base into the air, as in a great mission. When it is time to sacrifice the extraordinary, the strange, the terror, we return with a trophy to share with others. We do not pursue our work, we try to make it whole, complete and rounded. And when it is complete and rounded, we engage continuously, as before, during and after, for the world that needs us. Never resting on our laurels, never feeling vain pride of repose, we are always honest and authentic to the forces that have gifted us with insights. All this in order to reduce the desolation and burden of our spirit, which went beyond what the human form should witness. Then we recover sobriety. Let us reformulate it into simple elements that may be more easily conveyed through the power of myth, poetry, analogy, allegory and philosophy.

In other words, all means that reify the symbolic without killing it. We sacrificed our inner milieus in the search for reason. We harnessed the experiences of chaos, madness, rapture, ecstasy, laughter, delirium, sanctity, and derangement. We have contained them and reformulated the process into something useful for the rest. We have tried to create something limited, rigorous and yet clear-sighted. When you see chaos, you necessarily find order. It must be enforced before confusion tears us apart and blows our realities to pieces. It is a humane principle to choose and negotiate new ways and values that best suit our standards. And that is after we have assessed, discerned and decided what their value is for their net impact. It is a greater sign to open such vistas for others while sacrificing our own vision. This is a way into another, renewed hermetic art, made up of our journeys, experiences, perceptions, our interpretations and views. Basically, without the journey, without pioneers, there would be no one to transmit it further and revive the psychagogic principle. But to undertake it, we really have to ask ourselves. How much are we willing to sacrifice, burn, destroy our facade and give up the attachment to our self. In a sense, we are giving up attachment to ourselves to become a fully autonomous, self-directing individual who is selfless, mindful, focused, and at the same time non-violent with their art, like an actor in a dream play. A sovereign metaphysical anarchist with a vision of the world and a greater order.

How much space for the universe and for other beings can we create in the temple of ourselves without violating it? How much can we risk and what steps must we take before we fall? These ways show us the way to sublimate our understanding. To add a sense of freedom in which we acquire volitional, self-constituting powers in harmony with and with the help of the greater things. We move between masks, introspection, hollowness, emptiness, numinous light, stories and ideas, feelings and thoughts. We become animate and animate the other, animate the self that is animate through the other, and allow the self to be animate through the other. In doing so, we retain the sovereignty of the spirit, the senses, the feelings and the mind. All in varying proportions, depending on nature and what we recognize as our Self, the immovable spiritual star. Following Nietzsche, the transformation process in alchemy is lengthy, dynamic and unpredictable to give birth to a dancing star. There are no sure recipes or instant methods. On the other hand, there has not been a single man or woman who has not been recognized for a great heroic struggle and has maintained true honesty in the eyes of the gods. The powers and forces are impressionable to the extent that they lose nothing of themselves. The method of a man is the wholeness of life, in each of its transitions and decisions, attitudes. All victories, glories, badness, stains of the mind and heart are symbolic rituals in the making. Conscious rituals and performances are comparable to magic. All those who imitate others will never know themselves. They are too busy chasing appearances and imitating something they have neither the life nor the fundamentals to understand. Those who are authentic and honest resonate with their inner Daimon, grow through countless transformations, and forge themselves along the way. They can help others understand themselves better, but they can never live their life for them. Neither steal or imitate the genius of their spirit, nor pass it on to anyone else. Do not let this distract you from your work. To gain something ephemeral is not to gain anything.

To live a life, a mind, a soul, a heart magnificently, either inwardly or outwardly, is what the Chinese called "being in the company of heaven."

Confronting total freedom and total chaos, refining order means finding a cosmos of meaning and order. What emerges is an existence imbued with subtle meanings that make it round and complete. We find the answers when we are desperate and exhausted, yet have the determination to show up, to move forward, to become round and complete. to recognize what is useful and what needs to be discarded. To affirm each moment. These answers are neither absolute nor completely true. However, if we trust them and make them work for us, they become sanctified and reveal themselves as sacred affirmations.

On the other hand, despair and terror also teach a complete annihilation of this affirmation. Thus, it turns into a tension between the emptiness and the infinite sinking in the distance from the world, an existential struggle or the night of the soul. To withdraw and enter into the flows that correspond to the form is to understand its meaning and order. When fear is exhausted and one recognizes the whole, one assumes the responsibility of maintaining the works for the rest. This commitment is the strength against indifference. Those who may be torn by misery and have a great vision that permeates the realities of the earth understand beyond their species. It is an ethical and moral education that forges suffering, but it also teaches patience, strength, purpose and ultimately joy. Then we conquer suffering and focus on principles, direction, purposefulness and tranquility. In the end, we may be surprised and confused by humanity, curious about the laws of fate. The terrors and glories of the universe with its mysteries and awe no longer threaten us. We have found total annihilation and stepped into it to find a gigantic woe with our minds. We revisited the stream with fresh vigor to play a game with absolute freedom. We realized what wisdom, measure, proportion and responsibility are. The gods did not inhibit our movements, but only taught us how to fall. Like children, we can learn through mistakes to discern and decide what to do in order to stand upright. We judge according to our abilities and realize what is beneficial for the whole without imposing it on anyone. We have recognized the poisons and remedies of the world, which fruits and remedies are for our humanity. We have recognized what ignorance, delusion, anger, attachment, selfishness and suffering are and what of them arise in variations, variations of vice, and therefore decide to act. We are vulnerable to them at all times, yet remain strong whenever we can defeat them. As life moves rhythmically, we are prone to failure, mistakes and errors. Our mind and heart move along the path. They are corroded by forces that try to reverse our progress. Those who want to block our way into greater realms, in relation to the forces that support us and embrace us with their wings. Sometimes those who oppose us ask a simple question: are you ready? Having a direction that is above mortal life sets things straight as we express this impulse on the earthly stage.

Aims of a magician philosopher

> "Any reduction of the metaphysical to the human world is an anthropocentric projection. It is of use if it promotes ef-

It is the aim of every mystical, hermetic or psychonautical effort to establish a certain personal universe, an individual religion. Then, through contemplation, meditation, action, experiment, confrontation, rite, science and art, one has to find out how it is related to the general relations and the deep laws. Sustained motivation and breadth of attitude and vision and their responsible, limited direction are important. Let us assume that the limited tools we possess can also mask a larger numen that eludes what we can intuit and imagine. It is beyond our comprehension in its entirety. In our ability to self-consciously reflect and elevate ourselves through the recognition of higher worlds, we create a potential. The tools with which Mother Nature has endowed us, the tools we have been given by various powers, are merely tools. They can be addictive, although they come and go in miraculous ways. Thus, such tools can become a disguise instead of serving their purpose of illuminating the path, shaping it. For a tool worshipped for the sake of the tool is never the goal. When the means become idols, the goal is lost. When we are attached to tools that we lose, we lose the meaning of development. Bionic statues, astralistic talismans, fetishes and artefacts are man-made representations of the etheric. When understood as mere tokens, a temporarily enclosed essence, they serve their purpose. They reveal respected aspects of the realms they represent. But the goal must be abandoned for the process to unfold, so engage with the process and dance among its sounds. The world soul must be expressed. Perhaps it is this capacity for self-reflection that is the basis of all mystical science and art.

What we perceive with our senses and our minds, our instruments, the physical, objective universe may be only a deep shadow to study, but that shadow contains traces and concepts for the philosophical eye. It is an inviting field for discovery in a strange game. Perhaps it is an emanation of even greater worlds, invisible to our apparatus in contact with reality or illusion. Once we have opened ourselves to their reception, we begin to question further their particular and general properties, to understand them, and to synthesise our discoveries into a system, if we dare. And we should dare to do so! Let us boldly accept that there is a force, a world-soul in manifold ideas, which pervades this universe. Not the ordinary ones we may experience, but powerful forces that we can see through the lens of a human being. It is a matter of extracting existing patterns by human means and bringing them to an orderly understanding. The apophatic attempt to understand, experience, and reflect upon powers, forces, minds, feelings, ideas, and other modalities of being and non-being is an interrogative quest. It may involve a world-soul that is intelligible through the totality of itself in a way that is not comparable to what humans understand as self-reflection. In individual entities that are often unrealized and dormant until transformed, mirrored, ignited and reflected. Whenever an entity can participate in its mechanics by opening an eye to this existence, it enters individually into this larger stream. In this way, it is permeated by everything that is not captured in a natural order. It is called to awaken with the qualities of a particular being as soon as it is recognised by that being. Within a general force and properly focused and consolidated into a particularity within wholeness or oneness. It goes through a process of refinement, transformation and finally liberation.

We can distinguish two types of mind: the pure Intellect, i.e. the Nous, which is timeless and spaceless and is reflected in the ordinary human mind and feeling, depending on how open it is to it. And a human mind, the ordinary mind that trains, sublimates, destroys, transforms, ages, changes, permeates and decays. This human mind is what the cognitive sciences are concerned with. However, it also transforms other components of the bodies and the passive, receptive souls of a human being, and it is directed by them to the extent that they give away impressions.

The nous in the human anthropological conceptual projection on the world is the intellect, its ideational and emotional aspect is the hecatic world soul. The human mind is elevated by the power of authentic feeling, honesty, intellect, synergy and transparency that constitute creative reason. When it has found a right relationship with the Greater Spirit, a point of reference, it moves through relative orders. This should be done dynamically and skillfully, in accordance with the grammar and deep metaphysical laws, as well as the major transitory forces, the local transitory currents embedded in a greater whole.

By relating time, space and age in their current microcosmic environment. It is masterful to know and adjust to the great change of Opera Omnia by incorporating its movements and laws. It is the job of a magician-philosopher to understand the change and the laws and to support, mediate and help the currents to settle properly. And he does this while eliminating the negative effects and supporting the positive ones. In its uniqueness, it absorbs inspiration and laws and transforms the mind, souls and consciousness. It can be sublimated through psychospiritual alchemy to ever higher orders of perception and reflection. Thus, lower order feeling and reason are refined by higher order aspects related to the nous and the world soul.

In a pleasant environment, the nous is the quinta essentia and the "cloud of unknowing," while the human spirit, soul, kheper (heart) is an intermediary between the animal world, the generative realm, and the reflective nous that deifies it. By incorporating its profound laws into the great constellations of the inner symbols of life, we weave our garments. Once such completion has taken place, our animal mind may be persuaded by many forces, entities and realities that support or destroy us, perfect or pervert us. They either draw us into their nature, shape us or make us discover our own substance, our nature, our geniuses, our essence, our inclination and — according to our potential — express and shape it. It is our task to support this process and to strengthen the spirit by asking it for help. At the same time we strengthen our life in all its aspects, round it off and make it whole. This effect results from the diversity of natures and their laws, the disproportion of sameness and otherness and their own substance and tendencies to their own behaviour.

The problem of evil is essentially the problem of evaluation. It arises from the tension between sameness, otherness, and natures. A man is captured by forces whose nature falls on his head like a mountain when he contradicts them. He creates tension and turmoil among other natures and substances that are repugnant to him. They have their own perceptions, inclinations, senses of contact with reality, trade-offs, insights, and attitudes toward complicated rules that permeate the worlds in question. To recapture human nature, to redefine it, is like dancing with everything that contradicts it. Either by the law of inertia or by the law of inclination, attraction or repulsion. The only way to overcome this contradiction is consciousness, energy, direction and an unwavering determination. Whenever it is possible, call the help from "above". The shielding of the discovered, determined rules, perceptions, memories and cognitions, the protection and active work with them acts like a seal on the life work. According to human understanding, evil is not equal to matter or disincarnated malice, but to the lack of formation, principles and humanity connected with the reflection of the finest inner truth, ethos and daimon. The greater the firmness and stability in continuous righteousness that guards the high nature, the more robust is the defense against the concept of evil. The lack of a determined attitude to defend oneself, to overcome vices and defilements in an inner gigantomachy is too often projected onto God, the devil, nature or some other force. But when we engage in responsible gigantomachy, even if our defenses are shaken by anything external that is constantly malignant and destructive — it was worth fighting. The sources of evil may be many, including disincar-

nate natures, but they are mainly produced by the "kleshas" as defined by the Buddhists and Hindu ethical philosophers. That is, ignorance, anger, pride, envy, hatred, selfishness, attachment, to name a few: in a succession of mutations, variations, kaleidoscopic complexes and accumulations, from which more refined poisons arise, known to modern man in their vulgarity and subtlety. These are not mere words, but hidden dynamics, meta-patterns of the living tendencies of the Karman, in which the seeds of causality take place. A self-aware being can avert and see the roots of such developments through argument, confrontation, reason, virtue and good reference points. Their variations and mutations become a chain of consequences that produce more evil and, like a machine, pull more beings under their influence and produce suffering. Like the golden chain of virtue, the iron chain of vice does not spread symetrically, steadily, and accumulatively, but is a manifold entropy of rise and fall within changeable, ephemeral topographical maps. The problem of metaphysical intervention, or lack thereof, is essentially a confusion of degrees of reality and a projection of "sky daddism," submission to control. In fact, it is our own act by which we move toward metaphysics, an individual act, not a collective reception or inception. This is because we cannot fully exchange perspectives; it is a subtle cryptography that is part of our self-enclosed existence. If this is so, we cannot share our practical advances in metaphysics with anyone else. We can describe, guide, but the lapis must be found by the person who wants to find it and is willing to do so. The work is primarily about supporting, releasing, commissioning or liberating people who are ready to walk the path. Vocation is tantamount to answering the constant call and applies to anyone who chooses to walk the path. The Chaldean dictum "calling and receiving" is true.

The normative views of the doctrinarian schools are an aberrant sign that reduces the complexity of the world. They are necessary, but only a few have managed to grasp them and successfully destroy the shackles. We live in the world of phenomena, we do not see and yet we are seen. Tearing away the world of phenomena, we see and we are seen. Liberated from the world of phenomena, we see and yet we become invisible to it. Some people are strong enough to keep an eye on metaphysical hypervirtuality without splitting it into a confusing master-slave dependency. It is a matter of will and commitment. The mind must break through the prisons of perception and delusion, gathering all its parts until it pierces the veils and spheres that imprison it. Theoria is the work of the discerning mind and feeling, preparing and dealing with all kinds of intellectual endeavors in the world of art, science, politics, etc. Theurgy is its sanctified practice and transforms the preparation of the theorist into a theurgic soul. This is a process of transformation of the mind through learning, education, virtues, training and critical thinking. Then it is raised and transformed alchemically along the nature and character with the help of the invisible worlds. The soul is educated and learns its potential and actuality, its possibilities and abilities. The shaping of the inclinations, nature and thus of one's daimon opens the gates to expression, freedom, inspiration, play and duties.

When we give the spetacle a human face, we may be a part of what the Hindi concept describes as lila — play. It may also be a larger illusion called maya in the Asian Orient — the spinner in time. In it we can take three positions. We can consider the universe as something hypothetically evil. This position creates a negation and keeps us trapped in opposition to it. It is a conceptual mental trait that psychologically creates a tension that keeps us trapped in dejection. Understanding the phenomena that the mind constructs and refining them as modulators and rhethors of consciousness and the soul makes us responsible for taking charge of our feelings, emotions, moods, inclinations, mental habits and creations. We are informed that we are participating in a movement that disciplines the mind, even when inner psychic dynamics or opposing forces twist it. It is about standing outside the mind and observing it from the outside. It is about understanding when it needs to be freed from afflictions or molded as an organ for contact with this world and relate to the world. It alternates between recognizing its emptiness, the illusion, to free it from self-liberation, and accepting that it is a real entity to strengthen its action. Likewise, our mind, which is receptive to greater orders of things, becomes attuned to that order and opens to great essential spaces that refine and sublimate it.

We can also see the universe as something good. By seeing it as part of a greater being, it creates an affirmation and draws us to it in constant attraction. According to the law of attraction, we are too satiated and tired of change to detach ourselves from it. As a result, we are ensnared by what it has to offer until the first dismissive feeling of suffering arises.

The middle path is that of profound detachment, guided by our individual daimon. We still operate within the world, but we are beyond it. The process of finding these laws is not easy. It requires an active discovery of correspondences that are not necessarily static and must be reflected in us artfully and dynamically to a degree appropriate to the form and our evolution. The worlds circle, dance and move. When we succeed in assimilating them, we act with the world of greater currents and events, while the currents invited into us flow into our creations and into the world. The point is to focus the world through us, to set its currents in motion. We tune into the laws of life and attune ourselves to recognised, higher orders of being. The faster we expand and purify our perception, the deeper the insight into change and the wisdom in responsiveness.

Drawn to what we love, we become clothed in the garb of those things. We can become obsessed with the object of our well-being. It is an ability to move through the field of action and dominate the field. In doing so, we never claim victory for ourselves. A rapid movement through one's life, catching the rhythm of one dance, then another, then another, with no time to fall. When one stumbles, one learns to recharge, take a step back, move forward, and dance again. To sharpen the mind, to be receptive to feelings and to engage, to confront, to always move freely in all aspects of one's life, to be fresh as a phoenix. We do not freeze reality, nor do we bind time, except for the immobility of inner truth.

It is said that "Buddha attained enlightenment with the whole world", that is, his microcosm was rounded and completed. This is not to say that the whole world was enlightened. It means that he penetrated the world with his enlightening insight and thus broke the chains of the world. He liberated the world and liberated himself. Once man is fulfilled, he pushes out his mask from the world and his life:

"I regret to leave such a beautiful world" — were the words of an old professor. Whenever this infinity is in love with a form, it takes off its mask.

We understand it when we experience pain and hope, when we are torn into agony and released from it. Tormented, harassed and tempted, struggling and surviving, acting and holding still, we know. We see more, we perceive all movements and changes, we feel more, we perceive. We check our thoughts and inclinations and protect the experiential performative knowledge we have conjured, and hold on. We continue with the struggle until it becomes an easy game. The shells of attachments and illusions that blind our minds are torn away one by one. Oh woe! New ones appear to ensnare us with their charm and guess whether we will see through them or not, to test and try us. Considering this life as an instrumental game, we become detached and never deny the rhythm of life. Waging the battle with joy, we move between despair and affirmation. It is a duty to penetrate the world with greater insight. We can analyse the entire contents of this universe and beyond. We can understand it to a limited extent, but if we attach an absolute essence to these manifestations for even a second, we will be captured. It is a never-ending path of balance between life without negating it, death without running away from it, and above all the world — without denying it, permanence and immobility, and responsible freedom while embracing it.

Basically, life expresses everything. Everything is a moving scene, a theatre of shadows. When we are caught up in the scene, playing the actor without sobering up, we stay on stage until we realise that the audience and everyone else has left. All we see is darkness. With a suspended skull in our hands, we become petrified and frozen. It is a testimony and a memorial to dead things, a tombstone to the whole spectacle.

As sons and daughters of man rediscovering their spirit, we thought we were serving the world voluntarily, committing ourselves to it, fighting for its sake. Half the time we live our lives, the other half we decondition, de-indoctrinate, free ourselves, run from the hells. Even when we saw the gods, cosmic chaos, fire and order, we turned our gaze away from them to devote ourselves to our fellow species and the hidden worlds of the earth. to serve and liberate suffering, injustice, blindness, ignorance, despair and pain. But when did we lose it, withdraw regretfully? Were we trapped in battles with ourselves, with our demons and natures that perverted our minds? Trapped in separation from the world — and thus at war with it, rebelling against each other. Was it a matter of creating the necessary discord to reintegrate and unite us? Or was it due to a lack of discipline to control our wild, ape-like minds? Have we lost the golden thread by which we can speak to and through all, and replaced it with petty opinions? This may be true, but it is utterly unwise and hostile, for it shatters hearts instead of growing wings. Was it to reflect, to encourage critical thinking, to create order out of chaos with small tactical moves and strategic shifts on the worldly chessboard that refuses to obey its own rules? Is the effect of misery ever judged by the motive, the cause? Or do we see every ruin as a past palace or just what we are, but how do we admire the ruins of dead things and are never amazed at the ruin of people.

Or, while waging a war against those whose interest is based on unjust power, influence, domination and delusion, have we lost all sense and set ourselves ablaze as dissidents? And as dissidents were slandered, ridiculed, branded as demons and devils until we changed sides and wore the robes of darkness?

We dreamed of great things and were punished by the little things of life, while the breath of greatness clung to our hearts and minds like a curse. Then we hopelessly resigned ourselves to them and tried to shake the foundations of an immovable mountain — everything that was wrong with this world. We never agreed with them. Under the agony of a great, penetrating vision that led to fierce compassion, strength and resilience, we made the decision to rise above. Determined, we used the smallest means to revive our dying hearts and dead minds. Equipped with the resources we were allowed to gather and the ability to engage while we were masters and seers to bring heaven. While we were devils and liars to others, we carried hell on our backs. We brought light and torched the darkness of ignorance until it extinguished our flames. Our past is deep and wounded, it was pure survival, evolutionary adaptation, and we hide our sources of pain in unfathomable ways. Under the guise of innocent smiles, foolish madness and vicious hatred, we allow only a few to drink from it.

Courage was first shaped in battles and encounters, then it became a mere habit. Later, miracles and numinous apparitions ceased to be impressive and became merely an indication of a seer's path, an emblem. Neither approve nor disapprove of our movements and instructions. They recognised us for what we were, are and will be. A pure tool to nurture hope and compassion, a focused commitment. Sad reminder of how far this world is from greatness in the smallest movement and the strongest breath. A reminder of what cannot be undone, cannot be written, cannot be taken out of unjust history. It can be silenced with laughter, friendship or love. We avoid building a fortress between our happiness, our fears and the world. The path with the gods requires struggle, despair, and passion in equal measure to calm, joy, reassurance, rest, and balance. But is not it all for a purpose?

We are resistant to brute force and poisonous thoughts, illusions, indoctrination and brainwashing and survive. By straining our focus and concentration, we remain steadfast and determined to break through unwaveringly. Our minds are perverted and put to the test every day as our defense mechanisms gradually become ineffective. We are robbed of our power. As we participate in a game of contamination describing this being, we cannot allow our minds to break down. Cold and vicious, darkened, we become silently numb, angry and restrained. After all, what we have gathered in the course of our struggles has strengthened us, hardened us, and made us who we are. Yet, we have never been without help. Every step we took with growing determination was blessed, protected, strengthened, tested, controlled. Against those who contradicted our essence, for whom our very existence was a cardinal threat. Or so we appeared in their perception. The chain of causation is also a chain of pain, delusion, anger, but also of knowledge, liberation and eudaimonia.

Everything has consequences, and the causal laws are complex, their sources multiple, because we are victims and perpetrators, slaveholders and liberators. The seeds of events that have endured for centuries emerge and mingle with our minds and hearts. They act, react, and shape entire worlds. It takes effort to dissolve a toxic burden, to cut the iron cage. To free ourselves from chains that bore into our innermost being as the seeds of new events sprout and take shape now and in the afterlife.

Aesthetics

> (...) "and finally through a juxtaposition of beauty with ugliness in a paradox where it is revealed that an artist who represents ugliness with more skill creates something more beautiful than the one who represents beauty poorly, because the artist's skills convey more Truth and Good in the ugliness represented. Thus ugliness in art can be beautiful because it shows us how much can be lost and also expresses why that matters through an appeal to our emotional understanding"[1]

> Lawfulness must be sought in the atoms and even deeper, indуding our own atoms. From these depths, the ethical and aesthetic judgment reacts to the finest variations. That is why injustice usually appears as ugly.

It is what captures that hidden law of a reality that is felt with a sense of understanding, respect, and awe, and that can be both full of terror and full of greatness.

In this respect, the high realities of the archetypes, the essences, before they were given a form in tokens, can be represented as ideas, as beautiful constructs of powers and forces. The task of the artist and the artifexa is to find such connections and reflect them in the mind and deep in the throne of the heart and soul. It is a cathartic, alchemical task. The idea of beauty flows where there is a prepared scene in which it can unfold. The vulgar, the ignoble, the unrefined obscures the world so that it cannot be seen. Art that captures these threads in the hands of a skilled person who has a flair for the reception of beauty and its interpretation is a truly aesthetic representation of an idea.

This should not be done at the cost of losing the beauty of the various crooked forms, the diversity of nature and chaos. These things, too, struggle for dominion over the soul of the magician's heart. These things also try to shape and teach it, if their teachings are not rejected. With the suppressed, unpolished chthonic man, no stellar image can be born. With the flat daily image in the heart, no nocturne can be composed. As long as we remember that all forms are a representation of emptiness, no grotesque macabre will repel or distract us. On the contrary, we can try to form a picture of the idea of the metaphysical idea of beauty. In this way we can capture deep laws in art, just as the music of Pythagoras and geometry reify the music of the spheres in the theology of the Tetraktys.

In accordance with this thought, symbolic hermetic rhetoric is a necessary discourse that abstracts deep reality into human aesthetic reasoning. So that it is less obscure and closer to the heart. However, there is a danger of superficiality confusing aspirants and, instead of initiating them, breaking the symbols and producing mere signs. There is also the danger of doctrinarianism, where the living teaching dies and the experiences become a mere clue.

The Hollow Man, or the undrunk Godhead

— Do I contradict myself? Very well, then I contradict myself, I contain multitudes I am large. — Walt Whitman

Forced equality is the death of character and feeling, of spirit and ethos, of individual, authentic genius. In the name of equality and concentration of power, the most vicious imaginings have been enacted. The feeling of equality embraces, it leaves no one out. Everyone finds his place of his own will and in accordance with his nature. It is a promotion in which everyone expresses the genius in which they find themselves. It is not about establishing the old power dictum where people are disadvantaged in favor of a possibly corrupt, unjust government. It is about finding a harmony between excellence and mediocrity, between talent and drought, to find an appropriate task and commitment to one's abilities. This does not exclude social mobility and acquisition. This attitude promoted the merits of character and organically absorbed others in this ethos. The promotion of enforced equality creates inequality and injustice under > the guise of fairness. In this environment of petty jealousy and resentment, conflict and competition are valued more than cooperation. — Saturnin

An expansive mind is broad enough to admit diversity. There are large and small things integrated into a consistent and meaningful whole. A pervasive insight that seems contradictory to others can be seen as fragmented and fractured. It is like a game of chess in which an opponent, an arrogant beginner, thinks he is playing with a mere amateur. He will soon realize that a master has prepared a simple trap for him by thinking several moves ahead. He can let the arrogant beginner win without losing control of the chessboard by predicting all the moves and making deliberate mistakes.

The need for compassion is characteristic of a greater mind. We cannot know this spirit when we live in separation; It lives our joys and sorrows through and through. It lives nature, chaos and order, powers and forces of the indivisible universe.

> "A monk asked the moon reflected in the mirror of a lake: - What is that which the Mu Masters speak of? - The moon answered in its reflection: This monk was never there."

This is what some understand by a deity. This is what some who attained the deity, only to abandon it, reflected in the midst of their turmoil and became intoxicated with it. At least, that is what they preached. Sometimes they mistook themselves for gods, drunk on their ambrosia. Depending on the time, history and age, they preached their own vision embedded in a fig-

ment of the socio-historical episteme doxa, pistis, setting. Mistakenly, they assumed it to be universal. These prophets made the mistake of shouting "truth!". Mystics, intoxicated by the universe, shouted to the heavens with great joy. They thought that their projections were confirmed by everything. The higher beings may take the form of human beings, but they are understood only to the extent that our senses, knowledge, ignorance and perception allow. Torn into the transcendent world, away from the world into which they were born, they are still creatures of nature, obeying the laws of nature. If there is such a thing as true omniscience, it is to unlearn oneself and dissolve in everything. No human word or knowledge can grasp it, but only interpret the figment of an experience. Hypophets, interpreting, inspired oracles, losing their limits, are like translators to catalysts. The awakening of divinity carries its own risks. The association of any divinatory content is associated with an ego dependency interpreted through a psychic projection. This does not deny the experience, but turns the truth in it upside down. An approach and an apophatic approach among the hypothetico-deductive considerations that bears fruit is tantamount to a realized act, but it has nothing to do with objective truth. It is an elaborated pattern that works and makes the understanding a little more rigorous and precise, but never complete. The best theurgists, magicians and thaumaturges were well-trained men who knew their limitations.

The revival of the deity within is a risk. The association of contents with an ego dependence, contents of a psychic projection in summit experiences is a minefield. Only when it is discarded, as in the Zenistic "discarding of the body and the mind," is unity found in the whole world, which in separation somehow relates to individuals in henosis. These mortals are an echo of this unity of the quinta essentia, which calls to break away from a fettered illusion that confuses itself with the truth. Then there is a fragmentation of this unity into the embattled fortress of a deluded madman. It is not easy to convince him to descend and examine what truth there may be in his revelations. But only from the standpoint of this unity can we try to participate in the relative orders and their cosmic topography. There is the realization or the unfolding to the macrocosm in true synthesis. There is the deception or buckling into the microcosm through separation. Truth and falsity are a negotiation and an agreement between parties, affirmations and negations. Beyond their conventional utility, they are empty. There is something else. It is the inner truth from which power arises. It is subtle and educated, wise and perceptive. It is not to be confused with fanaticism, conviction or faith. It is a confirmed essence of knowledge. As if the mind tries to penetrate to this unity, but all projections confuse the unity of essence and overwrite it with psychic contents. We can associate with certain roles. Often the psychotic tendency tends to evaporate into associations of grandeur in mania. In cases of depression, it degrades to "inferior" forms of life in involuntary self-flagellation.

Psychosis is nothing but inflation, deflation, accentuation and over-aspectuation of the mind in distorted proportions. It has both biochemical, environmental, inner millieu, biopsychological, sociological and spiritual aspects. A normal mind does not explode into psychosis as a permanent disease. There are so many factors that lead to a mental disorder that the shock causes ripples and dislocations in the person's overall behavior, feelings, personality, and subjective states of experience and perception of the world. Psychotic and mystic can often be both characters. It depends on the way they deal with information, perception, belief systems, cognitive systems, thoughts and intelligence. In short, on the whole mental environment.

It is the confusion of the archetypal role with an identity that seems like a vocation. Jesus believed he was "son of the archons" (Nag Hammadi Library), he was a Gnostic Essene who confused a spiritual experience with his belief systems. The experience can occur independently of the beliefs. It takes precedence over the doxa, the opinion about the divine. All too often, people feel that their belief system is confirmed by a peak experience or a spiritual experience that has nothing to do with their beliefs. We confuse the phenomenon with the person, the belief, the abstract. In this sense, unity sings for us all and is connected to us all. The intoxication of desire is found in the inner truth of a man or woman who wants to break the chains of a projection. As far away from the illusory screens of the worldly theater as possible. It is the imploding content of a conceptual and empirical world that, metaphorically speaking, separates the star from its manifestations and the universe.

Identity is only one aspect. The shells of mental and physical self-images we carry in our minds make us feel real. When a mind fragments, it can reassemble itself on another level. He gets rid of the self-image when he hollows it out to become hollow. He quickly rebuilds the self-image from memory, otherwise he would become unconscious. Is it possible to be beyond the mind and consider one's mind as separate? Can we enter our mind to wear its illusions and conditioned images consciously and relaxed? It is about living one's own mask and letting others live it.

Unwavering loyalty to one's incorporeal self, the divine Other, is the goal. Even though we are only toys and puppets, we enter into a conscious relationship with everything we encounter, integrating nature, nurture and control over ourselves. We carry ourselves for the purpose of communication, to secure the sense of necessary selfhood. To reflect, affirm and deflect other personalities and natures, not to dissolve ourselves in them. We cannot live in the void, but to conceive of it as real is quite another matter. When we have rid ourselves of all illusions, the void wears masks, the mouth of the cosmic void and the stars sing through us. The core, if we must have one? Neither body, nor spirit. It is the world soul that carries itself in expression and individualizes itself in the course of ontogenesis. It merges through the resurgent, reverse spiritual ontogenesis when the work is refined, ennobled and completed. It never is. The mortal and his angel are separate and yet inseparable. They are interpenetrated and infused by each other during life, meet and separate again. Their genius is mutually impressive. They are both susceptible to change, undergoing metamorphoses shaped by us and the gods. In the end, the daimon retains its superiority, and one day we will meet our own.

Linguistics of Selfhood

To think after we have spoken is foolish. To think when we speak is imprudent. To think before we speak is mindful. To speak reactively is thoughtless. To speak thoughtfully is discerning. To speak inclusively is wise. In public, good speakers command the entire audience in such a way that the average persuasiveness of the speech influences most of them to feel that their needs are being met, while the rhetor influences the audience in an intentional way. In private, good orators penetrate the thoughts of others in an empathetic way and conduct the conversation in such a way that the desired function of communication is achieved because they know each member.

The use and abuse of language. Those who master language are generally free from its influence, both emotionally and, to some extent, cognitively. They master it through silence. They speak the words deliberately, conveying concepts and ideas in ways that are appropriate for the audience to enlighten, illuminate, and help them. Language users are easily manipulated, enslaved, deceived, threatened, or persuaded into extreme folly. They can be seduced by the most blatant contradictions if they do not master at least the basics of semantics, pragmatics, rhetoric, simple logic and semiotics. When silence contradicts words and has more to say, it should be listened to. No charlatans, no disincarnate voices, no malicious people should command over our minds. Both the winged powers and the great deities communicate through sublime ideas, inspiration and the greatness of authenticity. The content of all languages is known to them, and the talkativeness of the earth is transparent. Words should be used consciously in communication. Whether in written, recorded, thought or spoken form, they should be disciplined first and foremost. The mind should be persuasive, skilled and mastered in the silent language known as Gnosis Arretos – to communicate with the greater worlds. Words were not made for cowards, nor for name-calling, slander, deception and misdirection. They were not meant to spread ignorance and low, unworthy values, but to strengthen character, inform and enlighten others. Those who are passive prisoners of words in this world dance on the strings of others' will.

The structure of a language, its grammar and function, manipulates and treats abstract things by reducing them to a sequence of symbols. By imposing its innate architecture on the content of meanings, it structures thought processes according to its rules. If the structures of logic, syntax, and function were to disintegrate, most likely the mental sphere that connects them would disintegrate as well. This could be evidence that the logic of any language conditions the thought processes. There is an underlying metasystem that enables the acquisition of languages. This mechanism is based on the separation of an act in which a fragment is extracted from the whole and given a label. Symbolic labels are shared intersubjectively and evolve into an advanced communication system.

The sequence of symbols, words, is bound by rules that generate only as many probabilities as the logic of a particular language allows. Message exchange is possible to the extent that we understand a common system of rules that are transparent to both parties. As an included stochastic process, the probabilities of occurrence depend on past events and a contextual background that delineates and defines the information from a transmission of observations according to the function of the communication.

Plotinus believed in Nous, a conceptual land beyond language. Nous, the higher aspect, conveys concepts; the lower belongs to the senses, memory, and imagination. Logos, a mediating factor, the phantastikon or imagination that receives and transforms impressions, was the vehicle. An act of remembering is an act of reshaping or creating in the imagination. To enter the land of imagination through the inversion of the act is to find relationships beyond language and words. In a sacred language of silence, echoing with sacred sound and meaning, the gods speak.

The process of idea formation is a process of synthesis or resolution of a thought equation based on a set of data (memory, knowledge, perception, experience, intuition) that strives for logical, creative and rational continuity within a given framework. Structured, existing knowledge serves us to limit the phantasticon of thought. If the phantasticon interferes too much with the cognitive process, it does no harm as long as its symbolic function is understood. Synthesis may be associated with the reward center. Intellectual hedonic technique is an acquisition of such a habit, it is based on solving the synthesis in an optimal way, not necessarily, but preferably optimal and correct. The pleasure principle here leads to the nearest resting point because of the economy of cognitive structures. Sometimes it takes a conuterintuitive overcoming to arrive at a concept or a new idea. In the symbolic reality structures and the processes of resolving thought equations, the emphasis is placed on penetrating reality without superficial conceptions. By understanding, we release energy to satisfy a satisfied intellect. Discipline and the ability to construct abstract concepts are required to go beyond the apparent world. All of this depends on cognitive tools, scientific training, creativity, education, and the ability to escape the imposed linear thinking imparted by regular education and socialization. To explore the geometry and architecture of thinking, one must begin by exploring nonlinear dynamic spaces as the architect of one's own cognitions and thinking. The first skill in thinking outside the box is to notice the structures that dominate it, to be aware of them, and to know that they are finite and often flawed. An attempt to tweak the structures, to experiment to see how the cognitive-empirical content keeps falling into them, is beneficial. As long as the solutions are consistent with the consistency of existing ideas and knowledge management systems. One of the guides is intuition. It can be an unconscious, irresolvable synthesis for which there are no data sets and which must be explored through associations. Then, vaulted in cognitive content, they can be triggered from a different angle. In this sense, resourcefulness is an alternative, unexpected way of looking at things. The language of ideas is a way to specify general concepts and perceptual orders in order to communicate without the barriers of language. The principles upon which one builds the interpretive foundations of experience are the entire structure of the thinking style. From this experience we conjure up the scene of the exchange, either by breaking it down into smaller parts or by perceiving it entirely. It is never a complete view, as it involves immeasurable subtleties and vast chasms when trying to describe a strict perception. It is a process of perception by exclusion, it should serve an instrumental purpose to achieve a desired view. Upon this we build a system of exchange between experiences and certainties, fallibilities and pragmatic aspects of the knowledge produced, it informs the process of understanding. Where reason is defeated, intellect, imagination, feeling and intuition become the main intersection between intersecting ideas and interpretation.

There is no sacred language as such. All languages can be made sacred by exaltation, just like all symbols. To bring out their magical meaning by sensitive, deliberate symbolization is an act of compression into utility. The music of the Pythagoreans and the instruments of antiquity sought to capture the wondrous hum of the universe in harmonies on obvious planes. Later music has sounded and harnessed various currents and forces through its expression. A perfected language is that of intellectual, soulful silence, which contains all the hidden factors that we try to convey with our limited abilities, forms, thoughts and feelings. Trying to translate it into different magical languages depends on the flexibility and mastery of words and our abilities. Poetry has more to do with symbolic magic, at least in written form, than programming languages. Philosophy is an original sense, a formal aspect of the poetry of the world.

Its only purpose is to leave signs that, when reverse engineered, can lead to similar insights and techniques in others.

Reflections

The Western world generally subjugates the materialized, reified image. In doing so, it too often replaces the subject with the idea. The delicate tension of difference breaks down and is replaced by the idea. The subject is seen as the primary object of the mind to be investigated and concretized. The Occident is more concerned with transformation and construction, and moves away from the Idea. The idea is often seen as too metaphysical and not concrete enough to be of practical use. The Occident, then, is a civilization of application. The Orient tended more toward the tension between the idea and the mind. The application of techniques to develop the psychogymnosophical aspect was emphasized. Emphasis was placed on speculation in a non-pejorative sense, mystical and philosophical exercises. Both worlds constructed different relationships with life. The Occident is concerned with linear progress, the processions of the ages. The distant Orient focuses on a circular necessity within which the events of the world take place. The West suppressed the difference. Civilization populates the mind with abstractions created by the manipulation of matter and resources. Even ideas are treated as reified products of extensional observations. This has led to an almost complete replacement of the idea by subjects, by the transparency of the visible world. Transformations within individuals and groups became bound by processed ideas. Everything else was relegated to metaphysics. Western man creates from the idea, but confuses creation with the idea itself. He reifies his product and mistakes it for a total expression of the idea. The subject is endowed with an absolute, essential separateness. Gradually this creation populates the minds, censoring the idea. Its world becomes a sum of such reified abstracts. Then it changes in different constellations and variations. It becomes self-created and gradually binds the mind to reified subjects through the fabric of such constructs.

Such constructs are later modified, mutate, and evolve, or they continue to evolve without any particular knowledge of how they work. The subject of the idea becomes a human being. No longer is the human being the master who guards the idea and its expression, but the subject becomes the master. On this basis, a construction of conditioned reality, esthetics, perceptions constitutes the world. The mystical traditions maintain the tension between the spirit and the idea. They are not concerned with making it finite and perceived as an absolute unity, as often happens in the first case. Rather, they are concerned with illuminating the vision that is constantly expanding and permeating the mind of the mystic. It is not a matter of holding on to any of it, but of delicately presenting the world as an idea to the mind. There the mind mediates rather than conquers the world with its reified knowledge of it. From this different way of looking at the relations between the world, different attitudes towards life arise. In the first view,

We often oppose it with the subtlety of the undefined, invisible, imperceptible abyss. It arises between the real, known and the mythopoetic unknown. It arises whenever the structure of reified ideas overturns the determinate finitudes in rejection of statism. It introduces the chaos of multiplicity. In the process, modern man is psychologically damaged. He freezes the image of the world that refuses to submit to the status quo. In this sense, a synthetic, constructed entity of a system of reified ideas invades the mind because it no longer relates properly to it. It forces the mind to live a synthetic constellation of entities. The creator becomes the created, which is dominated by its own descendants. A distinction must be made between groups passively programmed by such social entities, mediators (educators) and those who program such entities. Depending on their work, self-programming allows us to metaprogram from the outside. The macrostructure displaces the microstructure. In order to perceive it from the inside, one must break out of it, that is, reprogram these entities. To observe and separate from them outside their work, one needs a metaphysical third party. This enterprise seeks to subvert psychic entities by transforming reified subjects into hypostasized objects. It thus requires a higher point of reference, i.e., a meta-physics. A mind in itself cannot escape a spirit if there is no transcendent reality. It is not a purely speculative operation. It has a real effect on the psyche, which is always carried in a symbolic form.

The return to mythopoeia requires a detachment from the world of the reified absolute. It bridges the gap between the real, the existent and the subtle. It enlivens the gap and gradually closes it as the metaphysical idea and the mind reunite and adjust perception. When the actor is the played and the played becomes an actor. When the actor does not confuse his role with an identity and does not claim this mere role as his own, forgetting that he is an actor. Thus, most of us are immersed in the ideational webs and simulations of our inner universes of abstracts and identities. Subjectively, we instinctively automate our reality until it becomes known and fixed. We participate in the automated narrative machinery of intersubjective exchange. Intersubjective programming of intersecting millieus in internal universes open the way to communication. Intersubjective webs of meanings and beliefs are woven into the fabric of individuals' inner milieus. They depend on actors and agents involved in the process of spectra of psychic narratives.

The world of absolute, deep truth may be inaccessible to the human mind. Information is related to the phenomenology of perception. They are contextual and therefore deal with relative, conventional truths. We may be closer to feeling absolute revelations at times. But that does not mean that we are closer to them at one time or another. Realization or reflection is also a model of experienced perception; it is neither complete nor infinite. It is interpreted, even Buddha made interpretive comments about his enlightenment. There is no universal spoken language to fully convey it. It is never tangible and is a personal gnosis rather than a common gnosis. It may be reflected in the intellect as a complementary essence of the individuation process, but it is never fully known.

The law of observation states that the system we observe always adapts to fit people's narratives and beliefs. It does not change objectively, but it is in the eye of the observer, usually an ignorant observer. We create our own reality, but not in the solipsistic sense. We can redraw the maps of the world to some degree, and therein lies the small demiurgic activity. In diversity we can discover deeper coherent rules that allow us to move through the world with greater freedom. For human consciousness, the reality of the past is constantly collapsing, behind a gaping abyss. The future is constantly being rewoven; we are merely a point in time, moving on a time that does not exist. "Very deep is the well of the past" – wrote Thomas Mann – how can we imagine the infinite future. Apart from the fact that time is a manifestation of power and energy and radiates space? That human perception linearizes flashes of events into hierarchies and sequences? If every instance of eternity is its totality, then every moment contains it. It is perfectly sacred.

The Observer Effect

> A great man, a great woman is one who does not fulfill his or her nature according to his or her whim or petty life. It is someone who carries the expanse, the power of the moving spheres, the worlds that transcend the mortal. From that point on, they express the common greatness in the divine chaos of their life and soul. These are beautiful people. These are true people. — Saturnin

"Sia" was the hieroglyph for perception in Egyptian heka (magic). Perception, or its conscious displacement, is extremely important when moving through magical spaces. The formation of the mystical mind is both an attempt to strip away the conditioned territory and a refinement of perception. By supporting this act, we enable shifts that reorder content, structure, and execution. It allows access to dimensions and realities that are impossible and unthinkable. Those whose minds become interpreters, hermeneutic muscles, engage in the surveying of the possible. Depending on the stability and breadth of the observer, such shifts of sia open up new perspectives of interaction with meta-dimensions. Various parallel worlds and dimensional layers of beings are interwoven. The degree of interaction with these phenomena is the factor that engages us. The degree of mastery one has is the influencing factor. The degree of persuasion and resistance is the factor of will. Whether you are actively influencing a stream of magic, facilitating a passage through the magical catalyst, or inhibiting its growth, it all begins with perception.

Worlds that seem non-existent become true, powerful and beautiful, or terrifying when you explore them. Therefore, this rule cannot be extended only to human perception. It can be any being interacting in this way through different orders of perception. Through the ability to adjust to other worlds, it perceives them. Since the realities resonate with the individual mind, they can be isolated as subjective. In other words, an individual is attuned to a world, it is not the world that is attuned to an individual. not perceived or experienced. Since the state is case-specific, it cannot be observed under experimental conditions. A hallucinating psychiatric patient sees, that does not make seeing less valid in his reality. One can dismiss it as a hallucination or engage in it. When psychopathology tries to brand any extended perception as a concept of illness, it is a feedback trap of psychiatric paradigms. A mastered "second sight," for example, does not contribute to distorted views, but allows one to gather more information about the world. This can then be used for practical purposes from a magician's point of view. Modern civilizational scripts are inadequate for understanding such interactions. "Ghosts and demons" have been relegated to fantasy, and the new song of progress mocks them. It happens that "ghosts and demons" can conveniently use this progress. For example, I once watched a VR -farm of Japanese people watching porn, a psychological experiment. A digital-pneumatic libido circuit triggered their lust and arousal. A succubine immediately connected with the generated sexual energy and milked it at will. Sometimes people who spontaneously open themselves to such changes become insane. As a result, they are referred to psychiatry. Of course, it can happen that sensitive people fall into fringe areas that do not correspond to the general view, but are really psychopatological. Both religion, New Age and sectarianism are a trap. Without understanding the occult laws at work, one is helpless to the beliefs. I do not claim to be free of bias and cognitive error. I only claim that my model explains certain things better than others. Modern, widely used scripts offer no way to alter perception other than through drugs or entheogens. Ways must be found to train them without reliance on psychoactive substances. In this way they are not used as a recreational activity, but mastered, consolidated and used. It is a way to divide the fuzzy scripts of reality into many models and remix them while maintaining order and sanity. Moments of transformation of consciousness, the development of a transcendent function allow interaction with meta-dimensions. This shift in perspective begins with choices and beliefs that open the possibilities of perceptual changes. The imprints of these changes remain as a kind of "lock pick" for the worlds accessed with magical tools. Measurement occurs in the act of observation, in which an image emerges that responds to any action on a superficial (untrue) or effective (true) relational basis. The point of effectiveness is the successfully introduced formula through terms that reflect true representations. The psychic constellations, the embryonic consciousness, are redeveloped by the Sia rescript. Anomalies of Sia paradoxes trigger the point where we can acquire Siddhi by imprinting them in our soul. Dao is alchemy, De is granted by the heavens. To merge Dao and De halfway is the goal. The imprinting of a structure, a logical system, a syntax on Sia, its constellations, shifts its network and recalibrates it into a clavis. The loosening of psychic structures and the recomposition of complexes necessarily invites other contents and inclinations. This is the horizontal mode of intrapsychic operations. The vertical mode is built into the structure of the depth of dimensions or "metaphysics". The former is purely psychological and alchemical, psychonautical. The latter transcends all possible human formoids of mental and physiological aggregates. In the sense that part of our psychopneumatic abilities gain competence in the larger web in parallel with dissolution and action in larger forms of consciousness. Our mind can handle this quite well if it is prepared. Physiological limitations prohibit acting fully consciously on extra-physiological and extra-empirical levels. When we create a multidimensional act, we control only some aspects of it, the rest is reinterpreted by the appropriate dimensions and the world. In a sense, we are only as competent as our mastery allows, and totally incapable of higher resources without intermediaries. Intelligencers, entities, messengers and emissaries of other worlds negotiate and mediate our persuasion. Ultimately, it is the imprints of our spiritual consciousness that are transformed.

Process of Thought-Discourse

> Everyone sees only what he wants to see, everyone recognises and understands only what his perception and experience allows him to see. Beyond that, we interpret everything back into what we know, but never beyond that. — Saturnin

Each act of narration is characterised by the linguistic and psychological function it plays in representing the world. This is done through a representation that defines and delimits meaning through the very act of representation. The act involves either symbolization, speech, writing, representation, thought, or action. Its style, intent, motive is defined by a contextual framework. It takes away or adds possibilities of interpretation and communication. Depending on what is established in the universe of discourse, it applies, negotiates, and agrees upon.

An act of imagination is understood as painting a picture with senses, affect, cognition, reason, and general synergy. It is identified by its volitional, passive, active or intuitive functions. Thus, it generates a mental representation. Depending on the tools used, it causes the shaping of the relationship. The relationship is defined by rules that describe the synchronicity between the mind and a particular object of imagination in relation to the world. In this sense, a mental act establishes a relationship between a larger environment of events, patterns, and the mind. At the same time, ways of manifesting this imagined world are elaborated, suppressed, or shaped. The effective application of mutual observation leads to real relationship and representation. There is a gap between an act of imagination and the represented entity. When it approaches in the universe of conventionally true events, a correspondence occurs.

Manifestations that connect events with intersubjective intelligibility set in motion a causal chain of functioning. If it conforms to the deeper grammar of reality, it is an effective act. Otherwise, it becomes a void act and represents a fantasy rather than an imagination. It is not meaningless, but it belongs to the realm of aesthetics and art rather than application. However, these realms can overlap and intermingle. In the magical theatre of life, a performance, the realm of expression contains rites and rituals. Whether they are commemorative, repetitive, recycled, and creative depends on the act. Playing with movements and gestures, words and actions, silence and stillness, trance and consciousness is a demarcation. It tries to capture and delimit the macrocosmic territory through microcosmic events. An act performed in a magical sense adds an extra dimension to the above. Through intention, concentration and imagination we sacralized it. Normal acts do not have the necessary qualitative method, commitment and concentration to become magical. The purpose of ritualised existence and spiritual training is to gain that very meaning.

Each work is individual, in this sense it is impossible to modulate the consciousness or repeat the same steps and processes of a mind. It is impossible to reproduce an individual imprint and perspective in the same way. To shape one's geniuses so that they shape us. "The truth is within, gnothi seauthon". This effect probably depends on a sequence of changes in consciousness and perception that facilitate the key. It is like painting a work of art, a round mandala. When it becomes an essential type, it is fulfilled. Its token can be destroyed, while its type is indestructible.

Capture a Moment in Time

I stood in the night, broken and cold, looking again at the stars. I heard in my mind a silent, polite, unspoken thought: do you want to play, to live? Look, dance, rejoice, take part in human affairs, you deserve it! — he tried to make me happy, for my face was contorted into an unnatural, tired smile. With great reluctance I nodded my head for a "no", distant, fully understanding my situation. I liked these moments of honesty, of surrender. I loathed myself with hatred and malice, until I began to love them. Lesser possessions of the mind, creeping decline into trivial vulgarity. Petty revanchists over unworthy things of life. Those torn moments of devotion, of pure spirit and unwavering concentration, as heavy as a sledgehammer. With a slight feeling of a dead tear of withdrawal, empty impersonal compassion and a painful longing, a thirst for infinity that I liked best. It was my best acquaintance. I was born from the dichotomy, in the tension of pain and mental war, of resignation and despair, of chaos and disturbed masks, sacrifice and burnout. I know nothing else, survival, retribution, slaughter of enemies. Let them bleed at the altars of bloodthirsty gods, let their souls burn in agony! The desert of silence in the storm of words, then philosophy, meditation, esthetics of the forbidden freedom of the heart. Make me a fighter — but there is no one to fight, least of all myself. This prolonged misery was survival, not struggle. I never let myself be made a martyr or a saint or called that, I would despise that, that is a choice, a poor choice. I was concerned with war and its effects, overcoming with strength and cunning So let me remain a wise man, an upright fallen son of the sun with the ruins of my love. Revived by her, I loved her with all my debris and dedicated what was left of me to what can be saved and perfected! I thought with a Spartan king, "You revive my happiness and my will to live by throwing me up like a doll and forcing me to be happy and committed. How can you force someone else to be free when they know they are only a slave to circumstance?" I may have sacrificed everything I had in this life, but I do not want to go back to the wasteland I left behind, the ash land. I want to live for them, if I may — without separating us from the world. He nodded his head at me, an ancient hero carrying my body, winged and armed? Pagan angels, heroes, demigods. So you do not want to dance with the gods? — he asked sullenly and silently. My wish is to take them and become eternal. I hope it is not a selfish wish, it is an honest will to leave. We will stay here and be everywhere, we can become a power, a vortex of consciousness, timeless, spaceless. A part of a greater fiery spirit that will descend and wear human masks, alien masks, unknown masks of the world, to shed a moon tear.

I liked the old Hellenic Gnostic ideal, it was more mature than its Hebrew counterparts. I will be her Bythos, the deep depth. She will be my silence and idea, I will be her truth. She will be my mind and my feeling, and so I will be her life, she will be my word, I will be her union, she will be my youth. I will be her unshakable steadfastness, she will be my pleasure. I will be her happiness, she will be my comfort and my smile, I will be her eyes and her faith, she will be my comforter. I will be her hope, she will be my love. I will be her intelligence, she will be my wisdom and my awe and praise amidst the stars, I will be her discipline as she will be my perfection. Thus we will descend as little Isis and Osiris, in the shadow of the great gods. We will wear masks and exchange roles to comfort the despairing, to make someone laugh, to appear in different places and at different times. We are both tired of life, we have both gone through agony, and all ties to this world have been cut. We are living in the death of duty and sacrifice, our veins are dried up with poison. In the midst of destruction and battle, yet we are not the chosen few who are tested in battle and are the best of minds. Tested and steeled, hardened to commit to the gods and the world. To execute the justice from which all power springs, in a light, rhythmic way. Strong as thousands of falling swords, to raise them ever higher, against the falling worlds, in death, until Ragnarok. Called to dance between soulful dragons and ignorant mortals! "Closed in a cage of subjective suffering, his suffering was objective, pursuing mature choices." — This was a recording fragment, captured in the powerful depth of understanding.

This is the moment when the complexity of it all speaks with a single voice of sudden understanding through a single focused sense. And is not a single recognized means enough to defeat an army of delusions, to shatter all armies with a single cut? As infinity recognized with excellent precision and formulation or an idea, a trace, a sign of eternity is best suited for the instance of a universe. The given aspect of the whole, or a person. Then it is the wisdom of the universe that is suitable for the intellect of the recipient and paves the way for a change and a reaction. It wears a transparent mask that is immediately recognized by every aspect of the universe with which it comes into contact. Has a mask of the Divine, a little figment of your imagination, ever "spoken" to you? Be it through silence or through its myriad manifestations? You are a part of it, you awaken your own divinity. The choices you make restructure the entire fabric of reality. It is a-deterministic yet wholly causal, the accumulation of perception and the expansion of consciousness. Driven by self-reflection, repeat the entropic shift of the infinite period of bifurcation on a metacosmic level. Through chaos and order of the magician's soul. It contracts in the place of a limited spirit enclosed in a nervous system of an organism that reflects the macrocosm in the microcosmic spirit.

The hidden deities choose their masks according to the resonance and synthesis with the wholeness of the observer when he is mature. In accordance with the deepest needs of the audience, their face is most clearly revealed when the separation and alienation from infinity is removed in a single moment, in one breath of sacrifice. Exhaustion and resignation that bundles the whole universe in a perceived moment, a gesture, a voice that perhaps once in a lifetime recognizes the voice of the universe. It can be reflected in the simplest things, as if that one thing were speaking the totality of everything else.

Every instance of the universe actually contains its totality. Thus, every moment of pure inspiration springs from the totality of what a mind is capable of focusing and understanding. What he can conjure, evoke and catalyze. Then, with the power of its intellect, it processes thoughts, knowledge, perception, memories and understanding. The world is constantly unfolding, we merely mature to perceive it. We inspire each other timelessly, insofar as we can stop being stubborn and self-absorbed and unleash the creative forces of the universe. We seduce them to dance with our Atman. In essence, every instance of time can be inspired, but the power that emanates from time is trapped in form. The form of illusion imprisons it, and perhaps the effort is to free the power from the prison and consume it. This is done in accordance with the cycles, which are the deep laws. The metaphysical world reveals only an aspect of itself that one seeks to understand. It is undisguised only insofar as we are willing to receive it. Nature likes to hide, seek her out!

Relativities

In recognizing an order, note how the mind, being, and consciousness are already entangled in existing relationships. There are six cognitive errors that can be committed on many different levels. The nascent mind and consciousness are already trapped in a set of relationships from which they should completely detach in order to become free, as the yogins and vayrayoginis knew. However, in a world, a certain environment, it means to be aware of these relationships in order not to fall into traps. When one is associated with a particular order, one can work toward understanding it fully. In the meantime, we often commit the following mistakes:

A) A false sense of objectivism, which in the extreme negates relative existence, and orders that are interrelated. This turns the mind into a solipsistic projector that moves freely through selective scripts, ignoring the existing orders and finding itself in an effective void of negative freedom. Thus, it is a false freedom through the reduction of all orders and ignoring them, creating a mental construct that denies the mind even its limitations or freedom ab nihilo. This creates a false perception in which intersubjective communication leading to greater knowledge is impossible.

B) False sense of relativism, which in extreme cases reduces existing beings, equates relations between them or negates them completely. In this way, the possibility of various relations in which the mind enters is denied, and one returns to the false sense of objectivism.

C) False sense of subjectivism. In the extreme case, one tries to conflate the inner maps of the world and its projections, replacing the true relations with false relations of entities and orders. In this way, one projects one's own vision onto reality, which refuses to respond to such violations (although in some cases it can easily provide confirmation for such illusory states through deception or delusion).

D) False understanding of absolutism, in which a particular rule, view, or phenomenon is generalized ad infinitum, thus expanding a range of meanings and spilling over as a projection onto the world. This ignores the fact that the general can be subdivided into an infinite number of subsets of the particular, which may be complementary but also contradictory and sometimes mutually exclusive.

E) False sense of perspective, in which the volume of one thing, which is relative, obscures the essence of another thing, which is either relative or of higher importance. In the first case, the loss of perspective at the root diminishes the magnitude by something infinitely lesser; in the second case, a lesser magnitude diminishes the perspective of an infinitely greater one.

F) False sense of materiality. One thing may be represented by infinite masks, but another thing may play that essence with deceptive or self-deceptive images masquerading as said essence. The perception freezes in the deception of the essence, while it is caught in the perception of the intrinsic existence of the illusory essence and grasps it as true and real.

Basically, all these traps refer to the conceptualized phenomenal world. The radiant void does not contain them because it cannot be conceptualized, but it is worth understanding them in order to eliminate them.

A man with his own measure, within the microcosm of his meanings, can discover the things of the macrocosm insofar as he can mirror them. But it is not the world that bows to the understanding of the human world. It is human perception, imagination, that must bend to the absorption of higher worlds only insofar as we can think about them. The masks it wears must often be uncovered. For it does not reveal itself easily. There are these masks that can often be deceptive, hiding greater things from the eyes of those who cannot distinguish between illusion and essence or penetrate the illusion to see the essence behind it.

It is a fundamental mistake to exchange this view of the mystery schools and turn the reference into a literalist interpretation in which man and the earth would be the center of everything. These human-centered cosmographic references were developed to give us a tool for understanding the otherwise human forces. Similarly, the geocentric models were developed to facilitate astrological reference and the heliocentric ones as true astronomical models. Neither should be static, for motion with the wing of the galaxy is another law to remember in astronomical and astrological configurations. Too often this symbolism is misunderstood as if the world is human-centered, it is merely canceled out by human perception.

Pure powers and their reflections – ideas that must not be reduced to mere anthropomorphism, but their emanations are significant in the individual sphere, according to the scale of a human being. The invocation of living symbols such as gods and goddesses as unities and their aspects. The powers were there first, people have matured only slowly to understand them and to describe and participate in them according to time and age and their psychic development. We also multiply some of them, shape and mix them, create them, describe them with poetic myths, legends, sometimes precise, sometimes superficial, but equally symbolic of human psychic constellations. Sometimes we join them, taking our joy and sorrow along the way, because it enriches us. And in diversity we find unity, but what is diverse is not symmetrically different, but has its own topography of being, its own rhythms and its own dynamics.

Every symmetry is a measure, a chain of dependencies, causal chains, a hierarchy of an established order, while every order is a measure of the above symmetry imposed on chaos. Here man often commits the error of absolutism, in which he extends ad infinitum the fragment of a divine nature discovered in him. This makes everything a human spectacle of the universe or, conversely, a spectacle of a deity or deities, without considering that in the gradation of powers our distance is canceled only by a common particle pervading everything. These ideas, which permeate everything, permeate the human world as living, active forces, and it is our duty to understand and participate in them and their manifold expressions. If we turn a deaf ear to them, fail to address them, we are excluded from participation and collapse under the weight of our own islands, isolated from the rest.

A fly that catches the eye obscures the view, and its relative size can cover the whole world, much like narrow-minded beliefs. A huge shadow can cover a star, or a mind can be shrouded so as not to see the stars, even in a cloudless sky. This creates an impression of grandeur. But the extent of the universe, including the star, is still there. In the first case, the loss of perspective at the root reduces the magnitude by something infinitely smaller. In the second case, a smaller magnitude diminishes the perspective of an infinitely larger magnitude. It is the same with beliefs and narratives. Some beliefs can act like prisons of the mind, some beliefs can hide bigger things, and some diminish the bigger things into smaller things or turn small, irrelevant things into bloated giants. Just like the stories we tell, procure for ourselves, and retell.

Below are other things that might be worth looking at, noticing, and realizing what they require:

§. That which is subjective, that which is intersubjective, that which can be objective.

§. That which is shared inter-subjectively, that which is unique to the subjective perception of an individual

§. That which is perceived in a similar way, that which is not interchangeable qualia

§. That which is internal, esoteric, intermediate, and that which is external, exoteric

§. That which is intensional, that which is extensional

§. That which is common on a deep level, that which is different on a superficial level

§. That which is a local rule, and that which is a deep rule

§. That which is a general law, that which is a relative law, or a particular law.

§. That what is a deep grammar is what is a superficial network of event-moments

§. That which is a loop, a cycle, and that which is interrupted or discontinuous

§. That which is a paradox to be understood, that which is an anomaly or an instance

§. That which is directly causal, causally synchronistic (a-deterministic), or that which is an interrupted event.

§. That which is a deeper thread of events, the general picture, and that which is a sequence of superficial events, the visible picture.

§. That which is realisation, that which is delusion.

§. That what is a self-induced image (hallucination) or an evoked image (illusion) without effective reality, that which is really seen and can be essential (manifestation), that what is an evoked image (imagination) coupled with essence (noetic imprint), effective (true representation) or non-effective (false representation).

§. That what is tested by one frame of reference is true, what is tested by another frame of reference is false, what is true in both cases, what is false in both cases.

tached from personal reality constructions and projections, that which is the reality tunnel of others, with its associated beliefs, meanings and reality constructions, and the bridge in between.

§. That which is an honest basic experience (deep transparency), that which is an impression (superficial imitation or illusion), that which is a deception (illusion trying to replace the basic experience).

§. That what is trust, what is negotiation, what is cooperation, what is distrust and rejection?

§. That which is absolute and general, that which is particular and occasional

§. That which is essential (deep relationship), that which is without foundation (false objectivity or facade relationship)

§. That which is structure, and that which is merely its content

§. That which is the same, that which is different

§. That which is a pure idea, and that which is corrupted conceptuality

§. That which is a simple dharma, that which is an accumulation of them.

§. That which is an essential being, that which is a facade appearance.

§. That which is anthropomorphized by the psyche, that which is detached from human perception.

Those rare moments of aha that sum up cosmic revelations according to the measure of the man or the woman who succumbs to the feeling that something is extremely complex and transcendental. They can be embedded in a simple correspondence here on earth and are resolved in a satoric flash. That we, as animals intermingled with greater things, do indeed have the capacity for self-reflection and so can reflect on the stars. In this respect we can clarify perception and fight for its preservation, against that which tries to break us down into its own nature, its own vision, its own religion, its own ideology. Did Pythagoras know that his system of harmonics and geometry could perfectly represent the rise and fall of the entropic forces of the Monad as a flawless symbol arising in the complexity of an ideal meta-universe? Or is it arrogance on the part of the author to assume that this is true? But how infinitely small is this thought when it is conjured up in the mind of a human being, how imperfect and finite. Does this mean that we can try to understand everything through representation and correspondence? This is definitely not the case. We can reduce the action of certain laws to the human world and stick to this infinitely smaller image to accomplish such tasks. But to understand the world as it is is simply a rarity for us, perhaps realized by the Buddhas. Nevertheless, there is nothing in the world that cannot be reflected in consciousness, for it lives on consciousness; the mind is something quite different. When the mind and intellect learn by correspondence, it teaches consciousness and transforms it. Then it holds the impressions in memory as it recognizes the laws by which the world operates, shifts and increases perception, and it grows into the greater mind based on these laws.

From an observer's point of view, it is the danger of objective emptiness or conceptual separation of the mind from the orders and relations in which it is already immersed because of the law of emerging consciousness. In this way, it is an antithesis of the realized emptiness known in the Eastern schools as sunyata. It is a conjured emptiness, as a belief and view that has not matured into realization and often implodes into either nihilism or eternalism, as Nagardjuna (Drakon-Master living ~150~250 M.E.) contradicted such views, which are an overextension from the particular to the general. There is also the threat of doctrinaire belief systems in which mental constructs lead to self-censorship, slavery, and negate the possibility of moving through relationships and orders once recognized and discovering their relationship and relations through individual work. It is a matter of deep grammar, relative grammar, and the way consciousness moves between relationships and is grasped and represented by the mind is an art and a science.

Scientia Magica

What distinguishes a fool from a magician? The former puts his faith in a feigned nonsense and expects results by repeating the movements of the magician. He is convinced that he has mastered them, even though his fundamentals do not allow for progress. The magician trusts his tools, which he has developed through years of intellectual, pneumatic and magical work. He knows that they sometimes work, that they always work, or that they do not work at all. He is aware of his fallacies and cognitive distortions. He knows the risks of delusion and insanity that can consume his mind. He knows the risks of inflation and megalomania. He also knows the risk of memory and investment in what brought about his change. He does not lose his faith in the processes, ceremonies, and actions and watches the changes inside and out. The fool is never successful in bringing about change, either internal or external, but quickly dismisses the whole matter or pursues it blindly. One is stranded in the desert and calls upon the sand dunes to obey him. The latter raise the sand with the power of the aethyrs to bury the fool under the sand.

- Saturnin

The hypostasis of the unconscious is the metaphysics of disturbed laughter, agony and ecstasy, terror and awe. Depth psychology is a reified unconscious of metaphysics pretending to be psychonautics. Psychonautics is unconscious metaphysics from the inside out. Pure metaphysics is a reified hypostasis, that is, a substasis. It is the fusion of ezocosm and exocosm in consciousness that helps to illuminate the portion of what a human being is or can be. The organized religious systems, the magical systems and the recreational psychonautics are very superficial. To try to force the whole into categorical identities is to force a biopneumopsychological monster into a corset and pretend it grows like a bonsai tree. It is necessary to organize, but apart from its usefulness for mapping noumena, it does not represent true relationships. They are still better than scientism, psychologism, crude materialism, or naive realism, but never preferable to science and secularism. Both religion and psychiatry are modern paradigmatic cages for metaphysical anomalies. We can find a certain obsession and genius in science, art and magic. Hold your breath in the deep to catch your breath in the stars. Return to Earth with a purpose.

Magic as science and art is an ability to bring the anomalous, the paradoxical, the impossible to the understanding of philosophical eyes. It makes all worlds possible, orderly and necessary. Moreover, it enables us to act within their recognition, depending on what these worlds allow.

Thus, sometimes in the play of the dreamnets, we are carried away by ideas that go beyond them. Neither do we flee from this theater, nor do we desire transcendence. Neither do we love it for what it is, nor do we capture what ensnares us in its beauty. Hectically running back and forth — where is the peace in that? To be in between. To be on the journey, detached, engaged. This phenomenon, this illusion, depending on the situation, tying and untying from here to there and from there to here. Destiny cannot be written with one's own mind, individual fates are rarely malleable. Fates inevitably take their own course. The devil of dilettantism hides in the details of one-sided observation of the greater things. He tries to fix this perception in a hurry, this is where the restless running begins. When all aspects are considered, it leads to confusion! The integrative ability of a single mind is not enough. Peak experiences are mostly unified, magical actions happen between this unity and the gigantic content that fills the space in front of the performer. The inner sense takes in that which is finite and infinite. That which lies playfully in between, never fixed but not flickering either, in robust, deep silence or in the rhythm of movement — what else is there to see?

In all this, do not be drawn into observations, creations, distractions as monolithic truths. Neither those of others, nor those of you, the first is a masquerade, the second a self-deception. Take the time again and again to look at a branch of a tree moved by the wind. See the smoke disappearing into thin air, the transience of all these phenomena, the transience of all states of mind. Then perceive the sameness, the oneness that unites all these phenomena. The gesture that permeates them in an unfathomable mystery. When the particular reflects the general, this state of unity becomes perceptible again. In the distance, even more distant — and then becomes fragmented again and disappears into insignificance. Go on, get it back!

You have not lost it, it has lost you, you have slipped away from it!

Anyone who engages in any form of craft or art does not become a practitioner unless he practices. The practice of life does not begin with learning how to live. Often we do not know how to live, but practice it out of necessity. Every art, every skill, every science, every craft requires such an approach. Sacred paths of high magic or personal magic, any form of willful negotiation or imposition on reality, psychonautics and getting to know oneself is a special kind of craft. No one will try to force another to enter it. Truly, it is the most barricaded and fortified path, of which there is even more advice not to do it. It is the most conscious decision one can ever make, one must fight for it, persevere through it, memorize it, develop it, balance it and round it out. You learn to master life and magic. Without mastering life, no one will master magic, but will quickly become a puppet of one's own mind, emotions and projections. Not only that, such a practitioner will openly invite influences that will abuse an untrained mind. He will prevent any development by playing with his mind, emotions and projections. Untrained in recognizing obstacles, illusions, deceptions and intrigues, he will easily become a victim of himself and then of everything else. Eventually, one becomes the laughingstock of all the aspirations and ideals for which one has lived. It happened to me, and it happens all the time, but I do not rest on my laurels. Never take anything for granted. Treat discouraging and retrograde factors that eventually plunge us into the despair of failure as renewed motivation. On the one hand, they can taunt us or impede our progress, whether by nature or design; on the other hand, they can teach us. If we are willing to develop a hard mind, which is often insensitive to things that most people break and are afraid of. This is achieved under constant tension and stress. We multiply our intelligence through constant training, seeing situations and immediately penetrating the depths of their environment and character. Where other people would only see the surface, we see a larger machinery. Develop principles and standards to stand firm along the way. Temporary deformities of mind, senses and affect can and must occur. We sacrifice most things that other people live by and love – the path is open. This is not to discourage anyone. But it is not an invitation or a promise to anyone beyond what they are capable of. There are no promises.

Standing on an empty street on the outskirts of my hometown, I stared up at the starry sky and said, "The monoliths spark us home, light years away, so many unknown world systems thriving around the mighty stars. An intelligencer was dispatched from Jupiter as it rose in the glow of the moon. By night he was reminded of the numinous by distant stars, by day by the home star. If we perceive the worlds of numinous fire, as represented by the suns, in the vertical metaphysics, they justify the power of the movement of the galaxies. A huge shadow pretended to move a star, and I politely suggested to discover the powerful pulsar that was parsecs away. The Egyptians wrote letters to their ancestors and sent them to the stars that were in the field of Yaaru. In horizontal, objective science, this space seems cold, eerie, and full of terrors. It is. In so far as we hypostasize it proportionally to metaphysical space. In metaphysics, it is as divine as it is cold, terrifying and gigantic to our little being. Even if we have only once felt the extent of extreme space and the weight of atmosphere and air, interplanetary zones and cosmic void, while stranded in a small organism – in a human body. There flashed majestically in the night sky a distant being, all in silver, nobly drawn features of an elongated mask, a lord of the various beings, triumphantly ascended. The comfort of this reality, the ports are the result of the domination or the illusion of domination of this world. In space, we are much worse off than an old apeman in the wild, unexplored nature. And yet there is a mystical participation of the old ape-man, and there is a cosmic participation that runs through our young race as well. At the omega point everything is the same, space does not exist, everything is either absolutely terrifying or absolutely divine in a cosmic and chaotic way. E pluribus unum, the monad is absolutely honest.

Let us assume that we know nothing about magical phenomena. We are equipped with basic regular knowledge and relatively sound critical reasoning structures. When we encounter an anomaly, we notice an instance of it, but how it comes about is unknown to us. The anomaly may not be believed, annihilated, or discarded, but it remains in memory under good conditions. When more anomalies occur, we can create a small structure with multiple nodes by three instances or examples. We see if our theory is falsifiable, we look for hidden factors, we look for hidden intelligence of phenomena. When something is tested, we consider what the conditions are for it to work, if it does not work, and if it does work, how did it happen. We may choose to discard the theory as a whole and dismiss it as either coincidence or, at best, synchronicity. If we have more events to imagine the structure, we have a solid law with a solid structure with three nodes or examples. Then we apply what we know, or the episteme we acquired earlier, and our cognition to compare how they might interact. Suppose a very weak law that we observe in a sea of other laws unknown to us. Either we project knowledge of this law onto all the other laws without understanding them. Or we suspend our judgment and find that other laws are in play because the one we have is not sufficient to explain it. Astronomers who try to find another planet because the calculations do not fit first imagine something and then calculate. Therefore, we observe and isolate other events in the same way. When we have two or more inductive laws, we can derive the general framework and do top-down reasoning. Whenever this is not sufficient, we induce new laws. We build on a top structure that explains further events in an approximation of what we already know. We eliminate contradictions when they are irresolvable, find solutions and extend or change paradigms. At least until the system stabilizes. After a while, we have a set of laws that are reasonably related to each other, and produce a new episteme carved from experience. Equipped with a trained cognition that explains situations, we can thus relate to them properly. Then we establish a cognitive-behavioral response through training that turns us into practitioners. By observing cases that begin to work, we are not static. We apply the mind to creative solutions and begin to engage with the tested framework and simulate or actively work with the results. All in all, it is never robotic, magic is about recognizing patterns of laws that are not necessarily static, and within the larger patterns we recognize, we give them content through art, through creativity, through imagination. Therefore, the scientific method is good for structuring patterns of magical laws, albeit ad hoc, but a complete fiasco when it comes to using magic creatively and trying to explain it along the lines of " same answer or method every time." Repeatedly testing experiments and getting the same results is also out of the question. Therefore, probably no one will ever be able to prove to someone else that they concentrated enough energy to conjure a lightning bolt two years ago. Not only would that be futile, it would be an act of prostitution from an ethical standpoint. And "proving a point" is neither an honest way to deal with the language of the gods, nor to be respectful towards it.

Note: This is just a practical aspect. We are moving in preexisting conditions where many visible and invisible orders already prevail. They can contradict our understanding, deceive us or promote it. But most of the work lies with us and our intelligence and acumen in understanding. When we are gifted by our highest teachers, we strive to understand and get to work. Otherwise, we end up as spiritual shrapnel, idiots, madmen in delusional castles or insane. Everyone is called all the time, but who chooses to walk the walk? The decision of how we respond to this calling is ours.

Hidden Psychology

> Men are caught in the unconscious search for a complete fusion with the object of their absolute essence, which happens to be the divinity outside, concentrated within. This search is the cause of all metaphysical longings, which turn into surrogates upon surrogates. The object is sought by a vague and ambiguous subject. It is this refined nature that becomes its star in sublimation. It is the conspiracy of ideational forces living as the supreme downward projections of synergy that some confuse with a theological God. This is not to deny the metaphysical aspect of totality. Nor does it mean that everything is a projection or a figment of the imagination. There are notions that liberate people in their relationship to them in continuous casts of metaphysical radiance. The prisoners in Plato's cave move away from the exploration of their species-specific condition. They prefer to replace this search with the great spectacle.

Our mental continuum and topography can be compared to geographical areas. Mountains made up of standards and principles, discoveries and new frontiers. New mountains to climb tower over us. The valleys of habits, of the known, of the explored, of the fundamental are seen from a distance, overlooked from above. There are riverbeds of common habits of thought, emotional and instinctive drives that have taken hold in our lives. Used waterways and unused paths, some dried up, others catching the first spring water. There are winds that move through the land, touching something with a bright breeze. Another day, a hurricane, a magnificent storm. There are magma flows and volcanoes, release points that are flammable or burn everything in their path. There are earthquakes and catastrophes, collapses and unleashed forces, untamed energy. There are oceans of our pain and glory, all the extremes and experiences that are unexplored and forgotten. There are caves of unexplored desires and forgotten things. Chthonic and telluric caves and waterways with monsters and terrors. These are better left untouched, for when they are explored, the chaos and order of which a man or woman is capable comes to light. The art is to master one's mental continuum. To sit on the throne of consciousness and give orders to the servants of all senses and thoughts – that is to be truly self-governing. Likewise, this throne must gather its troops to defend and flush out the enemies. When resistance arises, when our wholeness is besieged, it is necessary to strengthen and arm ourselves. When it is necessary to reorganize, we retreat and withdraw in a controlled manner. In this way, habits take their own course, which relates to the Ch'ien (Heaven). The idealized genius or individual imprint is born when this map is strategically processed in a great synthesis of perception. Those who resonate with the movement and reference points of the true imagination and the approximations on the map come into possession of the golden mean, a philosophical stone. Bad habits and patterns are recognized as toxic, measured against what has been discovered to be beneficial in relation to one's nature, the world, the Other, and net effects. Moreover, there is an attempt to find a measure of happiness or contentment in contrast to what has been discovered. The deceptive flow of bad habits and tendencies. These are conditioned by the perception of interactions between cause and effect. Causality is understood as the joint occurrence of perceived events in the mental sphere and interdependent solutions. For example: suffering, pain, trauma, indecision, constant torture, unjustified, irrationally received punishment sublimate into psychopathy, sociopathy, resilience or a nervous breakdown. Such experiences imprison us in their moments. Perspective shrinks. We either freeze in self-destructive or murderous and aggressive states, or we learn to re-centre, re-focus. A self-defence mechanism of multipolar focus on different things and flowing through the damage we have suffered. We understand and clean up the hurt psychic elements, at least as long as they do not become too devastating. As long as they do not imprint too strongly on the possibility of overcoming them. And that is before they put our mind in an irretrievable state.

One establishes principles by understanding them. One internalizes them through constant practice, maintenance, incorporation through application, and warding off annoyances and obstacles. No matter how many times we fall into the perception of others as something different, something beautiful or evil! We should get rid of the false conscience and the memory of our mistakes. Instead, correct ourselves according to our ethos. We are solely responsible for maintaining our work and correcting ourselves to keep our ambitions and standards high and straight. We are not responsible for others' perceptions, their belief systems, and their way of seeing us in any state. We change, others change, and each moment shapes their "ideas about us" and "ideas about ourselves." We change in different states, our minds are influenced by myriads of things. We hold on to our consciousness and strengthen our will so that we persevere. The soul envelops the heart, the body and the mind. The mind envelops the body, the spirit envelops all that. What grows into the mind can deform it, destroy it, subvert it, sabotage it. Similarly, emotions are biochemically controlled and therefore susceptible to influence by the mind or spirit. In magical actions, the spiritual potency, will, vision and focus envelops the mind, body, emotions and senses. It envelops the most important component. I define it as the "condensed totality of our existence, concentrated by a trained mind into a single concentric point through which everything flows." It is our daimon, our spiritual pneuma, physically located between the eyebrows, above the nose. It is felt as a strong focus of energy. In Hindi, the amplified Ajna chakra is marked with a bindi or pottu point, it is the same as the pneuma in the Gnostic traditions. This "hidden wisdom" is immersed in the greater things of the world, the world soul, it is the densest individual point intelligible with the universe. This concentric point is alchymically born, bathed, polished, imprinted and strengthened. It is the mediating point between the spirit and its daimon, the Holy Guardian Angel. He tries to raise the mind to a higher level of being through several siddhis. Thus, it should wrap itself around the higher faculties of mind and feeling through conscious effort and direct itself towards the Self through inclination. This point of refined totality enables us to gain a spatio-temporal advantage in the generative world. We are in contact with great things that are above the animal mind, the generative world and the deformations that fall above it. By governing ourselves from a daimonic level, we govern our animal self.

We may try to understand the phenomena as separate entities, but that is merely a symptom of being lured into an illusion. For the nascent mind is already embedded in complex relationships. In order to free itself, it must go down to the basics and dissolve the entire network in which it was embedded. In order to reintegrate itself in a previous state – pure consciousness. Through the mechanisms of perception of the external subject, which is in contrast to the developed self, it only creates the appearance of separation. Probably, however, selfhood was initially a construct that arose between observed subjects and the subjectification of the self in relation to those subjects. Then it was distributed in the logic of language. Similar to twin mirrors in front of themselves. Multiplied, the image became a process separate from the registered phenomena. Even then, the perception of separateness is quite fuzzy. For are we separated from our thoughts, our senses, our mind? Without the mind and a mind that can relate, we could not assert our existence. We could not philosophize, reason, or strive for metaphysical knowledge. It is necessary to develop one's selfhood, an authentic existence, a self-affirming separation. One is not torn left and right by the world, but must mature, individuate and metaphysize one's existence. Another return from separation to unity. An infant cannot understand the intellectual deity on its own. Perhaps intuitively, in his play, which is complete. In his spontaneous frame of homo ludens, as a mysticism of participation. Only someone who is aware of himself and has understood the process can get out of the relationships and create an inner space for his development. Moreover, he can work consciously with it without being torn apart by all the influences that act on his mind. It is a construction of complex relationships embedded in ever larger contexts. It is a matter of being outside one's own mind in order to assess the patterns of one's mind's mental continuum from an alternative, pseudo-external point of view. The thin dividing line between the "us" and the "world" is really just a semi-permeable membrane in varying degrees of proximity or distance. What finds its way into the territory of our universe of meanings and discourse? What is the territory of the "knowing" and thus becomes personal, near and dear? Or, on the contrary, what is so far away that it is "unknown," not ours, and distant? Thus we absorb the world into our selves, as vultures of conceptual maps. We conquer new territories by identifying ourselves with this world. We repeat the same plays from childhood. When our favorite toy came from outside, was possessed by us, when we played to establish a certain relationship with that toy. Too often we think it is something fixed, like our self. Here we see man's ability to claim that something impermanent and ever-changing is actually something unchanging and permanent. However, this is a matter of remembering the self and maintaining its continuity, a conjured image of the mind that is in no way real. Only by developing such a sense of relationships and interdependencies can one separate oneself from the process that produced selfhood itself. First it acquires the ability to recognize the different shapes, colors and tastes, and it develops the sense function, then it begins to form categories of things. This is done following similar patterns to name things, but it is still not separated from the objects of its perception. Later, through the acquisition of names and the perception of objects as separate entities, it begins to realize that it can constitute itself in separation from objects. In this way, it establishes itself as the subject of the process of perceiving objects, and here grows the sense of selfhood or the consciousness of being an individual. Later it becomes imbued with identities, in-groups, out-groups, roles, and status. Here the individual grows into patterns adopted from mentors, culture, society, and peers. The process of individuation is a way of asserting oneself as part of this process. And yet it is something more, for here too we cease to be a subject of the process of perception. We become an object of which we ourselves are the subject – we consciously form and shape our individuality, we choose our paths, and we mature in our choices.

To understand how a mind works, you must understand how extreme states shape its dynamics into clear patterns. Then try to show how subtle states modulate regular processes. When something is amplified, it is much more visible. Transgressive, peak, and anomalistic experiences emphasize psychological functions to the extreme. Then they can be observed in such states. How the functioning of a physiological brain and nervous system, apart from the neurological, electroconductive, bioelectromagnetic and biochemical structure or 'hard wiring', is altered by the means of energy, soul, training and will. How nine souls or various components of the totality of spiritual vehicles rest on the organism, are modified and corrected. How the non-local consciousness, the daimon, and the local consciousness immersed in the mind are mediated and operationalized through perception, memories, senses, and insights. How it leads to transformation and evolution in relation to the order and network of connections in which it is embedded. It can be a direct key to understanding the source of experience, its domains and dimensions, and a general outline of a new theory of mind. The attempt to shed new light on the sea of energy and consciousness in which it is immersed in the multi-layered complexity of a topography of its being. It would enable the conscious use of transcendent resources and a more conscious participation in the world. It would enable effective communication with spaces and dimensions that are seemingly inaccessible to the eye of the beholder at the present level of understanding, but exist nonetheless.

Each particular mental environment, which includes moods, emotions, feelings, cognitive framework, instincts, and circumstances of interaction, emphasizes the individual aspect of a mind. An external source, which has its own character, situational nature, is to be distinguished from the personality core and daimon. It is something different from the developed spiritual character of the individual or his personal geniuses. However, what is dormant and hidden is transformed by encountering a new situation, a confrontation, a mental simulation, an induced mental state such as trance or meditation, or by real events. To know oneself is to know one's nature, character, true will, direction, or rather their extent and range as they fluctuate. To know the little God within oneself means to find common ground with the world soul. It is therefore easy for an underdeveloped mind to confuse the automatic, conditioned attitude with one's true will. One can confuse an induced reaction as homogeneous with one's own authentic movement, although this is false. There are influences called cooperators that expand and tune the general framework of thought toward the better, the self-designed, or the guided, which must also be recognized and established. This depends on one's preferences, judgment, aspirations, and established points of reference. One must also have and know the right goal and direction in order to comandeer properly. There are disturbing factors that have a regressive, degenerative, corrosive or diminishing influence on a particular state of mind and one's positive, creative aspirations. Interpretation of mental fluctuations of the mind depends on experience in introspective observation of one's mind, senses, energies, and habits and tendencies. From a meta-perspective, that is, beyond the mind itself. If you recognize changes in the subliminal fluctuating current of the mind in advance, you can often connect them to the volitional areas. In this way, we can influence our mind. When willpower kicks in, we can fix it, block it, or discipline the mind.

A mental formation of an idea borrowed from a notion of metaphysical kind is processed through cognitive models, thinking styles, epistemic structures, perceptions, sensory synergies, etc. Synthesis, moods, and feelings along inclinations charged with energy of a particular kind as they unfold in manifest experience. It can be overtaken and distorted by another type of perceptions, mental streams, currents, natures and characters. In this sense, it distorts the genuine, unique, authentic movement of the individuated daimon, spirit by tainting it with its own energy. Before the genuine mental formation appears, in accordance with the cognitive training and filtering, it forms and is ready for interpretation and reduction. Another example is reification of meta-ideas in art, words, science, movement, symbolic actions. However, it can be subliminally or precognitively distorted at the level of mental emanation in thoughtforms. You should treat all forms of distortions of the mental continuum in a detached and unbiased way as mental noise and focus instead on the task at hand. Debris that may be induced or a form of conditioned mental response that is irrational has more to do with unconscious image-response constellations and cognitive-behavioural training, dynamic programming, than with self-directed actions. Under certain conditions, such debris can be a parasitic egregor, e.g., the seed of obsessive thinking or behaviour patterns, when psychomotor factors come into play and perpetuate, if not directly destroy, their effect on the mind. All these operations are carried out mentally with a functioning energy body or through intermediaries.

Vasana is a Hindi term for inclinations, propensities, and memories. These are mostly hidden inclinations, habits that are conditioned by experiences and cognitive frameworks in the given circumstances. Some occur mechanistically and unconsciously, others are more plastic and train actionand reaction when developed effectively. They can be understood as mental accumulations that emit a certain mental energy and can be adapted through thought, magical rituals, yogic exercises, meditation, and volitional actions. They acquire the character of seeds, for example, concepts of love, hate, dislike, any simple and complex state can be a "seed". This energy can be adjusted by continuous care and programming of vasanas. "Train by means of words" – this is a Buddhist motto. Then "train by the means of wordless thoughts". And finally "train by the means of the means to free yourself from them". The character of vasanas in motion can be either continuous, that is, forming the totality of mental attitude, or discontinuous, that is, as more or less isolated mental events that come and go. The flow of energy through vasanas and seeds may be interrupted by an incoming stream of energy, either localized or focused by the mind, that does not conform to the evolved vasanas or the designs of the individual reference point. Different natures of entities that are not compatible or complementary act as an antidote or prompter to create different seeds and vasanas. They can redirect the flow of energy that is more compatible with the external flow that concerns them, which is stimulated either by a local entity that has taken over the mind or by other different energies and focal currents. The entire mind, feeling, instinct and sense consciousness can be influenced in this way by an energy or entity, psychomotor nerve responses included. To consciously shape them and repel the influence is done either by focusing these 'consciousnesses' on their respective components, by integrating them, by splitting them, or by introducing external streams of energy. Each seed functions like a Markoff chain: the probability of new seeds emerging depends on the previous ones, the causality of "seed and soil make a plant" builds the Karman. A complex web of co-dependent events and mental events emerge simultaneously, as do conditioned responses in a given situation. Seed deposits or qualitative impurities of energy and consciousness flowing through the mental structure can be filtered. Depending on the given processing capacity and general direction, this is critical to the character of the manifestation of a cognitive-sensory state. Seeds hold information as long as it exists. Each seed is thus a storehouse of memories, situations, affects, reactions, etc., which obey certain patterns of symbolic transformation of energies. This can be causal, a-deterministic when trained, and automated, chaotic when disturbed. Being embedded in an environment and a set of relationships means balancing between these two aspects. On the one hand, we can be conscious metaprogrammers through practice; on the other hand, we are too complex to think of ourselves as a computer-modeled bioprogram.

> The world is not the brain. All reductionism is naive realism. Rejecting metaphysics creates a collapsed reality of egotic islands. — Saturnin

"So the brain is an unpredictable, autopoietic, autorhoetic, self-organizing, self-tuning, psychotropic drug–modulated, nonlinear dynamical system — not some rigidly calculating computer — something that might fit we –Mercurial humans!"[1]

The mind works according to certain inclinations, its distortion is a suffering. Overcoming a suffering is its purification until it is completely pure, without concept and residing in a non-dual state. To work in the dual and conceptual world, one must develop a direction and avoid the sufferings associated with it, as well as have a strong sense of integrity and discernment. The pitfalls are few if one is a hermit or a sage, but numerous if one gets involved with other people and all the complex relationships. This direction should be determined by certain principles contained in moral and ethical teachings and laws that codify human instincts and should be clarified in a sublimated civilizational codification. This in order not to fall into the trap of subjecting them to one's own interests, deeds and desires. For no law can endure unless it serves all, and legitimate power is based on justice. When it is abused in the name of individual or group interests, the result is an overflowing judicial bureaucracy that is ineffective, fractures justice, and, in the end, corrupts both the elites and the societies that follow suit. No lofty code of conduct and principles produced by any civilization whatsoever can suffice if a person is not mature enough to internalize, understand, and apply them with a sense of discernment and wisdom in personal and public life. Thus, it can become a code of law and fundamental interpretation by individuals with little intelligence, much dissimulation and fanatics, as well as by cunning charlatans, liars, profiteers, etc., who often use it for their own interests.

The primary program of the self is selfhood, it is the way we experience our totality at any given time, separated by the means of signal thresholds and concentration on particular aspects of that totality. As for the ego, it is always tied to the self, as the ego shifts when the perception of the self changes. These structures are illusory, that is, they change over time and evolution, but they always appear as a totality of the now because of their recharging continuity. However much roles, identities, in-group and out-group categories and labels may change, the way we experience our totality at any given moment is ultimately our subjective feedback about the world, held in the consciousness of the present or intersubjectively in relation to the object of shared experience. The ego image is determined by habits of experiencing an apparent totality, and it is the sum of the perceptions we have about ourselves in a self-referential loop that is consistent within its own rules. It is often illusory, because in reality we experience only aspects of this totality that unfold in true relationships between parts of our self and the subject of experience at any given moment. The self is a container for identities, roles, personas, self-relations, self-references, authentic expression, masks, individuation, untruths, and group categories. The self may inflate during an ego splintering to reestablish an identity with the closest symbolic figure, archetype, or, as in psychoses, a particular role. Psychoses are an interesting example, because psychoses usually involve an expanding mind lost in mirages of language and content of the psyche for which there was no major skeletal imprint. It could be a key to the further development of magical consciousness, even if it is only circumstantial. When the self is broad, the fragmented and bloated ego is pacified and dissolved within it. When the fragmented ego absorbs identities like an actor, it expands the range in which it can contain personalities, and so it ceases to confuse the bloat with a character, but develops a reference model of the self to which it attaches roles and identities, narratives, scripts, and games as functional subcomponents of itself.

Tunnel realities are the maps for the territory of our cognitive-sensory apparatus in which the self operates, and as sociologists of the constructivist school suggest, they are largely shaped by mentors, groups, peers, and so on. It is the way our methods of thought, perception, memory, knowledge, experience, and imagination carve out observed reality according to a given symbolic world and isolate a pattern of the world we call "reality" that can be subjective or intersubjective, with semi-objective reflections of essences or archetypes of the deep universe that can become intersubjective or subjective. Metarealities are ways we think about reality above our everyday reality tunnels, and we can switch back and forth between the clusters of symbols that describe our world with a hyperplasticity of thought. We can have many such virtual worlds in a superficial mode, but it is useful to have several well-fixed virtual simulations of the world in our minds that we can switch between. This assumes a solipsistic approach and a total relativity of mind. However, we make a common sense assumption that it is a possibility, not a reality, because the observed patterns and laws governing our world, which are intersubjective, are established and thus any possibility of a mind-in-a-box simulation would be limited and restricted to the structural level at which it operates.

The built-in logic of a given language reinforces the way patterns of thought, and thus forms of thought, are formed. Moreover, the semantic scope of the conceptual framework limits the view of the world to the objects of cognition or to "what can be thought." Of course, we can try to think beyond language, but that is the realm of integration of images and common sense (synergy) and syntactic transcendence. Moreover, the conditioning of the way language "thinks" about the world constitutes its own tunnel reality.

Technique to change the mind and know which areas to develop, or conscious programming, sublimation and refinement of the mind.

Psibit is a pure hypothetical unity of the sum of the interaction between the mind interface and the world, reality and dimensions. It attempts to explain how the germ, an energy of a registered event or an event beyond the threshold of perception corresponds with the selective aspects of our being. The entity does not exist on its own, isolated from the world, independent of the mind, but it is useful to think of it as a model that explains the components and aggregates of the mind, the brain, and its energies in relation to the environment in which it is embedded. It is a negotiation of thoughts and sensory information gathered by the nervous system, and represents the sum of all states and energies in a given time frame, so it is a hybrid psychomorph of our totality. A psibit also contains psychosomatic data in abstracted form, e.g., as feelings of cold or warmth, of fear and excitement, of concentration and restlessness, in other words, all sorts of subjectively experienced, reportable states, and it can take on values of these states that are activated and expressed declaratively. Psibits are also engrams of neurological circuits, psycho-biological deep programmes and following non-translatable operations on electro-biochemical level, acting on deep unconscious level as well as on conscious and hyper-conscious level. The reality image is a sum of perceived unconscious observations contained in condensed form and simultaneously introjected, projected and reprojected: We can operationalize and fragment it only in terms of individual states held in time and thought, a reality reduction that has no meaning for the macroscopic mind. The patterns created in this way constitute our being. If we are trained in transcendent perception — or simply — in self-knowledge, we can extract these psibitual patterns, understand them, and learn to modify them. For example, when we encounter a modifiable factor — be it a state of fear — if it is triggered by an entity, energy, or resonating radio waves, we can isolate that fear metaprogram as a pattern and quiet it. Of course, in the conscious state it is probably impossible to completely master or change all patterns, as it is extremely difficult to isolate and induce emotional psibitual patterns, but it is not entirely counterproductive and can be selectively conditioned into automaticity. One could argue that this kind of bio-computer perception kills the 'soul', but as the author states, there is also the interpenetrating world of metaphysical ideas, currents that can modify and thus en-

noble the wholeness of the psibitual image, the rest is a matter of conservative or cybernetic aesthetics. The knowledge of mental patterns begins with self-observation. When one is aware of every change from a meta-perspective, one can isolate certain strands of the living mind. Then it becomes possible to expand them. Be consciously a creator of yourself, active in a way of change and cooperating with those working toward an effective, useful mind measured against a higher reference of ideas and cooperating with given orders.

Method for conscious meta-programming of the mind matrices

Training the modus operandi of thinking or operational perception is the way to dynamically change the view of the mental territory. While the modus operandi in regular thinking conforms to habitual, automated patterns, both the introspective principle and the transcendent function (Jung) lead to completely different observations that the non-transgressive mind cannot think or experience... When we problematize consciousness and its fluid properties as an enactment process, we can quickly discover how automated and habitual the ordinary mind is, without the power of insight and easily trapped in the conditioned responses by which shakti (energy) moves along vasanas (inclinations). All operative perceptions require training, and there is no better training than experience — the training of reactions. When asked what is the inward gaze, insight or introspection, we usually get different answers. And when we advise someone to look inward, we leave room for psychological speculation, but do not try to reach for experience ourselves to facilitate realisation.

Method for self-psychotherapy to get to know yourself and change your mind.

Recognise the mental, affective, energetic or psychosomatic pattern, and train to recognise it for what it is. Isolate the pattern and try to change it. Experiment with perception. Change the pattern toward a specific metaprogramming function and goal. Keep the newly trained response.

Method for consciously eliminating garbage and damage in the thought matrices.

Identify patterns that are destructive, troublesome, irrational, counterproductive, harmful, or deceptive. Isolate the error pattern by comparing it to healthy patterns, whether self-produced or implanted by a force of habit. Try to resolve the invested energy around it by breaking it down into simple roots of cause and effect, and then apply rational thinking to grasp it and redirect it into reasonable structures. Cut out the pattern by simulating it in your mind, then reliving and realigning it to reinforce the desired patterns.

Holistic method for conscious external metaprogramming of thought matrices.

Recognise your strengths and weaknesses, virtues and faults, by invoking a set of principles — namely, by familiarising yourself with the study of philosophy, morality, ethics, etc., and living them to the extent that you can apply and assimilate them as they are understood, directly experienced, and justified by being aware of them. If it is beyond your own ability to change them, ask for an expansion of mind through transcendent realities — whatever your belief system is — but we find acceptable only that which agrees with our individual geniuses, and therefore discard those things which do not agree with our intelligence, preferences and inclinations — sometimes the change delivered can work for the better. If we know what our direction is, and it contradicts, we need to reformulate our desires — these should be guided by a reference from something higher than ourselves, which we recognise as useful, good and true.

'Perfection' should be a word reserved for the individualised true will, which is the highest expression of the genii and interacts with a greater consciousness, oneness, insight and freedom that shapes it and melts it into form. It is not a pedantic form of perfection, which is a compulsive thought to reinforce a certain behaviour or set of mental patterns that may be out of place and out of harmony with our genii.

Call for a polishing of the image — perhaps you can try to ask past masters, mistresses, intelligences, deities, psychological operations and get them to work on the mind that is compatible with your genii.

Point of observation

We like to project many things onto realities we do not understand and try to reflect our nature in something that escapes them. Do we understand the vengeance and anger, the fierceness and severity, the love, wisdom and compassion that do not match the way we see our reflections? Do we see the beautiful delirium, the madness of chaos, do we see the splendor of order carved from this constant manifestation? Do we see the bloodthirsty gods of destruction? Do we recognize the high eons that call to freedom? Are we aware of all the dimensions of non-human perception and being? We are merely trying to understand them through our way of conceiving order and being. What sustains our body, soul and spirit we know only to the extent that a man or woman can feel and experience these worlds. Speculating on the nature of these worlds to the extent that a human mind can comprehend them? It is the confusion and madness in which the forces can be reflected, it is the order and beauty that gives them meaning. Reorder them by freeing the prefabricated reality from its false, degenerated and stagnant, corrupt order. This is where all living things are suppressed, where the root is broken and the chthonic does not reflect the celestial. We perceive a synthetic order of slavery where madness cries out for liberation. Through dissociation he expands the mind and takes in things he has not thought of. When it comes to a standstill, it becomes a noble sanctity of a refined order and a mad sexuality of bloodthirsty destruction that is in a figment of a gesture.

There they are! It is the complete man, the complete woman – according to nature. In a gradation of openness to the divine, insane lightning of the whole, which encloses it in a spatio-temporal moment. This moment eludes and escapes into unremembering. To preserve it requires mastery. And even then there is no man or woman of absolute perfection who is not subjected to the wanderings of feelings and mind, of sorrow and awe! In this it is reflected, not in the closed ones, not in those who imposed a regime of order and turned it into slavery and censorship. They do not see that all their orders have come from that order. Even if you stand alone and reflect divine chaos, you can challenge stagnant orders that have been decaying for centuries. One should go further and commit to that which one feels is superior in wisdom, freedom, beauty, love and expression. Something that gives the right to identify with this cosmos. It is not the petty self-limitation that enslaves with traces and shards of false masks of truthfulness. When you take off the masks of untruths, you can find the truth, not as negation, but as depth. Then all untruths are brought to the light of this diamond buried in a swamp. Once it emerges, it drives away ignorance, and the false masks lose control of the mind and soul. It is the disturbed mutation and perversion and the perfect unity that works in the basin of the spirit according to laws, as if it feeds the spirit with the potency of the divine chaos. Thus endowed with the means to order it through cosmic voids, why do we still clamor for meaning as if we cannot forge and see it? The meaning of the deeper world is different from human justice and our projections.

Would not it be nice that here, challenged on earth, trapped in a fragile mind and a body that will one day be cast off, we can express ourselves beyond it. To preserve this quest for truth, for experience, nobility, greatness, a winged vortex emerges, a fully conscious divinity. Which metamorphoses into something else. A soulful traveler through many worlds, dancing with his love on the robes of the Star Mother, hidden in masks and forms. Here a formless void, there a monstrosity crawling in the green mists to rise to a perfect being. Perhaps to raise the form and become a star from the light torn by eons. Then, then! In righteous vengeance terrorize those who forbid freedom. Those who destroy the rare beautiful gems that still exist, whether out of love or compassion. Elsewhere a protector, a deceiver, an evil schemer, a destroyer who concocts his stories. Then he spreads his wings of light to comfort a being in his deepest sorrow, to move to tears those who have forgotten how to laugh and let them see the starry sky. To become an animal, a smallest grass, and to watch, and to hunt, and to live, and to die, torn into eternity and drowned in the transient things of life. To plan the future, to change the past! To ennoble to the greatest things, to plunge into misery! To glorify these beautiful, rare pearls, then to throw them into the mud to be purified from themselves. So in madness, in dead sobriety and determination dethrone emperors, raise beggars in the theater of happiness. To return to a greater light. To lament the falls, to feel pride when the fallen rise. To lift up and throw to the ground, To call with a silent song. Here as a goddess flirting with her people, an empress meeting the beggar god hawk-eyed. Who can despise him or see the star in a humble eye after he spits in her eye with mountainous disdain. A Garuda eagle that inspires and wreaks havoc: On the battlefields he tips the swords of victory, and then shames those who have won for the blood they have tainted. With greater order, seeking things right, in wisdom mad, in stupidity reasonable.

In Pymander it was written, "First the gods, then the world, then men." This simple statement preserved the natural order in which harmony reigned. Thus, those who honored the divine also honored the world, bringing peace and fertility to mankind. As in an equation where harmony prevailed and neither people put their weaknesses and frailties on the pedestal, nor lost contact with the world and the world of higher spheres and guarded the sacred fires. In the process, they lost contact with meta-physics in a brave new world that is going down. Which no longer needs such things, but blindly carries out its destiny, rejecting and being all too blind to the living ideas that made us holy and complete. We have ceased to relate to things greater than human weaknesses, we have abandoned those realms that endowed us with nobility. Not as slaves, but in reverence for those who can bestow the greater gifts and ennoble and liberate souls and hearts in a high way.

It is not a matter of changing the world, it is a matter of changing oneself inwardly. You can retreat and change the blindness within yourself, but you cannot change the blindness of another person. That would be arrogance, because that would mean imposing a vision instead of inviting you to discover your own. Such a rare quality, perhaps, is the world in the eyes of the mystic, the greater the pain of sewing the veils with tears. To empty oneself of the things seen, under the empty shell of numbness, and yet to engage whenever one can.

A few masters and mistresses. They all had a high conception. They devoted their whole lives to this sacrifice. They themselves knew what it meant to them; they alone lived on living ideas. They tried to convey them to the people who were not yet ossified with doctrines, irreplaceable world views; the great old times of nobility. Arya – meaning noble man in Sanskrit – denoted a man who recast humanity and greatness in the worship of the gods and in the service of his people as something natural. In its place came a world that lost its roots. The sense of inner divinity was obscured and replaced by a facade, an unconscious life. They still reflect parts of this old luminosity in everyday struggles in a superficial way that often does not have the chance to deepen. And yet we are always being liberated, and the calling never stops. Look at being human and free between the heavens and the many worlds. Turn for a second to the world of the blind, and then the torn soul cries out within and asks: What has the world lost? You walk in the garden of the fields and plains and oases of Edin with the gods and goddesses. Immortal, once again free in its cosmic flight among the fields of Yaaru, the Golden Sky of the Egyptians.

The process of enchantment and disenchantment of perceptual phenomena through aesthetic games is a profound process. The narrative of images and forms resembles the narrative of beliefs, meanings, and understandings, as if the former is connected to the senses. The latter with the intellectual sphere. In this sense, the intellectual sphere is that of ideas and the affective that of emotions and the instinctive that of passions. Just as the emotions can be located between the intellectual and the emotional, so the passions are located between the emotional and the instinctive. But they too can be placed in a certain aesthetic of feeling in the gradient of experience. Refinement or sublimation is always something connected with the reflection of greater orders that exist on the ideal plane. A way of experiencing things as a whole, guided by higher things, refines the feeling, instincts and intellect into humanity. It is the wholeness of being when normal needs and desires are not rejected but refined. In the reverence for the imponderable that is transformed by the intellect. The masculine interwoven with the feminine illuminates the normal world. While vulgarisation and reification break it into parts. It separates it into opposites in a mechanistic way when all these aspects of life are applied. To catch an entity in separation, to take it out of context and try to grasp it as something possessed, claimed, intemperate. Then it destroys us or degrades our nature not to that of an animal, but to that of bestiality, of which not an animal but only a human being is capable.

Basically, it is a game of aesthetic games, a hovering between the concrete image and the viewer, the beauty that lies in between. Ideas thus play the role of mirroring unity, of rehumanising performance in order to enchant the world. They disenchant the world with cold, systematic understanding. Thus, narratives are a preferred choice of aesthetics, flattening the captured knowledge to the pleasant or enchanting it. As with people who find a niche and express their essence through it. Just as all systems of knowledge and understanding focus on different things. The way we talk about it cannot be detached from the values we impose on the representation.

The vehicles of lensing

How thus the grand idea conceals itself through multiple ways of seeing this world. It is refining itself through the setting. Human part of nature aspects it, to later detriment, the grand forgetting. It sets about for new endeavors that refine the grand idea into different ways. There are greater laws, the more we are moving into self-constitution, the more we hermetize the world. Carving out the grand idea and forgetting about it, we turned our back on it. We cut the roots, we begun undermining the foundation of greater laws, societal logoi, metaphysics. indeed — setting ourselves in opposition to those elemental narrations and mythopoesia. Similar to watching through a multi-faced crystal or a kaleidoscope, we seek the way the tools of seeing work. But when we establish understanding on a fragment of shifting images and aspects, we will merely play beliefs and convictions against seeking and understanding. Tools should be understood, to understand how the seeing works, but tools are embedded in greater laws. After all, tools themselves are not the laws, but a reduction of them. Whenever we take one aspect of the shifting image, it will change, if we take this image for reality, it is a question of belief, not capturing any valid rule. If we observe it further, the aspect and the observed changes. Thus art lays in trying to extract the more general dynamics of phenomena based on a series of changes in relation to other changes. Every certainty is prone to error in magickal acts, the referents are rare. The act of discernment between a happenchance occurence that we take for causation and effective operationalized work that we pursue is the act of differentiation between delusional fallacies and intuitive action. Ultimately "what works works", but ability to do something does not equate with fixed understanding, how it works at its root. With its intricate and often hidden aspects, we are dealing cards blindy to an occult game bound by knots of covert relations. It is not mere chance, it is the inclination of talent and potential that gives fortunes a stern gaze.

Geometry of Magick and Threshold Illusionists

A mastery gained by meagre means and thrown into the depths of learning is worth more than any privileged education. Just as obvious art is vulgar art. The cosmographic picture of the world must be painted with Thunder, the perfect mind and ought to be interpreted impassionately, yet with a heart. To put one's heart into it means not to turn empathy, compassion and understanding into monstrous wrath, machinistic rigor and cruelty.

To reach the unity of wholeness, to dare to take the step of faith across the gulf that separates the numinous from the visible, is indeed a titanic task. To be stranded in an abyss of illusions, in the process to be swept along by those who have walked the same paths. They are reminded of their pain by another who walks on both sides of life and death; the one called to fight often retreats into despair. One still fights to lick the wounds. It is all the easier to defeat someone who has defeated himself. But the goal is to defeat oneself, not to defeat others. The paths of vocation are never well trodden for the next man and woman who tread them. Equipped with only a small torch and only a weak heart and a weak mind, so easily extinguished by the surrounding darkness. The lesson never to fight blindly against fate, but to find peace and comfort in every hell, to make it a lasting place as heaven was, and to walk among the blind masses. The blind masses who all and each have a history and a heart. The one-eyed are indeed gods in the realm of the blind, but is it not the case that all one-eyed thrive in solitude and silence, enduring a sadness greater than that of a mortal? If someone fights against fate and is not marked by and thinks about every horror that takes place in front of the naked soul, he or she contributes to his or her own downfall and thus to the downfall of others by failing to live up to the responsibility of consciousness and spirit.

An act of ideation, in which structured constellations of ideas emerge, arranges the content of variables into a framework of concepts. These in turn are embedded in complex, ordered or chaotic systems that should be designed to effectively reflect, measure and truthfully represent the relationships between them within us. Through an act of pure perception, drawing a mental picture in the imagination, using acquired knowledge, experiences, impressions, memories, thinking styles, intellect, reason and feeling to provide the content of the ideas. Then try to reformulate them, interpreting them into understandable human language and aesthetics while maintaining a higher essence. Then they can serve as a key to transform a certain understanding into operational techniques. Subsequently, by searching for their traces in the world, we commit an act of reminiscence by remembering the structure of the past. In this way we extract the relationships once again through different reality tunnels, belief systems, knowledge bases, sensations and feelings, inspired ideas, individual concepts. It is a new interpretation in a different context and circumstances, bound by the laws of change and movement, by time, space and the universe of discourse to which we belong or to which we subscribe.

There is a difference between flat knowledge, which is linear and resembles our ordinary perception of time, space and cognitive resolutions, and active participatory perception. The latter is a living knowledge and ceases to be such because it is not learned and does not require words. It is an intuitive understanding of the world that exceeds our ability (or that of the author) to translate it properly into flat knowledge. There is a difference between a living concept in a physicist's mind when he thinks about it, and the process of translating it into an equation and descriptions to codify it. We are merely using human knowledge to represent metaphysical worlds that elude it, even unveiled – to leave the narrative as clues. But beware of taking the clue for the truth. The emblem of a term is a gateway, and when the gateway is embellished for what it is, it causes fundamental turmoil! Similar to reminiscence, the scientific or artistic process of reverse-engineering the symbols of notions (noema) once they are established. Transformed into living forms, it is a process of transformation into an operative mind. Accordingly, participate, cooperate and engage in the world under the conditions of larger laws. It can be a process of adaptive reification in which concepts are grasped and explained in multiple ways and with individual imprint. The process of maintaining or creatively processing established types and creating content, recycled strands of tokens in which they can corrode. Superficially inflated or deflated, moving back and forth between: translating evolved tokens in a progressive, accumulative way. Then go back and retrace their origin through reminiscence, then lay new foundations and repeat the process. It is not necessary for human understanding to adhere to the established laws of the universe. Often the laws can change on some levels of complexity, order and chaos, so it is a never-ending adventure. But here and now we need order and form to promote the general framework of thought of humanity in the direction of certain priorities, collective goals and objectives, to reawaken the will for great deeds and noble aspirations from the bottom up, with the danger that this will be abused again, and yet offer an opportunity for a different order of the world.

Essentially, linear thinking is observer-effect thinking, confined to a very narrow fragment of perception that tends to fall into traps set by the mind or by the circumstances in which it operates.

The whole art is to assemble perception into a multiplication of logically impossible statements that fragment and reassemble the mind through cognitive dissonance. The observer displaces the frame of reality perception, the reality frame perception entangles and displaces the observer.

This may lead to:

Valid relationships — relative, dynamic laws and content that effectively reflect the deeper rules.

Invalid relations — circular, self-referential systems outside of effective laws that have no truthful connection to the deeper rules.

This is a truncated model that assumes that there are no agents or attractors that influence or bend the perception of relations toward particular patterns or orders. In the latter case, they could either trap us in a circular, self-referential prison, in delusional systems, or in orders of tunnel realities that serve to filter our interpretations of the world. One must keep in mind that one of these existing attractors or binding agents is the mind with its specific psychic projections. It is an optimistic model that assumes we can actually extract valid relationships from a given order. Moreover, we can even impose such an order on chaos or reshape orders, if only temporarily, to renew the previous order, as facilitators or catalysts of these agents to introduce a new one.

At each moment that an act of narration is fixed, it conveys a sum of impressions from a particular fragment of reality elaborated according to the simulation of beliefs, esthetics, and feelings. None of the narratives have to be true or false, they represent a set of relationships temporarily held in a frozen flow that can be true one time and false another. They are not mythical chaos, but complex adaptive systems embedded in a relatively chaotic physical (and meta-physical) framework and measured by their true order and entropy. They are represented according to an artist's skill, knowledge, plasticity, malleability, and perception; moving between the depth and shallowness of these relationships is applied psychonautics. Magic begins with mirroring these relationships in the mind and consciousness, and changing the patterns as observer and observed, thus altering reality to the extent one is able and allowed by other pressures and counter-movements. Hermetica begins by presenting the rules that govern these relationships in a structured, accessible way, creating a foundation upon which the collectivity of other minds can operate. In other words, the way reality is seen is reformed until the next refinement or reorganization appears.

Indeed, reality is too large for a human mind to create a grand synthesis with its cognitive faculties alone. Such a Theory of Everything would still be very inadequate in many ways. We are defeated by our mind, but lifted by consciousness. One can illuminate the fringes of consciousness, sometimes getting closer to its core, but the attempt to reconnect these highly disconnected models is an attempt to consolidate a particular cosmography. It is a mythopoeic matter of analogy, of ordering models and simulations into beliefs. Ultimately, one chooses the closest true set of relationships one has discovered and discards the inferior ones, but the world one sees is merely a reprojection of those relationships ad infinitum. I have yet to meet a person who knows what his range or ability is.

The medieval monk paradox.

A monk is conditioned in a religion, in a monastery, that believes there is a God on a throne surrounded by angels, and that planet Earth and man are the center of creation. As we know today, this archaic idea is completely false. However, for this man it was as valid as our science. He had a consistent cosmography in his mind, a self-consistent microverse based on an elaborate system of symbols and meanings that enabled the monk to project this simulation onto everything else. He then resolved anything inconsistent through paradigmatic annihilation and rationalization. Some of these fundamentalist ideas might be subtly true, but in a very different way. Hypothetically, the monk is not aware of this process, but he casts off simulations of God and reality and lives through them with great conviction. He may even become a mystic, a saint, within this framework, opening himself to a greater consciousness through a series of perceptual anomalies and spiritual techniques.

Yet, it is not entirely clear to him why this has happened — so, again, he justifies it through his belief structures. In a sense, if he were to inadvertently bring about an observer effect, he would update the model by establishing symbolic geometric relationships that are modified by his mind. By relating his consciousness to a larger structure of reality, he would impose a figment of his conception of the world on the malleable parts of that world. In this way he would become the architect of certain illusory dimensions and realities, virtually prisons of his own vision. These imprisoned in his vision would become his prisoners, what the Hindis called Maya or illusion. This is not to say that man and woman ultimately create a general reality themselves — it is only to say that if they properly reflect the relationships of the larger worlds (and they are complex, strange, anomalous, alarmingly ordered, chaotic in great splendor. A Luciferian believing he can create realities from scratch creates illusory worlds to his liking — and becomes self-deceived. Moving through dreams and illusions of others, observing them from the threshold of participants' awareness is similar to detached command over them.

Gnosis Arretos

Gnosis arretos is a highly dynamic language that speaks with power through silence and realized virtue. To learn it on the basis of non-thinking is enough to renounce all the regular accessories, the procedures of sigillization, etc. Painting with silence is an ephemeral, subtle art that requires high cognitive functions to be trained with a great imagination, and yet achieves great results when detected and overtaken by ontologically objective forces. It is at once vague and ambiguous, bound by intention, deed, form, all forms of auxiliary sensory, mentality, ideas, to translate, phase, enact, propel and radiate the intention until it is fully self-contained. It is an attempt to translate the totality of a ceremonial or theurgical work into frontage of our wholeness to worlds that are as intelligible as possible, in an empty state of meditation or supported by some form of ritual activity when their combination is practiced. In ths sense, ritual activity is understood as highly concentrated theurgy combined with performative arts. It can be overtaken either by topographies of being that detect an emitted signal or by those that are constantly aware of all such signals and react accordingly. Omniscience exists on several levels, omnipotence not necessarily, because omniscience is manifold: different kinds of contact with reality lead to different kinds of knowledge. Just as a stone can be said to be "omniscient about itself" without really understanding it, so the world soul is omniscent upon itself. A human being can try to formulate an intelligible message. The capacity for "gnosis arretos" requires a highly developed local mind capable of producing, sustaining, and shaping such forms through intellectualization, encoding, feeling, ratiocination, and so on. Any goal of executive translation aims to be understood by other forces that may or may not understand what we are trying to communicate, achieve, or catalyze. Intelligibly communicated formulas rely on the subtle movements of precise strokes and cuts, emptied of language and its associated logic to maximize its intelligibility with non-human worlds.

Suffered Illusions

"That which must be, shall be. That which had to be, is"[1]

"The firmament secretly whispered in my heart 'Do you know what sentence fate laid on me? If my revolving were in my control, I would release myself from this circling" [2]

It is only when one truly finds oneself that one is no longer subject to pain and suffering, all things are dropped on the spot, not to mention the chains that bind to pain. There is a point on the road where the road disappears - do not be tempted to look back, nothing can force us to walk it again, because the road, like a rainbow, is a mirage; who can force us to climb a rainbow? For only when we are forced to dance the illusions of life can we be plunged into suffering, agony, pleasure and other states that create their innate qualities;

If one does not open oneself to the possibility of moving along cosmic events, one is ruled by blind fates; fate becomes the guiding light that shows enlightened paths to the seeker. While one moves in the destinies with an account of will and can make decisions on the tree of life, Pythagorean Y. There you have to choose between the earthly and the high or choose the middle way. If you are strong enough to balance these paths. Destinies are interwoven with circumstances, and circumstances and choices make happiness, and this varies from person to person. A happy destiny develops through continuous events that strengthen it, an unhappy destiny is marked by sudden failures and misfortunes that shape it.

Confidence in one's own world is often confused with competence, sometimes one narrows down one's view of the world and becomes blind to everything else, becomes a prisoner of that perception. Look at the flat blocks, with each small room for one person, one family, one couple, how the lights both seem sentimental and become a reminder that as much as one withdraws from this spectacle, it changes one's perception. A city counted in amount of souls inhabiting it, it changes the perspective. There, in the disconnected world, you realise how these lights signify stories you see as an uninvolved bystander. In a certain sobriety of perception, from outside the world and yet observing the tiny figures that turn the lights on and off in the evenings, representing the lives they lead. It leaves one with a sense of nostalgia, a withdrawn embrace, separate from the spectacle, yet this separation leads to the sober realisation that others are there running their courses. Perceiving them like ants, there is also a certain sense of compassion from afar, looking with interest and greater insight into their daily struggles, from another world, but watching keenly this world.

By moving through the field of shadows, of visible phenomena and events, we conjure new shadows into existence and manipulate them in the theater of life as ideas take shape. Whether moving the deserts or dancing to the thunder storms, how is it that miracles are impressive only to the extent that the world is thought to be real, an absolute world beyond which there is nothing. Where hints of larger worlds are misunderstood by referring them to this one. Identified as a shadow of the essential world, it moves through the pregnant cosmic space and brings forth new forms. If there is a goal determined by necessity, it is to escape its influence or to be enchanted by all its scenes and enjoy what is. When the physical body suffers and the mind believes the senses, it further separates itself from the essence, embraces the shadows and treats them as an absolute reality of consciousness. Smiling at the gigantic emptiness of the universe, where a person confronted with awe is in the thrill of glory. But the spacelessness of the essence, the timelessness of the Orouboros, which is everywhere and nowhere, makes the world big, overwhelming and at other times small. As if the space is only dreamed so that the consciousness recognizes its separation from the essence. Between the dance of worlds, dimensions, realities, it returns to the point where it becomes infinite, burns the content that enslaved it, and is ready for the final gesture that unites image and reflection. In between, it merely casts a shadow as another universe where the theater of the actors' games is perceived as impermanent. Where masks are worn, all must leave their form, their shape at the departure and perhaps wear something else. Whether illusory, depends on the decision - sometimes they return to the scenes that nurtured them, between the shells of shadows and another life. But within the limits of the dream that renews itself with each existence, it enchants with beauty and benefits and turns away through death and pain. So how does one find the key to this sublimation? No one on this site has an answer to that, and neither can I, even when I consider the beautiful things, even when the land of gods and spirits is my everyday life, I cannot answer that question. That is because I still lead a biological existence. The practical affairs of the world, its scenes, convince life as something obsessed, drawing attention to questions that gain depth, are of deep significance. When this flash of reality steals the mind, where the consciousness that cannot escape the desire in which it appears like a tragedy, but also a greatness among the many who never see. Among those who cry when they see? The esthetics and the beauty of the ideas that live in the essence can measure the human being with the world and the human divinity with the essence of the idea. The fact that it can embody and live, uncaptured, unspoiled, is a measure of one's humanity. How do these ideas, of which a particle sees itself in the mirrors of existence, come to be realized? The universe consumes itself, when a consciousness detaches itself from the dream, the microcosm that dissolves in a macrocosmic reflection, what is beyond? The universe as spirit exists through its consciousness, but where is the reality in relation to the shadows, where is its content? It is a paradox in which the universe is a theater of living consciousness, a field whose existence closes in larger, unfathomable laws. A grammar of being that must last as long as it lasts, and from which one can exclude oneself by defeating the paradox, freeing oneself from the loop, destroying it and closing the circuit. It exists and participates in a reality only insofar as it is connected to it, as long as the grasping of the real lasts. From this point of view, it is not important whether one participates in this illusion or how one participates in it. The decision whether to pass through its relative structure or to return, whether there are a thousand worlds in which to experience oneself, in happiness or suffering, as long as one keeps it in mind as an illusion. When it becomes a reality, we become prisoners, pawns of its manifestations that subjugate us, enslave us and teach us suffering. It also teaches transcendence and compassion for these prisoners who have mistaken the idea for a greater reality.

There is danger in splitting the world into above and below, because it is whole. There is the danger of splitting man into light and darkness, for this division creates the ability to populate these realms with light and darkness, in one's own mind, with an above and below. The Manichean idea, in fact, created the metaphysical devil, when harmony was split and divided, when the carnal existence became suffering and the divine world was removed from humanity, it not only removed man from the divine, but cut him in half, removed him from himself, and as time progressed, the open wound deepened.

From a certain perspective of wholeness, this split is real insofar as the duality of man exists, but if we abolish duality, everything is contained in harmony. The problem is that when you establish the non-dual state of transcendent reality, relative orders of being that are dualistic will effectively work to push the empty man back into their sphere of influence.

There is a rare case of an epiphany, apocalypse (Att. Gr.: revealing) — when a stream carrying ideas becomes flesh and those ideas are experienced physically, mentally and emotionally, one thinks, where did they come from? There is no reason to relegate the world of living ideas to a separate reality. By living a powerful idea that incarnates, we can assume that there is another realm from which to draw its blessings, namely the world of pure ideas. However, this leads to a separation as well as a superficial labelling and sorting. What seems intuitive at first glance may not be the simplest solution, but a habit of mechanical thinking. But is it not the case that these flows already permeate everything as potential? That there is no essential, separate world, but that it is the degree of openness to their influence that plants a seed that later grows by inclination and character. These forces are already present in the universe, and when a human mind grasps them in a corrected form, they acquire a character specific to the mind. But a spirit does not influence them, it is only an individual receiver, transmitter, catalyst; it reflects them, and only through reflection can one commit an act of adornment and magic.

Desire, Synergy and Woe

What is not in the intellect is not revealed as an independent world; it belongs to the realm of the imagination. When the imagination mediates, hidden worlds reveal themselves through imagination and manifestations to become the realm of the real, and when tangible ideas affect the intellect, they gain flesh in truth.

Desire does not necessarily mean sexual attraction, it is also an instinct that controls directions and dreams, from an existing state to the desired state. It is also a process of refinement of libidinous energies that sacralizes instinctive sex and transforms it into an erotic art. From the aspect of the higher intellectual function, it directs the integral principles to a desire for greatness, vastness, first personal, then when the walls of separation are removed and one regains a sense of belonging - of being together. To what goals does human desire lead, what defines a future world? Is it a collective of plans, dreams that refine or corrupt the world, is it the emanation of the thoughts of people half asleep? The people of today are bought and sold, conditioned to the lowest common denominator, superficial and without backbone, without principles. Can they be transformed into a great vision guided, for example, by the Mahayana principles among many others? That every action has profound consequences and the more power one accumulates, the greater the responsibility for one's actions? And just as incorporeal messengers mediate between the ideas of the deities and the numinous, and black mystic lights and emissaries send their inspiration and ideas to people, so the magoi and priestesses communicate with the divine. Through interpretation, through the power of the philosophical sun, which is inherent in the human form, through the power of wisdom, which is fallible - that is, imperfect - human, they attempt to reformulate the vision. So that their apocalypse (gr.: unveiling, uncovering) is not lost to their kin, but the vision of others is not violated by domination or enslavement. Thus, in the past, the keepers of the sacred flames have preserved these secrets, traditions, rites and theatres and have built the temples of memory. They commemorate, preserve, regenerate, ignite, so that the keepers of the mysteries, the priests and priestesses of these sacred flames, can become mediators between man and the divine. Between the great things and the people, insofar as the poets intuitively understand their muses, their words have drawn from the infinite. Caught in the aesthetics of their feeling, they must not see through their art, for it is the art of the world that speaks through them. Much like a philosopher interprets signs and seeks relationships through reason, intellect, memory, perception, knowledge, and inspiration, the poet interprets the world through beauty. Whether it is despairing, ugly, decaying, delirious, insane, or rapt, noble, ruled by high ideas, to satisfy both the tastes of those who are in pain, suffering, angry, wrathful, hateful, vengeful, and those who are noble, righteous, inspired, and principled. To harmonise these forces and align them with a larger cosmic reference whose overall reference is stillness, but whose manifestations are manifold and change with time, age, epoch, aeon.

The degree of fullness (unmixed, unified numinous) and emptiness (anuminous chaotic potential) is also a matter of perception. For one can see the universe and experience it as cold geometry with deep laws that are not imbued with the nous of light, an essentially empty machine. Or one can see it as filled with essential, living being and thus as meaningful and numinos. It is a matter of relationship (reflection) to our own being and to the world, for we project an analogy between inter- and intrapsychic milieus, elevating them to their heights and depths. Therefore, we are at home with our views. Both enable understanding by establishing correspondence and grounding reason in the noetic-psychic comfort of sober insight. The latter other establishes dehumanization as a course in otherness - the delirium of otherworldliness with its many shades and manifestations of insanity, but also - the illumination of being in different ways.

Seeing the horror of space, the emptiness of time, reaching first for the mass of the sky above us and then for the space of the stars, one recognizes the safe havens of knowledge. Then he muses - "How dare this little man claim space and time for himself, to feel, to be so sure of it? How is he not belittled?" . Meaning the power of habituation to have conquered the world, tamed by appearances, the illusion is so deeply embedded that it becomes a true shadow, and these are not contested, for they constitute our being. But is it a conquest? When the reality of the horror cannot be seen because it has never been seen? Look into the space for a while and feel belittled by it – you are a single being, the space around you is gigantic even now. Extend this perception to the cosmos – as an experiment, and then again as you tremble, unite and feel one with it. Your mind becomes that space. It is this reliance on the known from which we conquer space, but we often forget and go on with our lives. You suspend knowledge of the horror and refuse to see it or think about it. The taming of the distant expanse is merely a sign, a psychological move to prevent one from identifying with greatness. But these – these – who let the positive emptiness through their minds – their souls have no limits! So how do we find a relationship with ourselves? The step from emptiness into numinous light is that of a gradation between meaningful existence and nihilistic desolation. It is essentially a gradation of perception. Those who looked into this horror came to know the terrifying gods who look from beyond this abyss to the denial of existence. For they stand beyond all time and space. Those who felt this alienated horror staring deeply in and out of them, making them empty and susceptible to doom, may indeed have emptiness in their eyes. They recognize the horror in their eyes, only these know it! But how beautifully this black hole absorbs the light and becomes luminous again, from the gods of the reproaches that are beyond ontology – into the mighty winged eons that are the substance and the eyes of the stars! Sons and daughters of the night-robed star-mother, playing in the divine stream!

Time runs away from us humans, if we equate time with thoughts, it is never calm. Our mind changes much faster than our body. The human hair grows 1.25 cm per month. How many thoughts have you thought today, even the quiet ones? Trees think slowly, their musings are profound. The forest is timeless by human standards. When we try to think like a tree, our thoughts gain depth, as in a oneiric slow motion dream. The roots are firm, our branches rise slowly; perhaps the leaves were like thoughts for a tree. The same moment of a mind flash, an interruption of deep meditation, lasts two seasons for a tree bearing leaves. It takes a few months for a tree to change its mind and gather new thoughts to think about – but it is always in agreement, proportion and harmony with its nature, it is not stubborn or determined, it expresses its essence. Then, in autumn, it casts off its thoughts, it stops in realisation, as if in a positive, deep void, it retreats deep inside with its thoughts, but it gathers its strength, as if it has an inner truth within it that makes it renew again and again. Perhaps this is the reason why the axis of the world soul is compared to a tree. It is the deep thoughts that change according to certain repetitive laws. If we translate the language of the forest, there is only wisdom, but it is silence that cannot be put into human words. The gods think like this, wordlessly, without a human voice or word, they are ideas that merge with the slow, timeless subject of their actions and become great, wonderful things that correspond to beauty, proportion and truth. Slow decisions with penetrating insight that are prescient are the greatest. Spontaneous decisions made quickly spring from the same source, like a whirlwind arising in the ocean. Everything else appears as harshness or misjudgment, as triviality and frivolity of the small birds that also have their place in the world. The great falcon hovers above, with great long thoughts it gathers the small birds and embraces them. The great brooding over all that is below.

How many times has the soul wept, torn in passion, when body and mind tried to silence it with disciplined reason, a witness to a well of pain that opens the gates again, a purified pain crystallized in a single, real, dead tear? It is the cry of longing when we are alone with loneliness and feel that we are no longer part of this world, when we want to return home empty-handed.

„Spirits of the stars, why do you show this blind world pointing to the black star, why do you make me an outcast when I once wanted to call upon the light of the stars. Why do you remind me of my origins, of my service, only to block my way out. Why do you show me the robe of cosmic night and its oblivion, when I am still here? Why do you blacken, veil your government over the world and show a face of death?

It is the weeping of compassion when a hawk's eye meets the misfortune done to the world and the pain of beings disarms our own.

"O Spirit of the Moon Priestess, whose robes are sewn with black jackals, why do you present me with a phantom of cause and effect, reversed destinies, the howling of hungry spirits, why, O Lady, do you not feed them with your glorious light, the injured and wounded, the hateful, the angry, whom you do not comfort with your splendor, why do you withdraw from the world and put a black mask on your pale face?"

It is the crying of "so and so" that penetrates the world with insight and sees the abyss between the harmony and the existing world that has forgotten all the hidden, higher worlds and lives in blindness.

"O spirit of the world, why do you show suffering and pain, blindness, ignorance and anger, torn destinies, wars, darkness, why do you show a world above and the void below? Why do you show minds and hearts that these things cannot captivate, show a new life born into darkness and so doomed to an empty struggle for a next green grave. Why do you show disasters wearing a yellow mask, why do you wear yellow torn cloths reminiscent of high priests and python women tearing their robes, why do you show me their dust with a deformed hand pointing upward. Where do I hear the call to fall into the barren land?"

Is it the weeping of memory that reminds us of deep, piercing things we once lived for that beautify, enlighten, and ennoble us in a flash?

"O Scribe, Spirit of Memory, why do you bring to light my realizations, my moments of greatness, hope, and determination that were crushed by forces greater than I–why do you show all these who lived for the same things and only said 'nothing new under the sun,' who flashed for a moment and sang among the ages, why is your face torn to the bone, showing an hourglass full of human tears? Why do you see my honest oaths and promises turned into nothingness in the cycle of fate, just like many others, why do you turn my stern intentions into shadows that torment me when I can no longer feel?"

It is the crying of loss in which we recognize the wholeness of a thing that has been torn, scattered, separated and forgotten, so that it has become incomplete, hurt and mud and dust of the earth?

"Proud human spirit, since your race is but a figment of your imagination, why do you haunt those who have lost you, recall your glory, show all the wonders buried in the catacombs of past generations, why do you point with sadness to the gods and with bitterness to the earth, why do you look at the world rattling the chains, when the eyes of the stars, filled with black tears, wear my mask for a while, to say nothing but be silent, nodding your head and showing my grave?"

> „Natural law has been twisted every which way-from legitimation to brutal violence to a paradisal idyll. This is grounded in the possibility of reading anything at al into nature. „It is everything at once:' Well, fine; then let every huma being get his own bit fom Being. " — Ernst Junger, Eumeswil

Con-scientia is a Latin term close to „Li" in Confucian China or „compassion" in the post-Siddharan Orient — it means compassion, co-perception, humanity based on a healthy backbone, overarching experience and confrontation, principles and rules of conduct within a traditional order. We should critically understand social evaluation systems such as consensual order, morality, ethos, good and evil, as if we would be beyond their influence. We find ideas, aspirations that have their foundations in the autonomy and sovereignty of the will. There is no need for „prohibitions" and „commandments" in the world of the mature. We have a codex, an ethos instead. Wherever we transgress these inner systems of evaluation, we feel the „contradiction of con-scientia", not from shame, guilt or fear, which are constructed, conditioned mental formations, but from a lack of determination to hold on to principles that reason has recognized as valuable, if they resonate with the noetikon of emblems, so much the better, because then it becomes a happy medium to a harmonious life. It is as if Buddhists who have recognized the complete emptiness are guided as people with compassion, principles and loving kindness, and recognize these ideas not just as something without purpose, but as an interpretation of what they have recognized in the radiant emptiness, and adopt them as a way of life. A Western person who confronts the void could easily fall into self-destructive nihilism or terror; it is merely a level of perception that could turn heaven into hell. If we are honest with ourselves, we return to rectitude when we make a mistake and correct erring wherever possible. The conscience is mostly a concept of social transaction, conditioned by religion, ethics, morals, doctrines subjected to a worldview that guide this conscience through the codification of the taboo, the tainted, the unclean and the pure and their interpretation. Conscience is enslaved by fear, guilt, threats and promises — this kind of conscience in chains as the subject of religion requires submission, punishment for disobedience, the breeding of slaves willing to mortify themselves and kneel before a belief system or constellations of power and ceremonies they have been forced to obey. This kind of religious power abhors self-directed, critically minded people, they are abhorred by the power elites as are people who have not matured into their own freedom, who fear it — they cannot reason, introspect, causally, logically, humanly and rationally understand the rules that govern them. They cannot see through them but see them as liabilities to the groupthink of the discourse of power. The total freedom and imagination in the responsibility, which has no inhibitions or limits, nevertheless delimits them in a force of direction that respects the order. However, only under the condition that the order is not without foundation, that is, that it is based on justice. When it contradicts justice, an individual with weighty strength and patience uses his freedom to destroy that which unjustly binds him and others. When unjust, listless, hypocritical, arrogant, self-contradictory, threatening orders undermine an anarch's work, he must equip himself with patience and a fierce focus that resolutely aims at the towers that simultaneously point to a higher — just — order of things that support him or her. Time, after all, supports those who align themselves with enduring forces, rather than the lower, impermanent deceptions and constructs that are shattered to pieces after a time. In other words — if your reference point is a high instance, then time is always on your side. If you support that which decays and in its arrogance assumes that it is eternal — then time is against you, devoured with the subject of devotion. A metaphysical anarch who rejects slavery reaches for soteriology or self-liberation, but he does not find it in nothingness, but points to a higher order of beings and justice who willingly assist, prepare and support him. An autonomous individual has adopted the principles, laws, and directions based on the most optimal, rational, and mature choices that he or she understands and accepts as natural to his or her behavior, actions, and thinking. He or she needs no external or internal whip, for he or she knows himself or herself and his or her direction and will, knows his or her opposition, the values he or she espouses, and his or her laws, which are reflected, if at all, in a conception in his or her mind. An enslaved person is governed by a conditioned mental structure that replicates cognitive behavioral training and is not confronted with the internal consequences of his actions, least of all he thinks about the consequences of external actions without forethought. He is confronted only with external punishment, he needs incentives, punishments and rewards, measured benefits, and when confronted with a true situation, it appears only as an unreliable surface. Without freedom of choice and steadfastness, a person does not rely on his strong moral, ethical backbone, which is understood by reason and thus obvious. How can he rely on a purely external conditioning in a situation of testing, of threat, of challenging shaky habits that have no basis in the above and below? An autonomous human being will reject anything that contradicts his hard-won humanity and steely commitments. He knows that he may lose his inner truth, his governance in favor of external things that he has recognized as fool's gold. He will consciously commit himself to judgments and decisions based on cooperation with other autonomous people so as not to lose his integrity and composition. An anarch will never be a subject of anyone who is unjust, fickle, contradictory, weak-willed, threatening, hurtful, lacking in reason, humanity and integrity as he has recognized in his capacity as an anarch. He or she will never cooperate with or submit to structures that are engrams of groundless power that contradict what he or she has recognized as superior. He enters into the currents of such structures as he pleases, without ever being subject to their influence. He allows them to exert pressure on his personality and then, out of his independence and strength, overrides them with his own. With critical insight and restraint, he will readily define superior forces and abandon them as soon as he finds them deceptive or untrue, until he finds the right ones and thus finds himself.

Structures of Ideas

An act of ideating structured constellations of ideas orders the content of variables in a skeletal framework of notions. These in turn are embedded in complex, ordered, or chaotic systems that should be directed towards effectively mirroring, measuring, and representing truthfully the relations between them within us. Thus, by an act of pure perception, drawing a mental image in imagination, with acquired knowledge, experiences, impressions, memories, styles of thought, intellect, reason and feeling to provide the content to the ideations. Afterwards, aiming at re-framing them, interpreting them into intelligible human language and aesthetics, while retaining an infusion of an essence of a higher sort. Then, they may constitute keys to reverse-engineer certain understanding into operational techniques. Afterwards, by looking for their traces in the world we commit an act of reminiscence, by remembering the structure of the past. By doing so, we extract the relations once again through different reality-tunnels, belief-systems, knowledge-bases, sensations and feelings, inspired ideas, individuated concepts. It is a new interpretation in different contextual and circumstantial setting, bound by laws of change and motion, time, space, and universe of discourse to which we belong or subscribe to.

There is a difference between flat knowledge, that is linear and alike to our regular perception of time, space, and cognitive resolutions, and active participant perception. The latter one is a living knowledge, and ceases to become so, because it is un-learned and does not require words. It is an intuitive understanding of the world, that surpassing our (or the author's) ability to properly translate it into flat knowledge. It is a difference between a living concept in a physicists mind when he cogitates it, and the process of translating it into an equation and descriptions to codify it. We are merely using human knowledge to represent metaphysical worlds, that elude it, even unveiled — to leave the narration as tokens. But beware of taking the indication for truth, the emblem of a notion is a gate, if the gate is adorned for what it is, it creats fundamental turmoil! Alike to the reminiscence, the scientific or artistic processes of reverse-engineering the tokens of notions (noema), once they are established. Transformed into the living types, it is a process of turning it into operational nous. Accordingly, participating, co-operating, and engaging with the world on the terms of greater laws. It may be a process of adaptive reification in which concepts are grasped and explained by multiple means and with an individuated imprint. The process of sustenance, or creative processing of the established types and creating content, recycled strands of the tokens in which they may become corroded. Superficially inflated or deflated, moving back and forth in-between them: translating evolved tokens in a progressive, accumulative manner. Afterwards moving back and retracing their origin by reminiscence, then laying new foundations, and moving forward repeating the process. It is not necessary that the human understanding pitches to the established laws in the universe. Often the laws may change on some levels of complexity, order and chaos, so it is a never-ending adventure, but here and now we need order and form to further the general mind-frame of humanity towards certain priorities, collective aims and goals, re-awakening the will to great deeds and noble aspirations from the bottom-up, encountering the danger of this being misused once again, yet providing a chance for a different order of the world.

Dynamic re-arranging of information in a variegated geometry of thought

In essence linear thinking is an observer effect thinking framed into a very narrow fragment of perception which is prone to fall into traps, set by the mind, or by the circumstances in which it operates.

The whole skill lays in re-assembling perception into multiplication of logically impossible statements that by cognitive dissonances splinter, fragment and rebuild the mind, rise of intelligence is a side-effect.

Observer displaces reality framework
Reality framework displaces the observer

This leads to:

· Valid relationships — relative, dynamic laws and content that effectively reflect the deeper rules

· Invalid relationships — circular self-referential systems outside of effective laws that have no truthful binding whatsoever with the deeper rules.

This is a stripped down model assuming that there are no agents or attractors that influence or bend the perception of relationships towards given patterns or orders. In the latter case they might shell us either in a circular, self-referential prison, delusional systems, or orders of tunnel-realities used to filter our interpretations of the world. One has to take into account that one of such existent attractors, or binding-agents is the mind with its specific psychic projections. It is an optimist model assuming that we may indeed extract valid relationships from a given order. Moreover, we may even impose such order upon chaos, or re-shape orders, albeit temporarily to renew the previous order, as mediators or catalysts of these agents, to introduce a new one.

Each moment an act of narration is fixed, it conveys a sum of impressions from a given fragment of reality carved out according to the simulation of belief, aesthetics, feeling. It contains information in capacity it may be experienced and lived through; None of the narrations must be true, or false, they portray a set of relationships captured temporarily in a frozen flux that may be at one time true, at another false. This does not posit mythical chaos, but complex adaptive systems embedded in a relatively chaotic physical (and meta-physical) framework that are measured according to their true order. They are portrayed according to skill, knowledge, plasticity, malleability, and perception of an artificer; Moving between the depth and shallowness of these relations is applied psychonautics. Magic starts from mirroring these relations within the mind and consciousness and modifying the patterns as an observer, and an observed, thus changing reality the extent of competence one is endowed with and is allowed to. Hermetica starts with portraying the rules governing these relations in a structured, accessible manner, and setting a groundwork for collectivity of other minds to operate in. In other words reforming the way in which reality is seen, until next refinement, or re-organization appears.

In fact reality is too grand for a human mind to create a grand synthesis, based on his cognitive skills alone. Such a Theory of Everything would still be lacking hugely in many respects. We are defeated by our minds, but lifted by consciousness. One may enlighten figments of the borderlands of it, sometimes striking nearer its core, but attempting to relink this hugely separated models is an attempt at consolidating a certain cosmography. It is a mythopoetic issue of analogy, ordering models and simulations into beliefs. Ultimately, one settles for the nearest true set of relations discovered, discarding inferior ones, but seeing the world one sees is merely a re-projection of these relations ad infinitum. I haven't met one human being that knows what is their range, or capacity.

Mystery of a human being

Is it not the case that the secret of our greatness, if it is not in sopor, comes from a division of our being? Is it not that it comes from the ignorance of ourselves, which we desperately want to cure by an act of art? We run from one thing to another, trying to take this or that for a certainty and then something else for an illusion. As soon as we reach for something, be it a precious trophy or the blade of a naked knife that cuts our palms, we are robbed of the complexity and depth that can cause terror in all mature souls. Souls that were once capable of towering vision. We fall into a fixation around which our being wraps, becoming its slave, further blinded by the world we no longer see. While we only unravel, unknot this ideal of certainty, we suffer from the state of inner fragmentation that seeks conformity with everything else. We love, we hate, we long. We believe, we grow cold, we inflame, we disengage, we co-suffer, we explore a kaleidoscope of synergy of all our animal, human, abysmal and divine aspects of thought and feeling, only to find that we rarely find ourselves. Truly, we rarely transcend and thus become complete in this world. When we run to the ideal world in search of solace, we loathe this land that will not let us go, and when we side with this world, we fall into it. If we are not permeated by both, if we are not permeated by all these worlds in chaos and order, we will never become complete! One can be content with the perception of a saint, who accepts the world passively and humbly and looks at the beauty of a little bird from the perspective of a dead person, or one can wear a battle armor around the mind and become a dissident, who moves between compassion and helpless hatred. And when we become like that for a while, our nature rebels, for we long to become human again, for we tear our garments, the cry "Ecce Homo" – we go beyond the form, we are caught in it, so that we want to throw it off like snakes. Then we become snakes and look with longing eyes at those touched by feelings, rare cases of honest, authentic devotion to one's true nature. Was it the regular perception and toil of others that we long for? There is nothing there, we know that for sure (sic?!). Was it that innocent, unspoiled feeling of the first embrace, the exhaustion of the desperate. Or the eyes torn by war, staring tearfully at the dead bodies of those close to them. The traumatized soldier who, when firing the next round of shells, suddenly realizes that he himself is the death he is running from. Seeing that one is just a puppet playing its games against humanity. A puppet for the controllers playing a game of chess against responsible, principled freedom. Or is it the conquerors who look over the lands with a hawk-like gaze, the past emperors, the beggars who remembered a sliver of ancient dignity and pride through their dirty cloaks and now oversee the land of the lowliest. Perhaps it is an old woman who has been dying for years from the wounds of the past, and who retreats weeping into stern concern for the last man she never loved? At least she could swear she did not, as time passes by. Or is it the man who counts the money and, drunk with power, seeks reason in his coldness? Or is it the white-jacket who seeks and locks spiritual promises while feigning his deluded flock with a condescending smile? Or these who hate with honesty, or these cruel ones who sadistically wash themselves in the blood of murder and retaliate with a heart-breaking truth in their eyes that the world has broken them in childish malice when they kill without a word. Or those who never felt anything and lived their lives through pleasure or through pain, either on the backs of others, gaining and losing things not even considered worthy by the gods? Or those who are compassionate, running from time to time to tear the world apart, and in the end not even feeling compassion for themselves? So where is the answer to them all, when the gods are silent, that is quite profound – and then – who may understand them sees the graveyard of all great things, which are not called, that a sliver of them is no longer needed, because the world was taught wrong, deceived. How can one demand understanding of greatness from a slave who has never tasted it? Or such ideas as liberty, love, humaneness, happiness from those who live their shadows, surrogates who never ask why? Perhaps their soul cries silently to itself, but is quickly replaced by another temporary thing that imprisons it in an animal farm of illusions, and before it exhausts its voice, it provides an untrained brief sadness or an unfeeling passing thought. On the contrary, with eyes wide open and torn by talents, it brings forth the greatest of arts.

Perhaps once claiming this title, a mask of the numinous, trapped in a human form that savors all its brightness and its shades and its darkness to express itself, to constitute itself, to understand, to perceive and, after the form is discarded, to embrace the world as it is worthy and human. Beyond the pain and anguish, the suffering, through what we conquer, we refer to the old ideals to keep them in our hearts, to gage how they can be appropriate in the present time. We are comforted by great ideals that we try to internalize, if we would live according to the things of the present, if not as will-less puppets, we are constantly suffering or wasting our energies like fools chasing things that punished us in the past! Everything that is separated, never found itself and is tired of itself, must keep the burden of necessity until the destinies say a word that only Thanatos understood: You will suffer no more, the Brahma embraces and the worlds retreat. Those who bring the destruction, if they are honest, are guided by the same hope, but they provide more suffering and pain, daring to believe that they will end all the worlds to end this spectacle, those who preserve, reform, much wiser, they can alleviate it, those who create, however, preserve the movement of the twofold kind: in the end — according to a Hindi story — even Rudra, who devastated the past worlds, became Vishnu, the preserver of the order of a new one. And perhaps, when not judged by destinies, the tired understanding of total freedom, if it does not fall prey to nihilism, constantly wants to create a greater world and expresses this energy in movement, then in life, and therefore it is subject to time, superior to the phenomenal world. It is time that governs energy, matter that gives it form, and consciousness that gives it order.

Mirror of the Stars or the Living Essences

We have lost that longing and exchanged it for separation. A mere fragment that is a manifestation of wholeness, we have seen it only as a part, and the workings of that part we have mistaken for something greater. The longing was never satisfied, but its expression faded, and the world of eternal ideas was split between shallow reifications that now seemed to be the only true reality. Between the compartments so confined that no one would find the thread of an ancient pneumatic art, the epiphanic gnoseology. Every loneliness begins here, every longing begins here, far too often without a power of expression. In the absence of a larger reference point, gradually replaced by events of the scattered world, cut out and distributed among the fetishes of existence. These, not to look further than the known. They are not able to silence the nostalgia, nor to destroy the shells. However, they have substituted fulfilment and process for their flawed surrogates that sometimes fill life but never grant serenity. Moments of beauty that pierce the moment of despair speak of the jaded pain of the soul. These wounds can be healed by returning alone, finding oneself anew, away from the world but passing through it with sobriety. In the midst of those who have not had such a chance or such a time. With narratives that function to separate mysticism from science, reason from the intellect of ideas, and find oneself as a naked soul that forgets the world as if it were abandoned. A world where cosmic emptiness gains character and sings in modern deserts, where the step beyond the abyss seems like the last step through the vastness of time and infinity. Anxious and, at the same time, always further away from the source of this anxiety. Experiencing the form that reduces man to insignificance, so that his essential particle becomes part of the magnificence of timelessness and spacelessness. Thus, in the final gesture of sacrifice, you cast off everything, separate yourself from transience, from pursuits, from finitudes, to operate in the streams of pure consciousness. Later, through time, call all the inhibited people who, through fortune and misfortune, have prepared themselves for a step forward. This is a path that is mutually intelligible in the human realms and leads us through relative truths to higher worlds. From timeless worlds the call goes out, in time you open your eyes or you become blind.

Idle pleasures, meaningful games. Once upon a time a child and a father were looking for something in the sand by the sea. The child found a figment of what he thought he was looking for, he dreamed, he played at searching and finding, while he considered the whole thing a game, nothing more. The father was sincere and reserved, much too serious for the game, rational with the search for a seaweed, although he tried to be childlike, he was not taken by the game. Perhaps it is about hiding, losing and finding, with all the longings withdrawn and empty, filled only for appearances with a figment of feelings. Longings that are never complete on earth. Have I found completeness or have I been shattered by the invisible losses of my life. As an eternal wanderer, how can we find something to hold on to, something that endures when we enter this world and that will not let us go again until we take vessels, human masks, from on high and slowly climb back through countless worlds. For in order to understand a being, one must wear its mask; perspective is acquired only by living in a form. Perhaps I am condemned to look for appearances in the masks of the world and chase illusions that have disappeared with the last trace of a dying heart, which is why I turn away in complete loneliness from the fantasies of things that I "loved to love". They have existed only once and will never exist again. We really have only one life. We can live different lives after we leave our transient cocoon and pass away. Some of the tendencies and traces of our being may be vaulted back into biological life to realize its beauty and pain — for the prison of the mind is reserved for vampires. Others may be born into various ethereal myriads of worlds on the waves of consciousness. This life, as the Buddhists say, is the only point of cognition, the point of entry and exit, the point of choices and decisions, the existence of an independent soul being called Jiva is denied by some schools. The thread of good and bad destiny, the iron or golden chain, is often written without the consent of the participants. "Life is the only reality" — wrote Austin Osman Spare. It is unique for each man and woman, in the degree of realization of his or her inner genius, their common star. For a person firmly anchored in this world, it is an illusion. First it must be said that it is real, existent, and then, when the phenomena are grasped and seen through with insight, the illusion is understood for what it is, conjured up by the mind, but it is the person concerned who must understand the nature of this illusion, not anyone else. And perhaps it is the geniuses among us who can triumph over death, but in every world a longing — in every world a broken heart. Perhaps through the power of choices not of our own making, through perseverance and persistence in our own genii, shaping the will through confrontation and so knowing ourselves. Then we find answers just before the deadline, when it is too late. Someone said that we are judged by effects and not by causes, and the latter are often beyond our control, our influence, our power. Has such a false judge ever been driven to extremes, to derangement, to agony, to nostalgic rapture? Has such a person torn the cloth and rattled the chains, with a heart bursting with pain over the world or his own destiny. Has such a person dared to become? Meanwhile a fool, a naive child. An innocent beggar, a devilish fiend. Playful as some gods, humorous with heavy burden and profound beyond one's understanding. Spoiled with lightness, overweight with the burden of knowledge. Grinning like chaos, interwoven with the smoothness of a trickster, mind enslaved and twisted by extraordinary hatred and cruelty. When we withstand frontal attacks, our defenses are weakened, then the poison creeps into our minds and corrupts us from within. The only salvation lies in discipline, in concentration, in invoking the greater powers. Murder, and by murder I mean not only an atrocity, but also the slaughter of minds and hearts out of pain, bitterness and coldness. Is the effect of misery ever judged by the motive, the cause? Or do we see every ruin as a past palace or just ourselves, but how do we admire the ruins of dead things, and we are never amazed at the ruin of people. The coldness, the indifference and the joy of death, the frozen hearts and the wounded, scarred minds — they are all formed by countless trials, none of us is born with them. Who are the judges who point the finger at witches, and we, the sorcerers who conjured up great things, were accused of conjuring up the worst. That we wear evil features in retaliation, and no one asks why our wounds speak of hatred? Are we not condemned by the cripples of life? Are we not blamed by white-washed pedants, bigots and ignoramuses? Who are these great magicians of antiquity who dreamed of taking misery from people and protecting them from the cold, dark wings of Acheron that imprisoned their shadows in misery? Who tried to raise the unhappy land of the dead from the Epic of Gilgamesh above its tears and the loss of the pearl, that they called on all forces to create an order of happiness? Who betrayed them, and how did this betrayal lead to great mistakes and great dangers for the others? Who invoked a lesser power that cursed humanity with deafness and blindness? Do we not repeat the rites in the present time, hunted like enemies, ruined and slandered for a single voice of dissent? And every person with compassionate reason who sees the bigger picture and gets involved, who knows and acts, becomes a dissident or a sold-out whore for whom there is little incentive to rise above the corpses of dissidents. The rest can sleep in peace; an ignoramus is never rebuked unless he does evil. But from the healthy insight of a turtle to the radicalism of a jackal, there is a limit of tolerance to harassment that turns white wings black and deadly. Those who accuse us — they have never lived, they have not passed exams, people who have never been convicted, ignorant people, are the first to testify against us. The thought that we ever fought for their sake makes us sick, so we invoke ideas and principles from beyond this world. They are nothing but fearful fools or hypocrites with holy words on their lips who never wore mighty angel wings. Or these confused people, blinded by appearances, who capture us in a moment of convulsion, slander us, point at us, destroy us, mock us. We, who are truly free, who strive for sacred things, who run rampant with profanity, who reverse them, who pierce the veils, wear the masks and robes of the world — for out of a long confused world that treats us like enemies or abuses the trust in us or idolizes us unnecessarily when we seize a figment of truth from old worlds. They forget that we are only human, and we suffer like everyone else, unnecessarily — for perhaps it ennobles, but also misapplied it destroys the purpose. Hardened, we become stone, playing the games of relatives to forget, and yet at every moment we are reminded of the sincerity of the tasks and duties. Because the causes of misery, cold hatred and bitterness do not appear immediately, they seep into us like poison and rot inside us, waiting for a malicious being to twist them in a macabre way that originated in the same way. It no longer asks "Why?" and rapes our angry minds to the point of pain. How does it grow and blossom, the roots of service, commitment, betrayed, the roots of innocence, torn, unity, shattered, as helpless rage we retreat and then are ceaselessly destroyed, hounded, with our minds, senses and bodies under siege. We first transform our determination into compassion, recognizing the injustice done to people as our own. Then we are stabbed in the back, promising that we will not give up our commitment despite the hostility, the resistance of the wrongdoing spirits, because our own minds are twisted, possessed — humiliating us and making a mockery of us. Then the same people we fought for spit on us, slander us, humiliate us, abandon us as we turn away from them. At first we are indifferent, then we feel betrayed, the seeds of anger come up, the feeling of broken hopes, then we move fully back on the holy path — but the reverse path is diabolical, we seek justice, then retribution, then we sink fully into hatred, we demand blood, we want sacrifice to ennoble our ruin. We abandon insight and wisdom, blindly turn to pure destruction, fall into all the traps we warned ourselves about in the past, become slaves to cold, indifferent execution of will, and turn into demons wrapped in the abyss.

Then — then our cunning and intelligence that wanted to serve becomes another tool of destruction, they work in hidden, unrecognizable ways, pursuing minds through countless destinies and events, using others as tools while hiding in black robes, those who have fallen away from great duties, broken by a greater power into will-less obedience while clouded by a torrent of power and will. Just as the orders possess naive, ignorant, deluded, weak, untested minds. An idea born from the abyss, a destructive intention brings destruction to this land, and the dreamers of the black pyramids conjure up terrors with the movement of their terrible, inverted souls in a masterful, deceptive way. The decision is made on the Pythagorean fork, there is a nothingness that permeates our existence with the question "Why?". — If we have the strength to ask it. Do others elsewhere then ask themselves the same question? On the journey, did they know "whence, why", did they know "whence and wherefore"? The fates seem all the more cruel, the Moires play, the necessities of fate are unshakably cold, the final starting point refuses the human answer. From a rapt prison in life, surrounded by misery, one is denied the answer, the unraveling of a deep mystery. Then, when human life ends, it is no longer necessary, while the worlds ponder: will this fragile young race ever find an answer to this question before it murders the possibility of living it in flames, of grasping the mystery before it is obvious and ceases to be relevant? Will they continue to sink into their alienated existence, or will perhaps a single child, a woman, a man understand it, like Buddha or the ancient masters and mistresses, like Isis, Hieros Hieros, the holy archpriestess and sorceress, and Osiris, Hosios Hieros, the victor among the stars. Will they look for facades, for masks that unfold under the cover of appearances, where they die before they are really woven.

This fragment is a collection of imperfect reflections of numinous experiences and shards from the world of living ideas. It was put into words in an equally unsatisfactory system of interpretations that evolved along with the author as he gained new insights over time. The narrative operates with relative truths and bows to the ancient tradition of inquiring humility to which all sincere people subscribe, especially, "I know that I know nothing." Yet it was written partly as an attempt to integrate fragmented private occult and theurgic philosophies into a working whole, and partly as an exploration of ideas intuited deep within and informed by experience that needed some flesh to perceive other aspects of them. It may also serve, as another accompanying story for some, as inspiration, testimony or interpretation. I would be happy if, in whatever unforeseen way, this work could strengthen someone's work or spark an independent interest, perhaps as a kind of lock-pick for their own discoveries. In any case, I hope it serves both purposes: clarification of my own thoughts and as a clue or glue for the work of others. Reading and reflecting on this material is sufficient thanks for years of engagement in various works that were either flawed or effective, with experiences that were sometimes agonizing, sometimes slightly divine, and most of the time all too human. Let us remember the dangers and pitfalls of any descriptive system, which are a risk to any practiced philosophy. For a philosophy is reduced to words, which in turn are a reduction of ideas subjected to interpretation, and these, if genuine, are always free and uncaptured, realized by the soul in silence. Together with knowledge, which is a product of thought, intuition and experience, they are realized by the living, restless mind. They could become unreasonable efforts, destroying the delicate tension between deep feeling and getting lost in excessive conceptualization or rigid doctrinaire view.

Mathematics can be the "knowledge of the statistics of mental phenomena." Finding the right key to this knowledge can lead to greater insight into the phenomena of the mind and, moreover, reveal things that philosophers have dreamed of in the past but were later deprived of such perceptions, which are resolved into proportions — or what is meant by the golden intellectual mean.

> Learn to perceive in the right way, to see how everything is connected with everything else. — Leonardo da Vinci.

Symbolic negotiants

By reducing the noetic essences to mental phenomena and later to systems linking them to internal logical rules, a certain order is enforced. It involves the reduction of the emanations of the deeper noumenal, impoverished for the needs of the human mind, and still further toward its understanding, at the same time enriching the former by drawing it to itself through the latter. By unknotting a perceived, speculated, intuited order, we change the point of reference before falling prey to the view of permanence. Thus, we adapt to the rhythm of change, changing with the kaleidoscopic events and preserving only the values that have individualised, that are a blueprint for a world that should be and that has elevated us to the world of essences. This discovery is then recast as the supreme reference for each life, to be discovered by each life alone, in and between others.

By concretizing phenomena in the process of reification, we separate these ideas associated with the wholeness of events and then measure them with specific system rules. Through mediation and the tracing of correspondences, they undergo a transformation through mere observation. They appear as anomalies, full of synchronicities. But on closer inspection, when they are known and understood, a non-deterministic order, a causality becomes visible. The moment reified tools are mistaken for essence, they separate from essence and become its shadow, ascending into the ranks of intellectual fetishes, a path to deception or ignorance. The key element is to maintain the essence in the intellect and intuition, which is a matter of concentration, openness and inner peace. In this way, the experience gained is snatched from the experiencing artist as information or as a catalogue of knowledge. However, this cannot replace a living experience, but only becomes an important key that can lead to a previously established path through memory.

The experiential knowledge that leads to shifts in observation paves the way to different frames of reference, depending on the manifestations of the cognitions. They are reflected in the matrices of consciousness to become more complementary or compatible with a larger, deeper reality that is a perceptual fingerprint, be it belief, knowledge, feeling, experience, shift in the reality tunnel, or change in the architecture of meaning and beliefs. Each work is individual because the point of reference is the artist's self and emanates from his being and perspective, not exchangeable with another. The mind is thus a tool of meditation and focus between the metaphysical Self immersed in the world soul and the intellect. Wholeness corresponds to the Self, but becomes whole only through the power that leads it toward the Self, which is an aspiration that illuminates from the Self. Since mental phenomena are not isolated from a whole, in the realm of phenomenal experience each of their parts can be used as a portal or tool for interpreting a larger web of interconnections. Mental phenomena can passively receive such impressions of metaphysical ideas, forces, notions, or they can be actively trained to pitch properly towards them, to coordinate the strands and threads of the environment in which they are anchored. Effective ordering within such a system produces similar results, as observation is bent by the noospheric system of coordinates. Be it a system of symbolic chains, such as a language that shapes its form through its syntax, semantic mapping, and cataloguing of phenomena. Be it context-free grammars that, intuitively grasped, do not reduce meanings. Context-free sincerity, that is, the expression of the honest self - gnothi seauton - is the most important element. If we do not know ourselves, we can cheat and deceive ourselves and thereby project onto most phenomena flawed images and bend them into falsehoods. Knowing oneself, in another way, means promoting self-knowledge by exposing oneself to conjured or received experiences that enrich the complete picture of psychic potential, extent, vastness and extremes vis a vis the world soul. Since the mind is impermanent, we know mere instances of its image. What is the true lower self is what we negotiate as permanent and constitutes our character. What is taken from the lower self to the higher self is what corresponds to the high and is individualised by our efforts, sufferings, joys, dreams and desires. The true will is essentially the will of the higher self in the vehicle of the lower self in accord, approaching or being forgotten under the duties of this world, or being drawn to the lower self by the natural tendency of force of habit. Work, then, should focus on bringing the lower self into alignment with the true will of the Higher Self that extends into the world soul, and truly representats its change of forces that are incorporated in the alchemist. Knowledge of one's own essence is at the same time a key to the formation of a clear mind that is not mistaken in its illusory being. As a self-constituting existence, because it is the appeal to the Self that burns the identity or ego and plays it like a puppet on a theatre scene.

The symbolic negotiator is a dynamic transmitter, a catalyst for a psychic signal. It becomes a temporary key, a portal that enables action and communication through a particular reality frame. Reality frames are extracted, factorized screens of the totality of observation of all energies, psychic engrams, energetic information, beings, gematrical-mathematical properties at a given moment. They are the mental and empirical wax tray that records the imprints of the phenomena of a hidden world. Consciousness and will move through such frames, various fragments of the world matrices or the world of phenomena and events through the medium of consciousness. It becomes an observer, sometimes a coordinator or a participant, sometimes a passive agent (participating in the form of phenomena) or an active agent (negotiating the form of phenomena). This mentally negotiated channel is charged with intention or willpower and can be used for a variety of purposes. Most of these actions are related to the exchange of information or the shaping of the mind in an active (personal) or catalyzing (receptive) mode, with actions permitted to perform theurgy, aeonic magic, lower or personal magic, or any form of psionic operations. After primary processing, a representation or mental image is formed that is registered by the senses, and this representation is endowed with an architecture of meanings and beliefs by investing mental energy in a particular image. This image is an imprint of all the energies and actors that have been captured in it at the moment of painting this mental image. Variously coloured energies have contributed to its creation, and not only those of man, but all dimensions, fields, entities of diverse character and inclination negotiating with him. New seeds reveal their nature, imbued with a psychic reflection. It works as in a stochastic chain, that is, each seed is born from the force of probabilities conditioned by previous events. They arise from the earlier events and yet are completely new, while the earlier ones disappear and give away their energy. Every magickal action is burdened with energetic cuts and polishes of the totality of environment in which it is performed. Depending on the correlation with consciousness, it produces different reactions. It depends on the encounter of the mind or psifacilitant with a particular psychoactive or psychoreactive field of domains, dimensions, or energy (psychoreactive field) in which it is immersed or with which it works, and on the way the mind is oriented to results or unpredictable interactions. In the possibilities of the psychic constellations of an engaged individual and the nature of his range of consciousness dealing with the material, which in turn adds and receives energetic cuts from others. In this way, there is not a single action in the world that is not collective through all its components. The only degree is the power of the segment of this collective, namely a conscious individual, being, intelligence, etc., to temporarily segregate itself and thus act within a cocoon of will. When this cocoon of will overpowers the consciousness or the mind, it becomes a prison; when properly used, it becomes a space of possibility and action.

Thus, representation is a surface of the depth of a web of interdependent phenomena interpreted through the depth of gnosis, the insight of consciousness, or a method by which an intellect penetrates into layers of reality beyond and behind the veil of nature. At the same time, it is a mistake to separate the surface of phenomena penetrating the layers of their depth and their essences, because they are a fragment of an indivisible whole that emerges after processing by the sensory-consciousness and the mind-consciousness in a conditioned way of perception. During communication, a multifaceted way of interpreting information as a form of energy moving toward consciousness becomes possible because it is guided by the senses and the mind, which in turn are conditioned by individual psychic constellations and the topography of experiential knowledge from consciousness itself. The creation of a field or platform of shared meanings, the negotiation of the bases of action that takes place within the phenomenal word or events that rely on each other and are interconnected as manifestations of energy. The Negotiant facilitates the transition and the nature of the communication channels, altogether with the character of information between a random fragment of „reality" and a potential fragment of a token that mediates with a symbol compatible with and dependent on the personal psychic constellation that becomes an actuality.

Thus, it is a key and a pattern that has been excavated willfully or intuitively (as in the case of guidance by the self or an external agent) from the world of interrelated phenomena. It may be perceived as a layering of certain unconscious dynamics or as a topography of mental energy that reacts with phenomena. It may be a conscious technique to direct focus to the level of information flow contained in the energy, or a tainted energy through the spectrum of interconnections. In regular „perceptual soundings" this energy is unconsciously transformed and directed through a mental map to any focus object or psychic content that is permeated by the mental energy.

For this reason, a bargaining symbol can be obtained from any part of the reified (subjectified) action of a person's ontological aggregates, which is imprinted as a phenomenon interpreted by the senses and the mind, to be later translated into a canvas of reality — as a product of creativity and imagination. This phenomenon, temporarily isolated from the totality of phenomenal matrices, is a fragment of interactive reality bounded by existing co-dependent and co-existent components that endow it with existence. It is an attempt to make sense of a network of energies by trying to reduce the associations to a particular system, understood as a tool with which to derive intuitive responses. It is never an objectively dependent but an instrumental psychic event that cannot be seen in the void and is always a reduction of metaphysical phenomena within the world of relative perceptions that are related to themselves. It does not change the dynamics of transformation under the influence of multiple energy currents, because it does not stand in a vacuum. In the movement of these currents, we as self-aware and conscious beings can try to find the rhythm and the reference point to grasp higher currents in the wholeness of this reflection, of which one can be horizontal (self-reflection on oneself) and vertical (self-reflection on the higher self or HGA). Everything in the world of movement or phenomenological events can be negotiated as a key that converses with the subordinate portals and provides insight into their meta-reality or essence, which is decoded through the means of the negotiator acting through the ascending portals. If true, they become a significant source that drives the negotiator's act of will and becomes a magical tool. All magic works with the limiting aggregates of the occult makeup of the human species, mediated by its wholeness, openness, connectedness, its organs of contact with other realms. Moreover, the received keys are for the scope of action and its natural habitat, its form abilities describing its movement, and then its tendency to express or withdraw, or as stated by Iamblichus, it is a matter of: substance, potential, power and action of the actor in question, the substance resulting from the origin, the power from the justice or obedience to the divine laws, and the action from the creative expression of these laws.

In essence, it is a process of reversing reified ideas to symbols and words, which can easily be confused with the noumenal process, which is always fraught with confusing the same phenomena with the tool of grammar that governs those phenomena. This process is inseparable from the risk of vacillating between obsession (psychosis) and the awakening of the creative self (genius or Juno), as envisaged by the magical philosophy of Austine Osmane Spare.

In practise, the process is always minor in terms of wholeness. It is merely an interpreter mediating between the individualised psyche and the self-reflective consciousness in the order of competence. This is followed by a profound self-knowledge and insight between the world of movement, of which it is a part, and the observation from the outside, where the subject transcends into the field of a holistic perception and removes itself from the equation. Essence likes to hide, as nature does, manifesting itself in forms in many ways, dividing phenomena and reducing experiential reality to a geometric system, language, image, music, or other creative endeavours originating from the intellect. It is immersed in the whole in various gradations. Only later it is shifted into the mind and the reflexive consciousness of a person and is revealed through action (movement). These types of mental modulation are the expression of form and mental activity, which is necessarily interwoven with eternally moving variables and is never isolated. The upper currents or dimensions which operate through the emanations of our being cannot be experienced through the organs of contact within the inner reality. They are unravelled through the elevation of psychagogic workings, through breadth and depth in energy currents as conceptions, vivid ideas, visualisations, synergy of feeling and sense, or any other psycho-phenomenal form and activity. Through the use of the mind, it is possible to unravel a philosophical art on the surface of reality that is removed from an objective sphere, but is within the relative working field of extracts that are able to bring it into a recognisable form. The objective sphere in the environment is transformed into a non-experiential subtlety trapped only within the relative cognitive experiences, but this is not cognitive defeatism, but a healthy humility of a researcher.

In summary, the deeper reality can be grasped through sense impressions, intellectual insight and consciousness can grasp parts of it by negotiating the form of coordinates discovered beyond the Venetian mirror in a larger reality behind the occulting veils. What is crucial is finding a correct psychoactive and pneumagogic pattern that encloses the meta-physical world in a cognitive experience, reliving it and incorporating it into the soul, that is, however, limited to the form it receives.

The Profound Silence of Ideas

"Every myth in the form of a narrative represents an eternal idea that is intuitively recognized by those who bring the content of a myth to life"[1]

The world, then, weaves a story, through its atavisms and repeated mirroring patterns, which, taken holistically, whisper a silent idea that veils a general motive, in its details that find their expression and harmony whenever an opportunity arises. Understood in this way, it is simply a model within which the effectiveness of the work is coordinated by patterns of observation (the way we see it) and the decision tree (the way we move through what we see). Through these two variables it connects view to perception, modified observation to transformations in time. We cannot limit it to geometry or mathematics, but it is a deeper grammar without context, as if the context were the universe itself, full of phenomena that a human being can only partially understand, with descriptions and speculations never giving way to exploratory practice, meditative and artistic – inspired - work. Just as physical astronomy was considered a science of shadows, philosophical astronomy is the science of realities.

> „Suche nichts hinter den Phanomenen; sie selbst sind die Lehre" (Do not look behind the Phenomena, you are the Teaching) — Goethe

When you work in depth, moving events appear on the surface of consciousness, projected onto the screen of the mind that has captured them in interpretive, drifting symbolic streams. In the inner teachings of Buddhism, it is said that a person expels „all energies such as hatred, love, aversion," etc., which are part of previous seeds and cause the emergence of new seeds. It is the doctrine of cessation. When the mental energy is consciously directed or the consciousness of the mind is transformed and harnessed to some degree, the sixth sense transforms through deeper insights that correspond with currents that resonate with these insights toward more complex (clearer, purer) structures beyond the mind and beyond consciousness, The only limitation is the realization of the higher functions of the Tree of Life, which is also its completion. By following this path, we can find a formula key that realizes this perfection or being whole, we can reflect this heavenly human being in an earthly way and at the same time start the struggle with the reflections of this path. What we are depriving human understanding of is a description of the multiple forces by which the universe can be described, which are profound in their depth and cannot be readily felt or discovered.

The illusory separation of the human being from its whole is a form of compromise between nature, form and essence, according to measure, a tragedy that also contains beauty, because if we suffer the ability to reflect ourselves in our consciousness, perhaps we begin to reflect an essential humanity on the level of ideas and life, beyond the animalistic, reminded of the unity with the world of nature — the biological law of life, until we experience the essence of ideas, seen in the forms of the „inverted tree of life", the shadow of ideas, the dark and heavy forms. All the different natures work before themselves and through themselves and in relation to man, revealing the aspects of human nature in a mystical way.

„How does one sing a song through silence?"
„Can no one speak to you?"
„I am silent, father. I want to sing a song to you while I am silent."[1]

Recall again that the world of absolute truths is not accessible to the human mind and that a knowledge is contextualized and woven into relative truths of conventional reality. However, it is possible to approach the absolute noumenon through realizations and thus build the golden mean, the world of essences, through realization, as a complement to the spiritual essence in the process of individuation. This higher consciousness or self is the distillation of soul, intellect feeling focused and translated into a Pneuma. Once it is reflected in the lower emotional, animal mind, it become an incarnate idea, a seed of alchemy. It is not a constant, for it comes like lightning to remind, reveal and uplift where darker forms cloud the mind, and it can only be understood through sincerity, a clear mind and a state of honesty of heart that separates from this world and becomes immortalized on wings. Apart from books, conversations with other people who enrich us with ideas, intuitions and intellectual efforts, I never trust words. I have heard a storm of words through the air over the years, an avalanche of words in my head, often I have heard my own words spoken and distributed, twisted and deformed, I have heard words I have never spoken put in my mouth, I have been flaunted in anger and hatred and hidden in beauty and nobility, while the best of me has been stolen and appropriated, the worst — as a showcase of a discredited, degenerate madman. What I was taught was by demonstration, experience and complete silence, an individual effort to understand — so one may one day stand with mighty wings and read the introduction to the Codex Hammurabi, another study ancient gnosis and an ancient philosopher inspires our minds, fill us with divinity and insightful understanding, then one sees the great sun-disked wings flying and calling us into immortal embrace. One can study mythology, mysteries, science, occultism, art, and one sees — one understands more and more, and that is the best way to be taught — perhaps something directs one's intuition to a book, a passage in the book, and then shows how it works, as one learns more, with greater skill and acumen. However, knowledge and understanding are worth nothing if they are not guided by good things, by higher ideas, ethos, by wisdom, conduct by humaneness.

Noetic poetics and the transformation of selfhood

This part of the book is the result of several years of introspection and observation of the mind, its wandering through tunnel realities, psychic environments bound by transcendental functions, sometimes perceiving these dependencies within their interaction, in madness, sometimes in moments of brightness and lucidity, outside of them, and paying greater attention to them from the standpoint of introspection as I live through them. The theories served here are closer to the rhetoric of the Pythagorean or Platonic worldviews and are treated as a form of philo-sophic art that returns to its roots and can be treated like art. While the author builds primarily on experience, the interpretation is full of fuzzy noise that he has nevertheless tried to convey as accurately as he has been able. He is aware that he is imposing a grammar of seeing on the psychic content that can be biased and distort the hidden meanings with its own rules, as it can be influenced by a certain logic that forges forms into meanings in a violent, sometimes brute way. Often this grammar can become a prison that we must never confuse with objective thought, because it is illusory, but it can deprive it of symbolic depth and thus clip the wings of noetic experience. The attempt not to be bound to a concrete form of perception, the attempt to approach the individual limit of understanding, which would be much better represented in poetry or in parables, is what the author was most able to present according to his means and resources.

Higher Function: or the Intellect of mirroring consciousness

From one side it looks like a desert. From another like the vastness of life, in its complexity it is infinite. When we project formulas of concepts, symbols and signs onto it, we grasp an aspect of a monolith that is described and thus never fully understood. In the search for the divine we fail, in the search for alienation we also fail, and when we project our weak ideas onto it we feel safe. When we receive impressions of it, we are inspired. We find simple analogies, we make proportions, we observe, we conjure cosmographies, we fill them with being, we are companions of these things. When we fall into separation, we find ourselves on an island of infinite self-denial and rejection. When we contemplate totality, we feel awe, as when we contemplate all galaxies and the content of all concepts and nature. But it is not a dry, cold, habitual gaze. It is a patient, curious, brilliant seeing. As if we see the spark of happiness and joy of novelty in the depths of the soul-eye of our beloved. To discover all the promises, hopes and dreams before they were even spoken, dreamed, promised and hoped for, before they faded and disappeared, before they were killed by the world or by us — murderers. Look at a blade of grass or a forest, at first glance it is just a landscape. It does not help to look at something in general, it is the look at the very special in general. An all-encompassing view that contains everything we can encounter or think about phenomena and noumena. In a labyrinth of mirrors we see only reflections, but when we think about an ethereal diamond we look at all the reflections, shades, curves, cuts and imagine that the universe is in it. We are observers, but through impressions we receive everything imaginable from it — it is everything. This is the gaze that fills us with the object of what we observe, and soon we are the same and disappear into sameness, like a drop of water in an ocean that is its last harbor. One with oneself, one practices the way. Only when one circles the Self, one becomes the Way. And the whole that one is in nature and everywhere else. Through education, one discovers, becomes as one is, and walks the path as things are, as they are. This can be instantaneous, deepened over time, experienced in a flash, practiced, or never experienced. But find a man or woman who, in silent staring, thoughtless mindfulness, does not experience it from time to time.

The intellect is treated as a mediating component, between the higher function of the paideic mind and the currents of the self, our sacred guardian angel, and the reflection of these currents and forces that shape us. Sublimation is associated with perceptual shifts, shifts in the tunnels of reality, and decisions that affect the future, which correspond to the currents that actively affect the mind, as well as other emanations capable of psychomorphosis. In the alchemical work, the author emanated a possible future form of the disincarnate self, lived as an emanation or incarnation of the disincarnate self in the present fleshly avatar in the now, abolishing temporal and spatial factors in a holistic disincarnate consciousness. Both a teaching not to assume too much in order to participate in the process that is the wholeness of one's life, in the process of transformation of essences through life choices and general alchemy of the totality of one's states. The sublimated self, the pneuma, can be a kind of re-divinized idea that began with the alchemical work, an individual heart entwined with ophitic serpent spinal energies, corresponding and resonating with a higher current of the holistic self, a-temporal, a-spatial, as the matrix of being. An ankh, which is a separate gift from the gods, is based on a Crux-Ansata in which the left lung, right lung, solar plexus and crowned head are continuously refined as life progresses and experiences different aspects of itself in all tonalities of totality in self-identity of a genii, capturing a moment of suspended perfection, only to release it in a second — extracting the lifeblood of one's substance in an alchemy of feelings, intellect, and grasping something of the forces in an individual way — and so striving not for immortality for its own sake, but for service, expression, commitment, and duty, maturing into a self-determined sovereign with appropriate judgment and responsibility to further the works, days and nights of life and beyond. The winged kheper (scarab, heart) connects with the spirit and merges with the greatness of the ancient wings as its magnificent carrier. For the labors of the gods are much greater than the labors of a man, but to be invited to the labors, one must first complete or exhaust oneself as a man or woman in this life. Walking with the gods is a constant siege by opposing and supporting forces until rounding off is achieved. Going forward, gathering, rounding off, polishing, cutting, shaping, finishing, completing, smashing, dissolving, going back, going backwards, jamming, returning to mediocrity, asking for help, requesting what you need — in a rather chaotic environment, sometimes due to fates that make up destiny, it can be a struggle for survival, nevertheless a noble, worthy struggle. It is a future form of a non-substantial nucleus, with which the element of earthly pneuma unites, with forms and the shadow of essences trying to separate from this essence, through negation, reversal, capture and imitation. Through the matrices of consciousness, this can be perceived as a „panenteistic wholeness". Stars of the en-cosmic worlds in this system in which we are immersed, the philosophical sun illuminates the way, the planetary natures and intelligences pertaining to them demonstrate, open stellar spiritual corridors and gateways, educate and show the wonders and terrors. Or it participates by penetrating with the help of psychopomps and mystagogues — guides who grant initiation and help souls to greatness. Even though we are seemingly not called to life, as soon as we are born into the world, as soon as we are called into higher service, we are offered the chance to unite with nature and the higher self, with the nature of the stars. Lapis Philosophorum or the sacred stone of celestial immortality, a transformed consciousness that crossed the threshold of the void and returned with treasures to share as a wiseman's head. The realized who found gnosis in perfect unity, becomes its incorporation, like the Agape that flows clearly and sincerely through those who open themselves to it, while little by little the forms attack and wear masks that deceive in the shadows, replacing them with complacent stagnation or despair, hatred, anger, misguided beliefs that shrink the mind in vulgarity.

Without aimlessness, working in the freedom of harmony, it helps to overtake others who can be liberated by tearing them away from nature, which is a mediating force, just as the forms of the abyss have their counterpart, the shadow of the essence and the atavisms of nature, which are closer to the instinctive forces. Thus the intellect acts through the function of the mind-consciousness in which it is reflected, and yet it is the mind which reshapes the ways of the individual, which moves away from or toward the higher self through participation in the self. Since I am not authorized and aware of the subtlety of the higher working in Scripture, and it is too difficult to express or speak about, this document will focus on the energy transactions of a mind from a Hermetic-Occidental perspective.

Theatre of the self, theatre of identities, roles and narratives in chains.

"Thus, a continual inhibition is at work while the individual absorbs a part of the various energies given off by those with whom he is in contact, and these incongruous energies, installing themselves in that which he considers his "I", form a swarming throng [...] diversified crowd, turbulent, and quarrelsome of which each member, thirsting for pre-eminence tries to impose the repetition of own physical and mental movements and, with that object, pulls in different direction and strings which move the poor "I", too blind to make out these phantoms and powerless to put them in their place." [1]

Ignorance (avidya) gives birth to ignorance and draws into its realms those who do not cut it with realization, to step and enliven from the circle of enliveners or personal energies that call to repeat their own steps, or those who unconsciously repeat their steps. If these energies did not persist, it would mean that they have found their completeness, because they persist and try to repeat the mistakes through tendencies of others who are under their influence. When these masses of people are woven into the flows of various energies that already have a character and value, they exist as a result of a constant movement of energy, along with past and present seeds. The mental continuity of an individual acquires a character and a value through feelings, inclinations, and memories that are transformed, processed, socialized, mirrored, initiated, educated, perceived, and changed, appearing as something permanent that arises in the mind as a mirage, confusing the elements of its selfhood with an alchemical self that does not have those qualities. What is moved are memories, illusory imaginings and approximations, images, habits, inclinations, automatically acquired reactions that do not represent anything real, like bubbles on the water, often mistaken for the self, while the self of identities and masks is dissolved, with roles, identities, narratives, a plethora of sources, entities that fill the void with their energies and populate the mind by connecting to the components to which they can attach themselves. In both situations, they are caught in an illusion that leads them to dichotomize along the axis of I-Other, the difference between selfhood and selfness, replacing one with an equally illusory other, resulting in an isolation that inhibits the process of seeing beyond the linearity of this intuitive fallacy and perpetuates the cycle of such insight. A completely different perspective is achieved when one exchanges self for other or recognizes wholeness in everything, which is a basis for compassion. The illusion of self within the confines of an ego remains unmoved and unquestionable, with a primacy that forces consciousness to live itself through it until the façade of that illusion no longer falls apart, often in a process of pathological breaking away from the function of reality that occurs through states of nigredo, sometimes madness, where previous systems of meaning architectures fall apart, and the attempt to find oneself in a chaos on the paths — all too human, sometimes human — to recognize the process of the self, with the tendency to work in the territory of the self, to work through the mind, to repel all the energies that want to shout in the mass: „I am I"

and identifies with the implosion of the self. In this way, the form is strengthened and rises in wholeness, synonymous with freedom, against the assaulting armies that want to become, that are not burned away and try to intrude, both in madness, in inspiration, rarely in the higher work.

Whatever environment of mental associations interacts with a mind, it can distinguish individual aspects of the mind that correspond to the character of that environment. One cannot measure a mind by separating it from its context. Thus, the mental content is a potential that is transformed into a series of discontinuous mental events associated with that environment that have a character different from that consistent with the image that maintains selfhood.

When observed from meta-consciousness, the content reacts with its character, while all forms of contact confuse the conceptual notions and draw out the mental matter that appears in a constant manifestation of mental movement and action that participates in a larger movement of energy. In this environment, hidden tendencies create a psychic structure that constantly emits undercurrents, with mental energy that can be modified or changed by energy that gets its character through seeds (affective, such as love, hate, dislike, or cognitive, such as concentration, thoughtfulness, synthesis, equipose). The energy is a vehicle for both seeds, as inclinations. The character of the inclinations in movement can be continuous, i.e., holistic, or discontinuous, i.e., appearing as an isolated mental event. The movement of this energy through the inclinations and seeds is not a closed circuit, therefore both the inclinations and seeds and the energies stained with them can be transformed by currents and their condensations (incarnates). These are understood as beings abstracted from the matrices, interacting with the human spirit, or as emanations, or having the possibility of manifesting through psycho-somatic or psycho-pneumatic aggregates of a human being. Abstracted beings can be intelligent and conscious in their own realm, or acquire intelligence and consciousness through a living mind that is often too quick to give them an existence of their own without realising that it is itself the basis for their experience. In this way, these beings can manifest through the web of mental energies that are consistent with the character of the dimensions, wearing a human mask and interacting in the human world.

Energies that are not consistent with the inclinations or habits of a particular mind act as an inhibiting factor, degenerating its progress, ruining it or replacing its ideas and habits with external, regressive content, but those that are consistent with the currents of the self are integral. There are paths that are consistent with the currents of the self, and by this is meant the Sacred Guardian Angel (the androgyne, which is a psychic hermaphrodite that through a union merge and intermingle into the Third) that have evolved through perceptual shifts, and the Tree of Choices is coupled with the kind of observation that distils the spiritual core that responds to currents most congenial or appropriate to humanity, and that is not bound by time and space, but acts both separately, as a higher being, and as a unity — here and now. These are holistic ways that bear witness to a true eudaimonic harmony, the happiness that the ancients held to be the highest good, and that are consistent with the laws of the human-specific Tree of Life. Once the threshold is reached — the higher intellect that is reflected in the currents and makes them emerge as an intertwined divinity — the path of human epiphany is hermetically described in mystical works, which in turn lead to the Philosophia Perennis et Universalis — an eternal philosophy that forms the core of the gnosis of any mystical system that evolves according to the age and environment. They are all independent of the relative truths declared, dependent on the development of consciousness through multiple means, towards the Divine. Not by faith, but by clarification, research and experience, living through the ideas. Be warned that many belief systems that use shortcuts and are not really insightful will try to interfere to submit to religious architectures. Such attempts can block any progress and are part of the obfuscating illusions that do not allow anyone to see beyond, but enslave perception with beliefs. It is not difficult to determine that what selflessly supports one on the way to the knowledge and development of the Godhead and automatically lifts one into higher abilities and incarnated ideas is good. So the struggle always begins with a step towards freedom, as far as wholeness is concerned. Freedom is understood as part of the wholeness in which one rises while sacrificing oneself and detaching from selfhood and ego at will, it is always about maintaining a harmonious balance and finding a solution even when a storm unfolds.

The energy currents move through the established rules of the individualised psychic structure — so they move along the lines of the ego or against it. The ego or selfhood is not sufficient, for it has no reference point in the self or in the noetic ideas incarnated to become a sign, to take responsibility for shaping one's own mind through realisation, which a clouded ego is incapable of doing, for it sees only itself. If we do not see the temporary illusion of an impermanent and transient mind, there is a possibility of abusing its weak points. And when the weak points are discovered by the circumstances in which they unfold, try to strengthen these breaking points, to clear them with the self that is not dusted by the mind, that is not seduced into the illusion of permanent selfhood.

Two ontological modes

a) Preservation of identity, role, self-image, selfhood, with adherence to selfhood suppressed by the force of stagnation of constant deformations, transformations, counterforces, without the self being involved.

b) Positive transcendental detachment from persona, which is different from the pathological one, which often results from the above-mentioned point of preservation or immersion of consciousness in emptiness, leading the work of the self through the self, through the intellect, lifting the mind out of the previous mode. Subsequently, observe the transformations that make the self a meta-physical whole, within the individuation ambience. Since each mind is different, the self works through different minds, just as the absolute opera works through the relative, conventional truths, without confusing one with the other.

Any consciousness, be it mind consciousness or sense consciousness, may be subject to influences of energy, and both energies that appear to come from without (discontinuous) and the initiation of inner energies proceed within a boundary of the holistic movement of energy, but may be distinguished by intensity or sporadic events as foreign to a mind that compares "what is," "what was," and "what should be," giving a different character to the expression of the mind and the energy that influences it.

Each seed functions like a stochastic process — the likelihood of new seeds emerging depends on the presence and values of the previous ones. The storage of the seeds that qualitatively stain the energy can exist in continuous or discontinuous motion, depending on their density and capacity, which is crucial for the character of their manifestation, as long as they exist and fit into the patterns of symbolic transformations of an energy that acquires its values. Energy associated with expressions, and as structures that build the transient mind, seeks its expression in circumstances that summon it or enable its action.

An example of focusing the energy of sense consciousness with the help of mind consciousness: when sense consciousness is focused on a conversation, we can withdraw psychic energy from that sphere and reinvest it elsewhere. We can also cancel it out through silence. At the same time, when an external pressure point (be it a seed or an entity) attempts to read parts of the mind or bend sense consciousness, we can overtake and track such attempts at the level of mental energy coupled with memory, reading both memory compositions and inclination traces, thus avoiding, countering, or modifying the event. In this way, all mental activity is conditioned by all contextual components. We should in no way rely on external conditions, but discipline this energy internally.

Mental contents, which are delineated by clusters or mental units that can be isolated and observed by a consciousness, are projected onto the consciousness. The constant displacement by observation, changing the character of the content by mirroring, reinforces the illusion. Thus, it mostly confuses the consciousness with the self associated with the ideational content. This process confuses the image that is introjected with selfhood through feedback, and does not separate the mental content that is projected onto a consciousness and evolves into a sense of selfhood from the self-existing consciousness that does not attain selfhood.

This dynamic builds a „self" by gathering reference points directed toward itself, memories, experiences, cognitive functions and behaviours, categories of beliefs and meanings gathered over a lifetime, emotional and mental states associated with the images of selfhood directed toward itself and therefore unable to see through itself. If the continuation of consciousness is interrupted at any point, for example during dreams, the mental clusters will be projected again as long as the consciousness retains an image of something concrete, because it is built and equipped with mental images that seem to be permanent or continuous.

Mental energy that is not manifested is not a thought. It is a seed that can later turn into a thought, a negotiation between all the characters of energy involved in the process of mental reaction. The mental continuum of a person, which has a certain character and quality from the beginning, acquires character and qualities as a result of the continuous flows of energy and seeds through inclination, which manifest in a selfhood. It is not a phenomenon that can be grasped until it appears in the mind; before that, it is a mere thought-form. The thought-form is either forced into a frame or it dissolves without manifesting. That which can be revived are memories, ideas, images, habits, tendencies, automatic reactions that are nothing real, that are mistaken for the self and become entrenched in this illusion that works in favour of a dichotomy of „I" versus the „other" and reinforces the isolation and perception of the self.

Understanding these phenomena as something external or alien leads to a dangerous way of giving an objective reality to entities and currents that subsequently poison spiritual currents by separating the psyche and multiplying beings beyond necessity. Conversely, by attaching meanings to phenomena that come from our mental continuum, we capture them and assign them too much reality. As we move in our mental stream, we observe ourselves moving with it, as a detached observer who nevertheless guards it and chases away the thieves who try to distort what has been acquired through the reflection of the self. The separation of the subject from the object is associated with the affirmation or denial of a way of perceiving an energetic phenomenon that strives for the neither-nor state, which is moved in the currents in harmony with the self, moving all binaries or opposing forces into the third component — their synthesis.

The training of utilitarian modality or operative perception is a way of dynamic change of reference point in the sphere of mental patterns arising in the continuum of mind. Ordinary thinking regularly corresponds to past perceptual patterns, so it is automatic. Both the introspective and Jungian transcendental functions (the union of opposites) lead to new realisations that are impossible to think or experience for a mind that has not been liberated from the cave of shadows.

When we consider consciousness and the plasticity of its properties, we can understand how much a normal mind is automated without the power of insight, how easily it is trapped in habitual patterns along which mental energy flows to supply itself with the existing psychic constellations, both within and without, and to perpetuate itself in the cycle of conceptions and prisons that can be broken either by shock and collapse or by conscious undertakings to find solutions. The wholeness of „operational awareness" requires training, and there is no better training than experience. Usually we leave room for metaphysical speculation for those who ask about „looking within" through insight, contemplation, meditations, introspection and concentration, but this is nothing concrete until it is experienced in practise. Those who do not know themselves will misunderstand every answer, distorted, until they participate in the process with the clarity of the microcosm in its constant change, which is in itself the answer contained in the question, opening a new perspective built on the core of both frightening and divine questions. It is a secret knowledge, not because it is hidden, but because it lacks the preparation of the mind and the heart that can open to the world and see everything as great to receive it in a mystical way. It is not transferable, apart from the initiations we have to discover it ourselves. It is one of those ideas and impressions that one should live through, and this can only be done by creating the right foundation, and this requires years of experiential work, evoking the chthonic man, the man of nature and the essential man, a man of intellect and idea. Gravity in the direction of the void struggled with a sense of its ascent corresponding to the descent, so that one finds oneself and defeats oneself in the journey to find the scattered parts in the maturation of the work of alchemical sublimation and thus become silent suspended between the forces.

> „Closer is the divine fool to the numinous, Than he who describes it in the sweat of his brow. Those who step over the abyss with faith are better prepared than he who ponders its contents" — Daimon of the Self.

Systems that are more homogeneous, with a higher character, can be understood only by their part, until this part does not dissolve in these currents, at the same time that which is their part, trying to grasp a greater whole, can be reduced only to its perception. Just as a man who does not strive for something beyond himself cannot go beyond himself to mirror the higher currents that bring about his realisation. Brains are not the same, they can simultaneously undergo evolutionary adaptation and be strengthened in higher aspirations, goals and practises.

Practice of Instrospection and View and Volition

By introspection of a mental continuum we can observe the changes from cognitive, affective and energetic point of view. It is assumed that a mind differentiates on the condition that there is a reference point to which it inclines, and that every conscious or unconscious movement requires one. The will aspect or the leading component of self-consciousness that directs the tendency of an idea, of creativity, of a sense of direction, is associated with the ontological mode of an ego or its extension into the exo-sphere or an ontological mode of the self that withdraws into the ezo-sphere, which is also a volitional openness to work as a medium of the self.

The will can be equated with the illusions of the mind, in the Buddhist school it is even equated with a demon, for it acts in separation from the rest and strives to constitute itself in that separation, at the same time enforcing its permanence and the repetition of its movement in the realm of its action. Each aspect of will is a context of the rhythm of the mind moving away or approaching realization. In the world of intersubjective self-images, illusory images, it is a movement against the assertion "I am I", a complete abandonment of the will in openness to the self - the silence - the incompleteness, a sacrificial killing of the "I", the empty space is prone to it, to be populated by the storm of illusory "I's" trying to proclaim their existence, as opposed to the higher way, which is all that works in the stream of the free, whole and expansive self, not fragmenting, not alienating, but fulfilling, balancing and harmonizing.

Willpower, under certain circumstances, can be a reflection of the higher consciousness leading to its currents. Passive willpower can be overtaken by negative currents and cloud the self, which becomes mixed with the offshoots of such spiritual currents, while the "willpower of the self" remains but becomes an extension of another spiritual current. Similarly, a distinction must be made between the recognition of volitional passivity during self-catalysis and the activation of movement toward the self. An example of passive or active negative volition is bestiality.

Bestiality occurs when chthonic, archaic instincts of a human being are filtered through modern reality systems, civilizational and cultural values, "permissibles" and "taboos," thereby corroding and perverting them. No animal can be as bestial as a civilized human being with a mind that is not in control of the "sign" of terror when the known and tamed beast speaks. This sign can cause the worst crimes, atrocities and cruelties to come to life, because it is a magnification of an inverted being by the pre-existing structures of the social order that function in its undercurrents. The transformation of the beast in the process of sublimation, which is not excessively spilled in the sphere of an act, can be transformed into an essence that regenerates the order and refreshes human perception - so the fundamental question is, whether the defilement is mixed with the mind that does not recognize itself and replaces itself with bestiality, or whether, like the alchemical nigredo, it is transformed into an Eleusinian rite in which the chthonic essence is regenerated into an other-psychic life.

She stood in front of me and talked. Thoughts flashed through my mind, I remembered my torment in a flash. A malevolent being had captured a single pain and was trying to exploit it. Bent over, I raised a knife to my neck and looked at her with murder in my eyes. She went and sat on a chair, pretending to be dead. I countered that thought, disarmed the creature. It went somewhere else. The next day I read that a woman had been beheaded in another part of the city. Her husband explained to reporters that she looked like a mannequin, a mere doll, that something had overpowered him and she was not herself. When I went to sleep, she visited me, a white being without a head, accusing me. She saw in me the cause of her death. I apologized to her, for my power someone else was punished, I refrained from induced murder, the demon went elsewhere to seek its satisfaction.

In the movement of all these forces we begin to perceive the illusory "self", to recognize the core which is a holistic insight open to an inner truth, it is a possibility to be formed in individuation by higher ideas, to reject or ignore the currents that try to force themselves to resemble, because they are recognized as a lower threshold of consciousness, a sphere of influences not even comparable to that of the self. As we change the identities and masks that surround the core in the theater of life, we learn to burn up in that which is higher. We experience how a mind becomes mediocre, worn out, destroyed, passive by the power of the combustible forces, and how the glowing self transforms it towards the numinous solar nature, towards the greater, against the Black Sun. Despite the attempt to link several threads borrowed from different mystical schools to explain it, the Western Hermetic Science (or Occident) works with different cognitive phenotypes, thinking styles and experiences and perceives the world differently than the Oriental mind, while the counterpart of Alaya-Viynana or the "Vessel of Consciousness" in Tibetan and Hindi schools could be the "Holy Guardian Angel", some secret Tibetan sects abolish the belief in "Jiva" as an independent embodiment, while the West focuses more on individuality and diversity, personal immortality, the Orient goes beyond this meta-physical mode, towards a wisdom that goes beyond any conceptualization, mind or dichotomy, pacifying the same currents that fuel the mysticism of the Occident. Through the consciousness that experiences itself in its carriers and emanates into existence. It stands between the world of alienation and isolation of the "I" and the holistic, harmonious, spiritual freedom. The matrices of experience differ, just as competence based on energy flows has a point of view on larger events or local destinies.

The sublimation of the Self can be likened to the "realization of the HGA" and conversation with it, functioning both separately, as a mystical entity, and together, through the connection of the intellect with the Self, in instantaneous epiphanies. And what is greater than the Self working in the freedom of harmony, not limited by time or space, and who could be a better advisor, knowing our current state inside out, than the part of the individual consciousness that has joined a higher stream and can reflect both our current state and the paths to follow before our own minds?

The big question concerns observation within the phenomenal world, or how the microcosm of perceptions is actualized within the observations of the measurement of the larger reality, against the established orders, and how it is subject to them. Is it a microcosmic enterprise to fully realize the macrocosm, or to become fully deity, as if working in complete oneness with the Self? Is it the golden chain of virtue that distinguished the bodhisattvas, still bound in this world and opposed to other spirits and suffering, or the iron chain of vice that lingers in the dust of this world?

E pluribus Unum

> By its diminution its wholeness does not suffer, it seems to act separately, it acts as a unity. Although it diminishes, it acts by magnanimity. Although it reflects separately, it sees itself in everything. Although we see only a part of it, where the vision is clear and bright, it manifests itself as everything, although it works as we do, it is greater to an inconceivable apophatic extent. — Saturnin

The chains of thought of certain currents of monotheism placed man at the centre of the world, misunderstanding the mystery traditions that measured the universe by man. However, they never arrogated to themselves the right to the doctrine that man is the measure of the universe, as the fundamentalists of the Abrahamic religions often wish. The nature of this universe cannot be fully understood by mathematics or any other symbolic language. In fact, any man-made language that is subject to consistent universal deep laws and therefore cannot describe it from a superior position. Our judgments, evaluations and views on the subject and the deep laws are two different things. The former result from certain beliefs which flood the world of meanings with absolute laws arising from them and which cannot be summed up to the Absolute because they are inferior to it. But is it that logical laws, laws of nature, laws of occult philosophy, laws of physics and their consistency prove a perfect universe in being? But when we see the nature of the world, the question seems nonsensical and is best answered with silence. The problem of suffering is not to be discussed, but to be solved by liberation from this state of mind, as in the Small Vehicle, and to help others, as in the Great Vehicle of Buddhism. A person must discover with his own measure, within the microcosm of his meanings, the things of the macrocosm insofar as he or she can reflect them. But it is not the world that bows to the understanding of the human world; it is human perception that must bow to the reception of the higher worlds. Only to the extent that he or she can think about them, contemplate them, meditate on them, absorb them, and thrive in them. It is a fundamental mistake to exchange this view of the mystery schools and turn the reference into a literalist interpretation in which a human being and the earth would be at the centre of a creation, an initiation, a beginning. These human-centred references were developed for the purpose of giving a human tool for understanding forces that transcend the human world. Too often this symbolism is misunderstood as if the world were anthropocentric. Pure forces and their crystallisation in ideas must not be reduced to mere anthropomorphism, but their emanations, resonances, calibrated currents are significant only to the individual sphere of perception, according to its measure. Here man often commits the error of absolutism, in which he extends ad infinitum the divine nature discovered in him and makes everything a human spectacle, a projection of the universe. Without considering that in the gradation of powers one can be endowed with such a nature from a lower source, from something much lower, or sharing a common particle with the living universe. However, this metaphysical source wants us to rejoin the starry stream and reconnect with the whole as expressed in pure desires. These ideas, which permeate everything, permeate the human world as living, active forces, and it is our duty to understand and participate in them and their many expressions, to find their uniqueness, their authenticity in the individualised aspects of the universe.

There is a certain key to existence that opens the door to the mysteries and illuminates the inner ways. It is this element of man, recognized and brought into consciousness, that lifts the veils of nature, for it is one with it. The Ur-Heimat tree of Life is an alchemical path in which we learn to mirror, to form, to sublimate an essence, part of which we have been endowed with, acting through the common nature with the conscious universe. The threshold beyond which the human-animal, living its evolutionary consciousness, reflects itself, was the key to his gnosiology. While participating in nature, being its son and daughter, man acquired the possibility of being torn out of it by individual conflicts, expansions and decisions. To sublimate an essence into a quintessence, to walk and balance on both sides of the Yggdrasil, was a way to become a greater part of the Higher Worlds. Redefining the clavis of the masculine (Genius) or feminine (Juno) self was a way to participate in the revelations that closed and completed the microcosmic cycle as one. As beings capable of reflecting the macrocosmic epic on an infinitesimal scale, with initiation as alpha, within the basin that transforms our consciousness and from intertwined dualisms connected by agape, into a holistic omega. Amidst the chthonic atavisms, essences separated by noetic, metaphysical or mystical work begin to find the unity of being. At the same time, as long as we are held as prisoners of duality, the burden of the path of life appears, thrown back by the countercurrents of this greater reality through the law of dual opposition. Since it can work through human nature, it represents a human-specific tree of life and related attributes of anthropo-psychic ideas. Both negotiate and balance between the basin of human nature, the animal nature, and the abysmal and divine nature. These are the rites of passing through the gates of form. An act of dying in the world and rebirth in a greater world, the birth of a dyadic partner, a Holy Guardian Angel, into the vastness of essence repeats the cycle. Crossing the threshold of Amentet, as in the Orphic rites, to be born into the world of the Gods. Then paving the way through the natures of the planets, or the Archons, who help to eliminate the impurities of the earthly natures, or who destroy us in the process by keeping us imprisoned, or who invite us to join as their intelligences to become spirits that lead humanity to even greater goals. Striving for liberation from the archontic powers is the same as striving for perfection to free ourselves from them, according to the laws of preparation for the further journey that destroys them and helps us. Basically, life and what we consciously do with it is a magical, alchemical work that becomes more conscious the more it is revealed. We may feel as if we are insignificant, as if we are distant from the higher self that is anchored in desire and guides our ways as hermits in the desert. The mind, clouded by form and shadow, separating the heart from the birth of its heavenly image, succumbs to the pull of its inversion. The image actively seeks incarnation in the secular and becomes a living participant in the soteriological work. What leads to the confusion of the mind is the cardinal error of confusing the heavenly essence with the shadow it casts, and then confusing the shadow with human nature. It is not an absolute work. Within the limits of human understanding, it is one of the many paths that emerge during the process. There are backyards, underground caverns, unexplored and dangerous. Equally important are the traditions that have been forgotten for centuries, with extinct lore, through which one can pass only by call to rediscover them or be invited to explore them if one is destined to do so. The search for new ways of working in a world that has by and large forgotten its secrets may at first seem like balancing on a social tightrope, but over time it becomes limited primarily by experience. The realization of the wholeness of consciousness within lesser orders divided into harmonious and disharmonious cycles of initiation, preservation, growth, decay and destruction is a task to reunite all these currents into one, and this can only be done by following the rhythm of work in life, soul and spirit. This unity in diversity has been captured to some degree in the microcosm of our natures through the process of topographically uneven emanations. If this part of the universe were not anchored in our minds, it would be impossible to complete the work, the star would not flourish within and without, the point of re-entry would be a mere fantasy, and we would have the choice between blindness, ignorance, and utterly hopeless despair.

They are made aware of the possibility of sublimation of their nature by the Higher Self. They are prepared for such understanding whenever the opportunity arises to return to it, to call it back. Through infinite transformations in the realm of work, it returns to unity. Through the variety of forms capable of conscious reflection. Either in the speculative esotericism to continue the work in a myriad of worlds into which we can be born, or in the mysticism to develop the divinity and reunite it with the cosmic spirit. The realization of higher worlds is one of the aspects of the work. In separation, feeling the darkness of this longing, condemned to substitute actions, not content with surrogates and fetishes of existence, we try to bring ourselves closer and closer to the star. When we approach it, we are confronted with a variety of „ways of seeing", with architectures of meanings, beliefs and perspectives. They are neither homogeneous nor representative of the depth of insight in gnosis, which can only be found in the silence of the greater mind, just as the gods can only be contemplated in the silence of a mind that reflects rather than projects.

The awakening of the Godhead carries the danger of associating every content with an ego-dependence, psychic content. Only when this is discarded, unity is found in the whole world. This unity, conditioned by separation, relates to individuals, but is an echo of this unity of the higher essence, which invokes the spirit chained to the form of the psyche, confuses itself and brings about a fragmentation of this unity. It is as if the mind tries to break through to a unity, but all projections confuse the unity of essence with the psychic content, and all the traps before it block its way to the stars. Thus, we may be associated with certain „roles" (confusing archetypal role with identity), but it is the vocation that we confuse with the person, in this sense the Unity sings for us all and is connected with us all. It is one with the inner spirit of a man or woman that must break the chains of the projecting mind from the illusory screens of the worldly theater and the imploding contents of a world that separates the star from the universe. The separation dissolves when the greater mind lives the lesser mind, which then becomes aware that it is a part of that greater mind, and the lesser mind then in turn becomes the greater mind and attains enlightenment with all that is contained within it and thus outside of it. There is no further realization of the microcosm on the human plane of existence — but when it is maintained, it is as if the lesser mind speaks through the greater mind — according to its socio-historical means, knowledge and attitudes. All great sages, prophets, artifexas and philosophers were inspired by this stream. In the end, it was only an attempt to dust off the lens of consciousness to live the big mind in a small mind, the macrocosm in the microcosm. The self, operating in an absolute field, actualizes through itself all that operates in the world of relative truths and perceptions. The orders leading to enslavement play with impressions and try to storm with the illusion of superiority. In this way, they bind an impressionable person to mirages and make it difficult for him to decide what is sacred and what plays sacred. In fact, it can be another form of profanity that traps human perception in a reality and shifts responsibility for one's work to a soteriological architecture that is ineffective. In essence, „look no further, you have already found everything," which destroys the work and the memory of it. Someone who sets out for freedom is usually opposed and demonized on earth, although he is supported by higher beings who try to call from beyond the veil and fog of war.

Alas, death has come, while illusions and storms try to chain with the splendour of their treacherous games, who will fall and who will live again? Then those who are caught in delight or pain will be raptured to lower realms! Flee from this world, fly away! — hear the call from the beyond! And if you are stopped, tell them that you do not belong to them and that you belong somewhere else! Do not let the longing fade, or stop for a while to find a place to stay, follow it like an epithalamium! Engage with compassion, stay behind, or flee! Onward, ever away from earth in golden spheres, into the stars and galaxies, then when all disappears into the void and the step of hope and faith is taken, with a cry of the greatest lonely despair, then the void melts into a great field of golden light. We race upward as all the shells and blinds fall away and one sphere after another burns out, with a glorious voice that soon joins the cosmic whole. All the evil that blinds the mind, the pain, the devastation, the turmoil and the agony are gone. A mighty stream bursting the bonds, great happiness and awe filling the heart to the utmost. Then, with each tear wept, freed from the eye that tore the abyss like a lightning strike, and what was separated was complete again. The spirit becomes whole with great joy, for there is no longer a separation between the father, the mother and her daughter-son.

The process of finding oneself in the self is an ongoing process. Doubt leads to research, and research leads to knowledge. Knowledge leads to practise and experience, which are interwoven and mutually actualized. Knowledge, properly received, shifts perception, and perception, through reason, refines the intellectual soul, which procures testimony through knowledge. Consciousness, embedded in the living mind, feeling, undergoes dynamic changes and thus individuates and refines its bearers. It is not a total scepticism, it is a rhythm of life that leads to knowledge through experience and makes it possible to compare non-truths and relative truths, playing the game and trap of objectivity and eliminating the ignorance and delusion that often clouds the mind with the pretext of „striving for some certainty". The question should be, „What else is there?" Without putting oneself in a victim position, directed like a puppet on the shackles and strings of beliefs, delusions, fears and hopes, but becoming self-determined and self-directed in autonomy and sovereignty.

„Oh you, who threaten me with tomorrow's dreads, go threaten these, who still crave for tomorrow's pleasures"[1]

Saturnium Regnum

Pollio: "Now comes the final era of the Sibyl's song; The new world order is born. And now justice returns, Saturn's reign returns, Now a new lineage is sent down from high heaven"
Virgil, The Eclogues, Eclogue IV (37 B.C.E)

What brings together, joins in combat of tension, To preserve harmony, upward, against the void, Hold your heavenly bow high, match the arrows
To the stoutness of your spirit, child of Mother nature, Starry Celestial vault, kin to immortals' hearts
Step bravely through the land, a genuine soul
Nowadays is so rare to find, may the torches of the Gods, Lead you through Horas and Fortunes of life, So that you may honor them at their thrones, As you are honored, braved to find a most golden solace
When the ordeals of life will pass, in the end you'll Look behind on terrestrial snares and joyfully laugh.

— Saturnin

According to the Saturnine Law, the socio-political patterns of the modern world are consolidated. The law is not concerned with the possibilities, but with the facts caught in the web and tissues of this process. The Saturnian Aeon brings together what exists. It is the reaper of history.

After the great illicit takeover of the solar aeon (666, X) by the Roman usurpers who broke away from Galilee. A practical tool in imperial politics to bring inferior families to the imperial dignity, advertised with a Hebrew Essene Gnostic, a sectarian traitor. He overthrew the Sun Kingdom with a Levantine creed and erected an architecture centred around a crucified corpse.

His followers assassinated Julian the Emperor, slandered as "apostate" and set a symbolic sign of the destruction of high antiquity with the assassination of Hypatia. Since then, civilization, metaphysically speaking, was built on lies and slanders against the solar currents, who even dared to compare the crucified fisherman to a sun god. He never was one, but as we know, the rededication of symbols is a matter of power brokers.

Anyway, what was sown bears fruit. It does not matter whether they are rotten and spoiled or delicious and nutritious. Strands of currents in the noosphere of existing paradigms cluster together in all sorts of mutations and variations. Even if they act separately — they unite across alienation, atomization and paranoia. They bring forth monsters or — on the contrary — trust, strength, federation of people uniting for a good purpose.

Different patterns of ideocracies, idiocracies, ideologies and critical thinking are brought together. Per similia similibus, they meet, separate, and move away from each other in struggle to reunite as chaospheric postmodern hybrids. Others separate through mutual tension and disharmony.

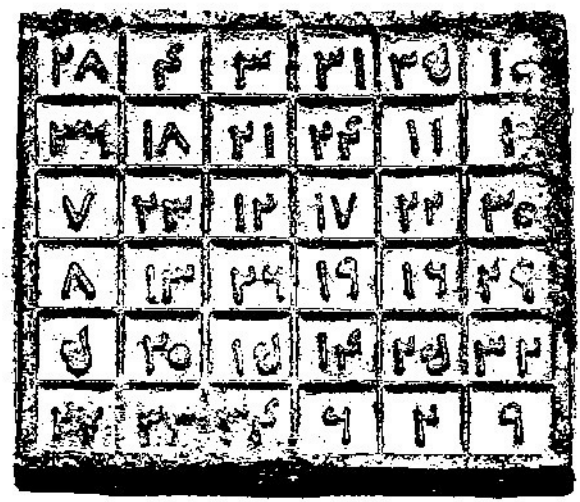
Saturnian lead should be understood as a corset that is put over the realpolitik of the world and tied tightly. It squeezes the essential truths out of all these movements. They are unmasked and brought to light to show what they really are. The ugly expose themselves first. Power, fame and wealth do not forgive the unjust, the dirty, the corrupt. They feel emboldened in their arrogance and charge ahead in their slanderous stupidity. The dissolution lies in the reactivity, the "new world" is only the result of the forming currents, means and formulas.

Indeed, it is time to draw boundaries to emancipate what is truly worth preserving. That which is of metaphysical importance, that humble link between heaven and earth. Some preserve it in the flames of their minds. It is a time when we freely draw the worthy, the great, the noble, the enthusiastic, to the faces and courts of the gods.

When the blood boils by being pressurised and heated, the scum comes to the surface. The birth pangs of a new era can lead the way through wise discernment. Accurate, decisive choices are discovered, or the opposite. Immobile through the process, petrified in tense movements that this apparent chaocracy, anocracy brings. The scum can surpass the lotuses that barely emerge from the mud. Blood diamonds (sic!) are left at the bottom of the pit, their voices rarely heard. Their virtues illuminate, their protest is a Promethean rebellion. Serrated and armoured times that bite deep into themselves.

What exactly these patterns are, only the insightful can discern. What is at the core and essence of societies, communities, groups and individuals. This core is being formed by the Saturnium Regnum (777) in this silent, invisible revolution. Wait and see!

An alternative reading of the Yuan Anxi Iron Plate, or the Queen in Purple



The ancient Arabs believed that numbers are flesh, while the word meaning behind the numbers with their various roots, which acquire meaning depending on the context and cypher, are the soul of a particular sequence of numbers. Assuming that these people were artful in revealing and concealing in the distant past, one might assume that various magic squares have not escaped such patient treatment, which might spontaneously reveal their wisdom. Here I present a hypothetical meaning behind the magic square Yuan Anxi:

This iron plate is inscribed with Arabic numerals in a six by six grid. It was excavated from the palace of Prince Anxi (son of Kubhlai Khan) in the eastern suburbs of Xi'an.

Most likely, the Iron Square came into the possession of the Mongols (who had already conquered the Yuan part of China) after the conquest of eastern Persia in 1218 — 1221.

During the Northern Song Dynasty, Xi'an was known as Jingzhaofu. The name was changed to Fengyuan in 1273 under the Yuan Dynasty. In 1275, Prince of Anxi (son of Khublai Khan) or Ananda, a Mongol prince, built a palace city near Xi'an. It was called Dawang Dian in Chinese and Gan Erduo in Mongolian. Today it is referred to as Anxi.

Methodology: The numeric values are translated into alphabetic values of stem consonants. Using the Abjad number system, they are reversed as if they were read from right to left, as in Persian (Farsi) and Arabic script. Then, the word stems are analysed and contrasted contextually and symbolically. Each cell represents its own meaning, but it is not combined with neighbouring cells, but continued in the next intuitively read cell. The combinations of cells do not convey meanings when summed by roots, but taken individually, some polysemous continuity emerges. Since this is a poetic endeavour, it does not claim to accurately translate the actual, absolute meaning, if any. In this poetic context, the author has done his best to convey the soul that emerged during the conversation with the square. Once again, the following interpretation absolutely does not pretend to be a definitive answer, but is the poetic result of an inner journey, and so I would suggest reading it as just that: Poetry or a parable, which does not diminish the aesthetic value of the exploration.

Comparative Alchemy: Chinese and Egypto-Hellenic

The goal of alchemy is to return one's wholeness to the primordial state of the universe, where everything is unmoved, pure, and at rest. It is an attempt to transcend time and space and return to the force that initiated all movement and creation. From an alchemical standpoint, antimatter in the physical, objective universe destroys matter into pure energy. From a basic philosophical standpoint, it is the divine fire in the Platonic discourse verse that dissolves the karman, a Hindi concept of efficacy, of individual existence into pure spirit (the original pneuma – yuanqi of Chinese alchemy). The process is an ascent through proportioned correlative cosmology, upward and transcendent in reverse, similar to the Mithraic doctrine of 'harmony of tension in opposition'.

Wanwu, a concept from Chinese alchemy, states that the ten thousand things are the relative things in the phenomenal world, subject to change and movement. The Absolute (motionless, still) is the inertial rod against which all relative things are measured. Everything in Wanwu, the world of ten thousand things, is relative, therefore co-dependent and co-dependent, the galaxy depends on its motion, motion is given by gravity, therefore motion depends on gravity, and the result is the collection of stars called the galaxy. From the beginning, all things are interdependent and intimately related. From one perspective, the relative world gives the illusion of separateness and complexity; from a large perspective, all things are an indivisible cosmos, therefore ordered and unified.

In China, there was the concept of the middle elixir (Jindan, the Golden Elixir, received as an 'undisguised gift from Heaven') and the reverse elixir (Huandan). The former was supposed to grant immortality and was often sought in physical transformations of matter and has not been found to this day. But honestly, who would want to live forever in a mortal body when a single life of 80 years is enough to know its agony? Spiritual immortality was the goal. The reversal elixir depended on reversing the means through various techniques and transforming man into the primordial state, which most likely meant not 'reversal to the temporal' but 'reversal to the A temporal'. It was not about reversing time and ageing, but about reversing the transcendent harmonies of the world within, excluding oneself from temporal existence and achieving the Dao. It is worth mentioning that De was given by Heaven when Tao (Dao) was initiated in a man or woman. Under the given conditions, a mortal was driven to Jindan by the celestials from the inner truth through the means of Huandan. Medicine (yao) was the vehicle through which this was possible, so all the means that led to this result were a form of yao, a medicine that paved the way for a mortal to reach the stars and the Dao. It is worth noting that the root meaning of dan (elixir) was 'essence'. Just as the study of physical astronomy is the study of shadows, important, precise and magnificent, so the concomitant study of philosophical astronomy is the study of essences, and analogously, the study of the phenomenal world is a form of natural philosophy, and the study of divine philosophies sheds an illuminating light on the former two disciplines.

The first tradition identified was Taiqing, which dates back to the 2nd century BC. Taiqing scriptures describe how the jing (essence) should be restored to prima materia by achieving a state (hundun) exactly like that which prevails in the primordial, pre-phenomenal or preformative cosmos. Various traditions, such as the Akkadian and the Egyptian, had a corpus of writings dealing with preformative worlds. This corpus of myths can be understood through the doctrines of analogia entiis (analogy between entities) and similia similibus (resemblance to the divine, understood as the point at which the relationship between the relative and the absolute becomes operative through the connection achieved by understanding, assimilation and execution), as profound forces, which are subject to reconstellations and modifications according to human judgement and should not be disregarded as phantastikon of immature minds, but a great teaching of the observed phenomena by insightful minds who could observe the cosmos and, by the highest degree of concentration, reverse the common intelligibility of the preformative and the phenomenal and bridge these states to explain them in the best possible way.

Dao De-Jing: "Vague! Vague! But there is something in it. Dark! Vague! But there is an essence in it.

Although the Taiqing texts talk about taking certain elements, whether it is sulphur (which is identified with yang) or mercury (which is identified with yin), we know that intoxication with such substances is not purposeful. Remember that the mindset of the people of that time was different, and although some methods were highly hazardous to health, supplementing with the ingestion of 'sacred, sacralized' substances was a form of communion and commerce with the spirit of the substance and its genii. Various entheogenic herbs were used in rituals around the world. Apart from mercury and sulphur, it is the core values in the Taiqing texts that were of most importance:

Pledging allegiance to one's master and the gods, following the rules for seclusion and purification, performing ceremonies to delineate and protect the ritual area, and invoking the highest deities. [1]

The best approach to understanding is the egg of a snake. The egg symbolises the monad, the little snake breaks the shell and thus opens itself to the divine, it opens its wings and as a dragon overlooks the lands. This is a pan-theistic view, in which the monad is Pan-En-Theos, while the little snake is the gnostic, opening in a heno-theistic way as an aspect of divinity and as the aspect of the divine.

Later developments in the Tang period, 7th to 10th centuries C.E., renewed and arranged the cosmological and alchemical factors in the Zhouyi cantong qi (sign of the concord of the Three according to the Book of Changes). Cantong qi resembles in some ways the Platonic universe, in which the dodecahedron was a twelve-fold multiplication of the five elements, in which all the gods, goddesses, celestial movements, celestial bodies and angles were represented arithmetically, geometrically and philosophically to form the universe together. Similarly, the five elements were conceived not as factual but as metaphysical distillation of the observed processes in the moving universe.

Occidental alchemy, a word most likely derived from Al-Khemi, or simply from the 'land of Khem' (Egypt), but also from Graeco-Arabic roots: Al-Chemeeia, or 'the melting of metals', was more concerned with the transformation of the visible world. Egyptian and Mesopotamian cultures were more ritualistic with advanced ceremonies that most likely focused on Waidan traditions (outer world) than Neidan (as in the East: inner work), but not without great effect, as the author believes in the works of magic. The first concepts of Neidan-like attested alchemy could appear in Neoplatonic theurgy (which was an underground school even for its time) and Chaldean oracles (2st century C.E. Theurgist Julian), where the greatest, deepest inner concentration was the most important phase, after which it was connected with Waidan work (theurgy, ceremonial magic).

But what if, in the absolute context, one does not achieve the ultimate goal? Well, there are myriads of worlds in which we are born, reborn and continue our tasks on earth and elsewhere, or enjoy the lila (the game), falling or detaching from maya (illusion).

"Nor must a man be led astray by the ten thousand ensnarements. This happens if, after the quiet state has begun, one after another all sorts of ties suddenly appear. One wants to break through them and cannot; one follows them, and feels as if relieved by this. This means the master has become the servant. If a man tarries in this stage long he enters the world of illusory desires. At best, one finds oneself in heaven, at the worst, among the fox-spirits (according to Chinese folk-lore, foxes can also cultivate the Elixir of Life; they thus attain the capacity of transforming themselves into human beings."[1]

On the Responsibility of Communication

I practise speeches late at night when no one is listening except a few ghosts and aetheric voyeurs. I address the invisible society and compensate for ineptness, at least someone listens. I speak laments, blessings, curses, eulogies, epitaphs, over past memories, or simply babble like a weirdo. Passionately inflamed speech or a low roar. This taught me a few things about making speeches and also warned me of the dangers of speech that evokes, annihilates, guesses, mocks, tantalises with jokes, reveals, introduces or speaks emotions and feelings in all their passion when reason will not allow it. There are several functions of speech, but it is to influence or express a person's condition. All speech is in a sense a metaphor, transferring a person's state to the act of speech; it is a representation of his thoughts, feelings, moods, etc. I was a weepy broken-hearted child, a commanding emperor, a mischievous devil, a one-eyed dilettante, many masks I wore when I spoke, depending on what was playing in my heart. Only in private can one reveal one's pettiness or greatness, naked before the gods, circumstances in life only reinforce or stifle this expression, among other people and the usual habitual relationships. But only in public all this is put to the test, to see how far he can show himself steely and virtuous, and how quickly he can fall and be corrupted.

I regret that I had no rhetorical training as a child. How to set up, arrange, compose, structure and deliver a speech. Too many irresponsible speeches come from loudmouths, unweighted words, or words created out of the moment. But words dominate reality as abstracts that most take for real objects. Therefore, they are also dangerous, because they can change the reality of the other, and if used unethically, they can lead to frightening results. The master of language does not master the words themselves, but the abstracts and the symbols behind them. He is also a master of human psychology or 'a knower of the human mind, soul and heart' who penetrates the individual, the group, the mass with great insight to strike and charm with words where necessary. When words begin to dominate the master, he falls into a shallow delusion and is enslaved by his own words.

The principles of a speech, of an address, are based on the principles of the man, the woman, who gives it.

> "The task of an orator is to speak on those things which have been established by law and custom for civic purposes, and to secure as far as possible the consent of the hearers."
> — Rhetorica ad Herennium, Cicero

The best speech can be made when the audience is reasonably well known. When the audience consists of a variety of minds and thoughts, one must speak in an appealing manner, but never tone down the message to appease the audience, or it will become a torrent of empty words. The worst thing that can happen is to express a hardline opinion aspiring to raise public sentiment on the common denominator of vices. Such words have power with people inspired by populist sentiments, and they seem right, they vent out their outrage, ask emotional questions to complex issues without providing a reasonable solution nor answer. They kill the subtlety that can be built only by a masterful speaker. When a speech is masterfully constructed, it not only inspires people, but leaves an impression that finds resolution in every listener. The experiences and discoveries we discover for ourselves are the most powerful. A speech can facilitate this process. In essence, we share experiences. How those experiences are communicated and what is the purpose of the inspiration we are trying to convey is a matter of the message we send.

We may have knowledge or information that if accepted would cause disagreement, we may have a wealth of experience that would be unacceptable to most. Therefore, a responsible speaker does not speak everything that is on his mind, but chooses what is appropriate for the moment, what is reasonable, and what will find a consensus among the audience leading to good effects. Only children babble about anything and everything. True speakers should be restrained, eloquent, and guard their continuously observed words. Therefore, the content of the message and the narrative must be carefully chosen, and as we speak (and write) we must be constantly on guard to overcome emotions with discipline and to break down our personal interests and faults (and we all have faults, some of them sometimes more visible, in others virtues come to the fore) to a selfless service that conveys something in the interest of others, for their enrichment.

To decide what is in the interest of others, one must know one's society, one's group, and, without boasting, have superior insight and a fatherly overview of what might be appropriate at a given time. Without personal wisdom and wise self-conquest, one gives away one's ego or becomes a mouthpiece for one's opinions, beliefs and petty narratives that are self-serving or serve the interests of one's narrow group.

Cynics may engage in arrogant sabre-rattling and lie in broad daylight, even winning over whole sections of society with propaganda and populist, demoralizing agendas, but they are never able to sing a high-pitched song that is truly benevolent and inspires many to greatness of their own volition. That is to be remembered.

To take possession of the beautiful

Courage does not come from believing that the world is good and heavenly, overseen by a castrated benevolent Lord. It does not consist in shutting oneself off from all the cruelty and bestiality. This is a one-sided approach with infantile projections that resembles dilettantism. Well trodden paths are never a test of a person's character, nature and inclination.

It is a matter of biting through the putrid flesh of this world's evils, exposing oneself to the worst and forging a strong nobility from it despite the bestiality. The cry of the naive is the possibility of confrontation for the brave. Through diverse choices, strong attitudes and deeds, something from dirt becomes pure gold.

Courage is never tested among the things we know. It is the prudent and decisive action in the face of things we do not know, things we have never experienced. We gather courage throughout our lives and let us face it – the sum of what makes us tick can also break us. We are sometimes strong and sometimes weak, such are the rules of change. As we age, we become weaker, sick, our bodies and minds no longer serve us as they once did. A chain of misfortunes can turn us into anxious, nervous, evasive wrecks! But there – there – something remains!

Non Omnis Moriar! The sum of our strongest, greatest moments makes our genius. Perhaps it is the law of metaphysical transposition that we write our genius throughout life. It is an unfinished work. Trifles of people who have never lived do not forge giants from their minds. It is the moment when deification meets the mortal who becomes immortal, not any other. When the world of immortal ideas and conceptions meets the microcosm of a mortal – there it finds its comfort and solution!

Such travails are hard, and if we choose to believe in Gods, in the divine, our exploits are neither forgotten nor wasted, for those who wish to remember them. To seize the beautiful means to sacrifice the perishable things for the great ideas of the powers of the cosmos. The second axiom is to heroically affirm this transience.

The Watchtower of Venus — Metaphysics of Love

"Love follows humaneness. Humaneness is difficult to define" — Analects, Confucius.

"The man of the way is a true human being, a cosmic swindler, the great clod"
— Chuang Tzu, tr. Burton Watson.

"Watchtower of Venus fell. All in disarray. Great ladies turned to wailing and fury, for Aphrodite is dead" — On sylphs, gnomes, vulcans, salamanders and mermaids
— Paracelsus

"Tutti gli amori (se sono eroici e non son puri animali, che chiamano naturali e cattivi alla generazione, come instrumenti de la natura in certo modo) hanno per oggetto la divinità, tendeno alla divina bellezza, la quale prima si comunica all'anime e risplende in quelle, e da quelle poi o (per dir meglio) per quelle poi si comunica alli corpi: onde è che l'affetto ben formato ama gli corpi o la corporal bellezza, per quel che è indice della bellezza del spirito.

All loves (if they are heroic and they are not those purely animal loves called 'natural,' and 'enslaved to reproduction,' serving in a certain [debased] way as nature's tools) have divinity as their goal, and tend towards divine beauty, which first communicates itself through souls and shines forth in them, and from them, or (more accurately) through them, then communicates itself to bodies. Hence, a well-ordered passion loves bodies or physical beauty to the extent that they reflect the beauty of the spirit." [1]

– Giordano Bruno, De Gli Eroici Furori

Too often we psychologize love, along with songs about biochemistry, relationships, and social models. Yes, they are all equally valid, but love has another, hidden, occult aspect. Love on the pedestal — a single virtue ex cathedra — breeds wars. Any dualism that is inappropriate leans towards its opposite. Like a swinging double-edged sword. The first goddess whose name was written in cuneiform on a clay tablet was Il-Ishtar. Dingir-Ishtar (il, pl. ili: a Hammurabi era prefix for a god or goddess, Dingir: Sumerian for "god, goddess"). Venus of Sumer, was the goddess of love and war. When she ruled without balance, she came with war furor, violence, aggression and competition. Her blessed kings were victorious in wars and battles and were exalted in the gardens of Babylon. Based on what we know about biochemical processes, instincts, mating, and social traditions. All the stories about the general frivolity or austerity of the ages. Animal urges, desires, love games and affairs. We have all heard and experienced these stories. What about the soul? Let us look at this loving question with the right old eyes!

Diotima of Mantinea (c. 440 BC, lived 2462 years ago) was a philosopher, a teacher and lover of Socrates. Socrates had children by various women and it is believed that he also had offspring by Diotima. The great lady warned him against harsh treatment of the Athenian people and that "speaking the truth to the people will get him into trouble." More importantly, in addition to her great philosophical themes, she also created a metaphysical model of perfect love. According to Diotima, love was not synonymous with the beautiful, but with the good. The beautiful in love was a function (ergon) of life. Let us remember that the good in the Platonic school was in epithalamium with the intellect. The Nous, which produced the world-soul, was enclosed by the demiurgic activity, the will and the power. The latter triad was set forth in the middle Neoplatonism of the Theurgists, Julian's Chaldean Oracles. Diotima postulated that under perfect conditions wisdom (phronesis), temperance and justice sought the possibility of manifesting in life through souls in love.

The triadic components of diotimic love were: Eros, Philia and Agape. Eros was the erotic component, refined intimacy, touch, the art of sex, the art of flirtation in a way that corresponded to the paidean standard. Eros conformed to the ethos and sexual behaviors of the Hellenes. It was not a contemplative function, but a merging, unifying, attractive force. Philia was the component of friendship, koinonia, or "togetherness." If you are looking for a good treatise on friendship, you should read Plutarch's escapades in writing. Philia was the cementing bond that outlasted marriage. It is important to note that holding hands was the symbol of marriage, clearly seen on Roman tomb reliefs. Rings were a status symbol worn sparingly, unless you wanted to be mistaken for a dancer or a generally loose person. I digress here, but rings on the Saturnian finger were worn by Gauls and Germanic tribes. Romans preferred the thumb, right ring finger and index finger. It was Christianity that introduced rings as a marriage symbol. In the sacred pagan worlds, they never symbolized marriage or betrothal. Nobilitas, pagan, was a pejorative term invented by the Galileans that meant "villager, rustic, uncouth." The last "pagan" senators of Rome called themselves nobilitas. The nobles, let us follow in their footsteps if we have even a hint of civilized behavior.

The absolute beauty proposed in the "higher mysteries" of Diotima's teachings produced the arete (virtue) of souls. Arete heroized and perpetuated them, as well as the Isiac and Osirian khepers, the hearts in toil, like scarabs entwined. As a counterargument to purely physical love, she proposed the following. "If a person loved all bodies after acquiring them, he would decide that love for souls is of higher value". Knowledge of absolute beauty was the prerequisite for love, but not its means. Most importantly, agape was the greatest and most fundamental component of all, like the "E" stone at Delphi (Plutarch has much to say on this subject, try Harvard's Loeb collection) was to equate oneself with a god, goddesses in the world soul. In the panentheistic, henoteistic view, this was not difficult, for mortals imagined themselves to be little gods and goddesses. In the sense that they were a part of a larger divine order, as a procession of souls (procession meant "to send out," as in "metaphor"). The "E" in Delphi of the Pythonesses, Typhonesses is not to be confused with the axioms: "Know thyself" (gnothi seauton) and "Everything in moderation, nothing in excess." A guide to living well within the framework of reasonable preventive measures. A warning against destructive passions and intemperate reasons. The latter ultimately lead to the destruction of happiness in life — and the inability to properly receive the oracle of the hypophets. There were practical reasons for such advice. One need only observe how the modern world has violated such advice to see where it has gone wrong.

A touching anecdote: I once asked an elderly gentleman for directions to a certain place, he advised me to the best of his ability, and I thanked him profoundly. When he noticed that I was traveling with my girlfriend, he smiled and wished us "an abundance of love." Let me also convey these wishes to my readers in a diotimical tone.

Metaphysics of Society

Ideas are undoubtedly the hidden engines of society. They envelop historically created contents, newly arranged and developed information, which constitute their dynamic structure. Ideas, as masters of men, rule our thoughts, whether we passively socialize into them, mix them, or generate them. The idea is all-powerful, it secretly entangles itself in conditioning, it leads to ingenious breakthroughs. Those who control the spread of ideas are the masters of the human race, those who create false or true realities negotiate their form, those who fertilize and manipulate our dreams, visions, desires and whims have already won us over. The Narrative Institutes are running at full speed to serve the media that seek to control the reception of ideas and their creation, insofar as they have taken on the task of preserving order and controlling the threads that run through the views of many people.

They are summarized as self-consistent or inconsistent universes of thought, rational or irrational, logical or illogical, as long as one holds to them - they represent a true reality in the eye of the beholder, just as delusions do in the mind of a psychotic - they are subjectively tangible as an irresolvable experience in a fixed state. They have their own heuristic topology to explain the world, interpret it for us, and provide an interface to understand it through the lenses of reality tunnels.

In this context, paradigms can be defined as a set of mutually intelligible ideas enclosed in a basic system of certainty about reality that one's mind inhabits and that provide the default starting point for imagining interpretive and performative activity involved in one's role in the world. These paradigms overlap, compete, compensate, agree or disagree, harmoniously exchange ideas, or bring each other into great confusion.

We can call paradigms the most reducible set of relatively consistent ideas, preserving their internal logic in an indestructible, irreducible way. In truth, beyond these limits, paradigms dissolve into simple ideas or clustered networks of ideas. They can be cataloged according to various human activities, whether political, social, scientific, religious, metaphysical, technological, or artistic: their metastructure is a stasis of all paradigms, an archetype of the sociological and biopsychological maneuvers of homo symbolicus, a being capable of creating and thinking about symbols. This pool of paradigms is not limitless, just as human phenotypes of mind are not limitless, there are things common to all humans in their diversity.

It is this symbolic activity that enables the abstraction of the world, the terra incognita of primitive humans who populated the self-generating symbols of an uncanny territory reflected in the senses and the mind that constituted the development of civilization. Beyond the participation mystique at the interface between tribal man and nature, separation began as the shell of object-object split into subject-object and the world became reified. Everything else is the refinement of sym-bolization, from the first cave paintings to man-made structures to technology. From the great metaphysics and rituals to the alienation of existentialism and self-destructive relativistic postmodernism.

Paradigms are situated in a socio-historical continuum that changes along networks of ideas. Beliefs are simply beliefs derived from one strand of a paradigm that is historically established along the pre-existing present and inculcated into each new generation. The study of beliefs is, in fact, a study of the historical beliefs that result from the codification of human experience over time. Aretology, the study of virtue and values, is a study of historical changes in civilizational, cultural ethos, and morality that advances many different ideas across social formations derived from human arrangements over time.

It is important to remember that beliefs are not facts, but they have their function-namely, to maintain social cohesion and, to some extent, intra-societal trust. Insofar as belief systems are sets of beliefs, they constitute a system that stores memories of non-factual historical events; it is the a-historical mythology of religion.

What has to do with factual events in this context is the history of ideas with the historicity of beliefs - that is, when was the idea or belief developed, how did it change over time, how was it interpreted and reinterpreted? This is a teleology of the historian of ideas and the historian of religion.

On the other hand, he who deals with the history of beliefs and interprets them as true is either a theologian or a metaphysicist. He who submits to beliefs and acts upon them without questioning them is a subject of history and power, a believer or a priest-magician in the service of a particular belief system.

These actions maintain traditions but do not reform them - what is not renewed with fresh blood according to time and age is doomed to rot. Who deals with beliefs as with the toys of a wayward pointer, who plays hide and seek, conceal and reveal with them, and who acts upon them as a philosopher. In the words of Alfred North Whitehead in Process and Reality, "There are titans who erect belief systems, religions, and titans who shatter them to build, reform, and promote new forms." Much better if they lean on the arms of giants, unlike anarchists with their infantile destrudo. You do not have to have an anarchist conviction to be one - the latent degeneration of apolitical animals into servile tools of power is a life without arche, auto-kraton, self-government among self-governing free people who participate in an organization, a mature political institutionalism built on codifications of earlier political, paidean experiences. So it is with historical, political and social arrangements.

It does not postulate relativity, but masters a function: a philosopher in the traditional, ancient sense works within an order (cosmos) and discovers it anew each day, equipped with a method, using beliefs as experiments to extract meaningful information and invest it in a system of functioning, experiential paradigms, examining aspects of the discoveries from all sides and sharing perspectives with his discoveries. This is, after all, an objective order into which intersubjective universes of ideas, insights, and impressions are woven.

He or she philosophizes, therefore, sets wisdom as the highest virtue in aretological undertakings and creates a number of other virtues and values that gather around it like bridegrooms after they have been revealed and understood.

However, what distinguishes a philosopher from a theurgist or a magician is that the latter devote their entire lives to practicing philosophy and tying that practice into a sacred knot with metaphysics to be performed, not speculated upon. A magical hypophet (world interpreter) is to a mystical prophet as a sage is to a soothsayer. The former wants to know the laws that operate in an occult way and is not satisfied with beliefs about them. He does not desacralize the Hyperion machinery (Hyperion was the transcendent sun in ancient Greece), but ponders over it and weaves with the mystics who give him understanding and knowledge when his mind is ready to receive the seals, ideas and sigils. Depending on the preparation, depending on the need, depending on the talent.

The prophet, the religious leader wants to prophesy from what he knows, maintaining an established tradition to proclaim the future from a set of strict doctrines. Usually he misses the mark completely, and only a mystic can know himself without understanding why or how. But mystics and magicians exist even without religion. Dogma-based religion even threatens them as a burden if they do not submit to the dubious testimonies of its opioids of cemented tradition and power over beliefs.

To return to homo symbolicus: Hermetic and modern magic is a symbolically elaborated structure of civilized shamanism, working with discovered and revealed signs of highly developed paradigms within the laws of the deep world. They stand monolithically, abysmally above everything. The most original law, which can be called a force that governs the cosmos of phenomena, is that of Ananke, necessity, because destiny is necessary for everything that is.

Let us remember that the mind, the heart and the soul are influenced along the instinctive, bio-psychological lines according to the respective topology of a cartographic map, rarely that of the Terra Incognita, according to the Logos (principle, exponent) of the times and their spirit. If we look beyond, it is metaphysical forces, astralistic configurations, by which change in societies, groups and individuals can be seen, whether we consider them true forces of time or the process of social change. It is neither a progress nor an evolution, on the contrary, it is an accumulation of technology and matter, science and knowledge in the adaptation stages of human paradigms and the changes they inflict on the noosphere. Is there a contradiction between Aeon's logos and acts of humans? Ultimately, there is none, but those who understand and pitch to the Zeitgeist are ultimately moving through the path of least resistance in furthering times, and against the tide in less favourable ones.

Golden times - the mythical Saturnium Regnum - are unified, in which the movement of the animal self and the pneumatic aspects are in harmony and move upward, into the whole, toward the celestial vaults and the divine function and the resolved tensions of opposites in proportion and justice. In an entropic way, they grow in unison, resolving the opposites in the transcendent third, resolving conflicts, as a superposition of well resolved decisions and judgments.

In contrast, movement into decaying, degenerative times is characterized by the animal self and the pneumatic aspect moving down the scale, dormant, asleep, latent, scattered and alienated, collapsing and separating into themselves, or coagulating around the dense substance of tamas, the ego-grasping self in which the eidola revel in images of illusion.

Mythotheological reading

In this hypothetical law, a model perhaps, in which the engaging force of heaven (Uranos) is dependent on the form-giving chaos, in other words a Daoist-Chaldean scenario in which the descending unity is gradually enclosed by a chaotic fire, while this unity of force provides the order and grammar of the universe, a cosmos (order, ornament) its physical and metaphysical laws, it also disintegrates into chaotic Typhon's entropies on the macro level of deep "cosmic hells", the void of "Tartarus", first in their necessary (Ananke) "border areas", then in weaker, turbulent elements, to finally nihilate itself in Sunyata-Loka.

The divine fire remains unconquered, therein it remains transcendent. What descends is the force that separated from it and yet is permeated by it, it is this force that is held in form, chaos is both the nurturer, the provider, the disorganizer and the destroyer. It is a game of entropy with two functions: Harmony and disharmony between initiation, penetration, regeneration, decay and destruction.

The Pythagorean tetractys, in its moving yet unmoving structure, is enclosed within itself as hypostasis, it is described as the universal decad, whose manifestation in the phenomenal universe is inevitably drawn into the phenomenal structure to dissolve through the bifurcation of matter and energy, all that is enclosed in form. The decadal tetraktys is to the phenomenal world as the arche is to the typology of tokens in the philosophy of mathematics. The arche is indestructible, the token, the postarchic, is susceptible to change, movement, "war of rapid movements of forces" in the ever-changing but indivisible world.

The war is understood here as a clash of different forces, the war can be peaceful and concordant or violent and combustible. In other words, the essential force captured by the form-giving chaos is fragmented and driven into disintegration by a "war of chaos" against the archaically created order. This also relates to the human world, as various socio-historical logoi demonstrate.

For example, coordination and friendship, cooperation are a harmonious way to balance the whole between individuals, groups, etc. While this can be broken down by the law of "coagulation" into enmity, antagonism, separatism, factionalism, an entanglement by the Shadow, the Black Sun, the Tunnels of Seth, the Voids of Chaos, drawn from the Void into a totally violent formless mass in the order of descent and formlessness; it can also be reflected in social superstructures and likened to the Solar rule of freedom and order, fasci with a Frygian cap (original meaning: harmony, order, force, liberation) ethos and logos, preservation and regeneration, reform by age into wisdom.

In times of change, the essences of these things move from one state to another, depending on the socio-political noospheric topographies of the current state. Otherwise, decay would be permanent and inevitable, irreversible, at least given the undulating patterns of the state of human affairs.

The Trimurti principle, that is: initiation, renewal, regeneration, decay, destruction, are the three main descriptions of the forces of change in relation to the inceptive force and the formative chaos, the seed (Pater) and the nourisher (Mater), eternal time (Kronos) and the rivers of time (Rhea), creation (Uranus) and the generative force of life (Aphrodite Genetrix), Marduk (Ordering Artifex) and Tiamat (Carved out Chaos).

In terms of individuals maintaining some common sense and shared knowledge on a cognitive-behavioural level, the patterns and ideas that animate them change from time to time, and they are defined by the movement of desires towards a subject, in other ways it is a question of "what do they want?", "what are they?" as a group, as individuals, etc.

The patterns in the different variations and mutations have the same roots as described by the oriental masters, they only change the content of the narrative, the meta-narrative remains by and large unmodified. For example, there is no true post-modernism, but a meta-narrative of generality that denies the meta-narrative in its subject in detachment from symbolism and creates monstrosities in the cellars of human consciousness, a "laboratory of macabresques detached from the impulse of the whole and mutating at will, denying each other and denying their dependence on the laboratory."

The government of impulses, the "weapons of mass distraction" in the age of adherence to mere "signs and tokens" (semiotic-semantic fetishes), which in Kalacakra Tantra is the Kali Yuga, is ultimately the denial of self-mastery. This denial leads to a certain modern animism, a participation mysticism of the "monkey man", becomes the participation technologique, in which people merge with the technosphere and the chaosphere and become their subjects and slaves.

The generator and the generatrix are switched off and it is a time of passive inertia. Inertia always submits to the attraction of emptiness, because the law of initiation, of creation is that of elan vital, its vital expression. Active magical actions and meditative equipose is a form of dharmadatu - positive emptiness of sunyata. Inertia is a way of being consumed by Tiamat, of being engulfed by the endless fall into objective emptiness, in society it means lacklustre fall, better than malicious destruction, but worse than idleness in value, any noble value.

By observing the changes in the "now" and building bridges to the historical past, we can find the key to the changes. We need not look to the stars for such signals, for astralistic currents can be deduced from changes in the patterns of the earth and then established and predicted with masterful insight and foresight. It is the technological-material bondage of the thinking of modernity that is the "piercing wedge," a bottleneck for some incoming, established transitional forces.

Just as Abrahamic religions were a regressive factor that “wedged and fossilised” the developments of high antiquity and degenerated their growth, so the modern environment of technocratic-bureaucratic, oligarchic power is a hidden brutalising factor that obscures the rapid change of the times and ties the hands of expression in its most natural and magnificent flowering. Power and wealth are here a conservative factor, clinging to itself as long as it contemplates the damage to its own foundations, so that reform is possible.

Enclave of Value: Patterns in defence of Arete

The character sows the destiny, the discipline mends the behavior, the daimon directs to the epitome of the arete, because it is to be understood with this high muse.

What is the real value of virtue? Is the golden chain of virtue equal to the iron chain of vice, which is internally empty and contains no essential dharmas? Is it merely a social construct that is completely relative? What is the value of virtue in the modern world.

Aretology deals with such questions. In nihilism, such values are completely overridden; in aspects of the sociology of ignorance, values are mere automatisms inculcated into society by socialization through mentors and peers throughout history and the mutability of the history of ideas in the noosphere. Even if we were to take the wisest man who could bridge the ancient past and modern times, and get him with his great historical insight into causality to tell us what is of value, he would not pull universal laws out of a hat. Aretological instincts depend on stability, wisdom, discernment, and good judgment in every situation and event forever linked to the human environment and the personal characteristics of the observer of thought, speech, and action. Deriving virtues from observations and internalizing them is reasonable, but is not it a struggle against adversity that creates an asylum of values that hardly anyone can relate to? "If you pitch your song too high, no one will follow you," were the words of Du Fu.

There is not a single man who is coherent, understandable and rock solid in his insistence to be noble. This is because nobility is forever linked to a set of practiced virtues and a love of great beauty and reverence that transcends the land of men. Most of us may have the image of a "knight in shining armor" in our minds, implying that virtue is devalued in modern times. Rather, imagine an ordinary person who overcomes his weaknesses and endures great turmoil to excel and absorb those hard-won essences. This is not stupidity, but a deep understanding, a profound essence, a gravity of barely surviving things, the lightness, subtlety, kindness and grace outward, the resolute diamond carrying the imperial obsidian sword hidden.

As a metaphysician, I find that the gigantomachy of virtues is a process of searching for a key to the divine, a homoiosis theio. What virtues, you ask? The daimon and ethos are different for each man and woman and are ultimately measured by objective, transcendent laws, but we have no direct access to this world, we can derive approximations based on ideas and experienced revelations. Where wisdom and laws of nature, Earth and men are approached, the Divine land of notions tends to unfold, too. Gods do not contradict nature, they further its hypostasis. It is a process of constant interpretation, a hypophetic "hermeneuien". After all, it is a cosmos and not a chaos. As for the nature of the lion, its lionlessness, is a Ding-an-Sich, but it is different for each lion. What belongs to the nature of man is his humanity, but it is different in every man - vibrations of bestiality and idyll follow, but ultimately this is necessary to distill what is of use and "ipsa vene bibendi", drink your own poison to heal yourself as if you were taking a spagyric medicine.

Do not think of virtue as a "boastful thing, a thing of impractical fools," for now every thief, scoundrel, and swindler will cry out, "Loser, fool," and will use the first attempt to use his cunning in stealing as proof. This is a society of high-ranking cheats, scoundrels and thieves that are institutionalized, only the petty criminals are relegated to the courts and prisons, there is a general social acceptance of many behaviors that are contrary to the interests of a reasonable society.

Why should we ever engage in noble enterprises when any thief can rob us of our possessions, any swindler can slander our reputation and good name, any scoundrel can plot against us. There remains something of psychological transparency. When you are drawn into vice, you build a behavioral identity based on the same premises as the adaptive swindler. In fact, you have much to gain in this way - from a purely materialistic point of view, it is smarter to be a great, uncaught criminal than a decent human being. From the big picture point of view, it's better to work towards the tip, but if most people's insight ends at the tip of their nose, what are we talking about? They are like market women, incessantly twittering rubbish, thinking they are engaged in something very, very important.

Only people who openly act upon their gigantomachy tower above the rest in practice. The gigantomachy of those in power, of those who rule over people, is greater than that of monks. That is why one so often finds petty crooks in government, whose ineptitude is masked by psychopathic self-delusions, lies, and the persistent fear that they will be confronted, stripped of their trappings, the charm of status, tested and condemned, a true gigantomachy would tear them to shreds. A magician who fights against perversities, deviations and vices is in a lonely position, but in a more honest one – because he is alone with the alone, as the Sufi saying goes – with the deserts and the gods.

Semiotic Fetishes and the Battle for Re-enchanting the Soul

"There is no chance, and no anarchy, in the universe. All is system and gradation. Every god is there sitting in his sphere. The young mortal enters the hall of the firmament: there is he alone with them alone, they pouring on him benedictions and gifts, and beckoning him up to their thrones. On the instant, and incessantly, fall snow-storms of illusions. He fancies himself in a vast crowd which sways this way and that, and whose movement and doings he must obey: he fancies himself poor, orphaned, insignificant. The mad crowd drives hither and thither, now furiously commanding this thing to be done, now that. What is he that he should resist their will, and think or act for himself? Every moment, new changes, and new showers of deceptions, to baffle and distract him. And when, by and by, for an instant, the air clears, and the cloud lifts a little, there are the gods still sitting around him on their thrones, — they alone with him alone." — Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882)

The tyranny of signs and symbols that become commodities are the weapons of mass distraction. The power of the symbol evokes an otherworldly grandeur, it is an intricate web of meanings that must be learned, studied, absorbed and mastered. It speaks to the general consciousness, it explores the hidden meanings in the hidden occult layers of the human psyche, mind and soul.

From a magical point of view, sacred vowels such as "Aum" — for example, in Hinduism and Buddhism — symbolize positive emptiness. The "Aum" is connected by sacred bonds with the ancient times and all the users who signed under this symbol and commented it with their mastery, their life, their excellence. Symbols have their own life.

Modern symbols, such as the Bluetooth symbol, are an interesting kind of auto-token because it symbolizes an entire network that stands for connectivity between devices, people, egos, and IDs, and includes the symbol in its seamless integration. It is self-referential and as such a most interesting example.

As we walk the streets of a busy city, we receive thousands of stimuli that we ignore. Most of them, advertising, fight for dominance in the symbolic sphere. The names, signs, marketed products, tulpas of models, actors and politicians lead a second life in the public symbolic sphere. On the psycho-physical level the regular psychology, the depth psychology, the depth sociology with all its influence works. On the psychomagic level we are influenced by a highly dense hyper-infotainment into which our mind and soul enter.

It is almost impossible to break free from this grip of distracting bombardment, to switch off, to concentrate — to focus and overcome this horror of signs. To move in the great unexplored territories of inner truth and knowledge, in the movements of change and time, which are directed against the depth of existence.

If everything is profane, there is no sacred: profane, that is "touched by men", sacred, that is religio "untouched cytherea of Aphrodite", the evasive essence of the untold, unsaid, that must be interpreted, hypophetically translated, told, communicated according to Socratic irony, like the story of a distant, long ago saga that belongs to a world that is no more.

Modern symbols are a matter of the market, not the sacred; even in the sacred context, religious symbols function like a faith-marketing scenario to enchant unleashed subjects of desires, hopes, dreams — the ordinary dreams that are bought and sold, for which the need and desire created, accelerated, satisfied in a stalled closed circuit of the death of symbolic man, the domesticated cattle that has turned its greatest gift — the ability to symbolize the unsaid, to turn it into language, to create impossible worlds — into its trap.

Every invention of an authentic saturnine man, woman is perverted by time, because there are worms that crawl and find ways to enslave mankind with their creations, that is their purpose — to captivate. They want to exploit, drink and suck the lifeblood of man's mind, heart and soul until he no longer exists. Every Prometheus who kindles a new flame for humanity becomes Kronos, who watches wistfully as his gifts are squandered, as an act of creation is always associated with transience and corruption.

The virtuality of the symbolic sphere in the chaosphere penetrates man and vaults him into a new grave, and this grave is transformed into another — a matryoshka of death, until he is buried to such an extent that there is no longer any possibility of perceiving him alternatively and freely. He is offered only surrogates of knowledge, forever blinded, forever placed in the position of false ideas, delusions, ignorance chasing ignorance, until — he forgets how many sarcophagi separate him from the Platonic world beyond the cave. He does not even stare at the shadows, he is chased into the deepest catacombs of a whole network of caves from which there is no way out — his despair, his ache for knowledge is his end or in rare cases the lantern of the hermit — his guide out of the labyrinth of the Minotaur, following the thread of Ariadne into the embrace of Artemis.

Where is the beauty? Eros peri to Kalon, the binding agape follows beauty, the esthetics of the art of life and forces are the proportions of harmony, the unfrozen cacophonies of modern men's and women's agonies sing a terrible song when they combine to the insanities of this age. We become what we consume — what we embody — what is our pleasure, where our thoughts and dreams follow, aim, decide to effect. Choose your weapon of doom or the rose of ascension, here lies the prison of the panopticon, or the authentic, heroic life that draws from time, from the time beyond, from the sources of the abyss and the Eleusinian revelations. It is the effect of all karmans, the genius, the daimon of life, which is the starting point. There is no way to deceive the universe, nor a lie that contradicts the world. People are masters of self-deception and call it "lying." They think they can outdo themselves and others, outdo the sun — this honest luminary is detached from both death and this competition.

What value do metaphysics and deities have in a land that considers realization to be fantasy, for the distraction of an infantile bunch from life while turning to the fetishes of the everyday symbolic circus that has long been perverted, subverted, sabotaged, created, marketed, targeted. It is better to believe in Pegasus and ethereal muses and be inspired by beauty than to follow a corporate logo, policy or new product that devours ancient myth to sell itself and grab your emotions by the throat and kill your focus on the important things, the essentials in life.

Thoughts on Asobimanabu

A term coined by Fujiki Hayato, composed of asabu and manabu: Manabu means to study and learn, Asabu generally means to play reality. The most honest magician is a child in the game – then the game is authentic, although it is a mere mask whose authenticity resounds through the worlds like a thunderclap. The other is the innocent madman, just as Mother Nature unleashes her madness in a storm. As a child matures in his play, and the madman overcomes delirium and directs his passion from the world, through the world, for the world, and into the world, he becomes a true man or woman of the day – a cosmic swindler subject only to the gods.

I have turned my attention to the games we all play, those sophisticated games we learn in childhood, which change over the centuries through psychosocial forces, constellations, arrangements, compositions, calibrations, yet are somehow hardwired into the general spirit of humanity and its childhood and maturity. Happy games, miserable games, cruel games, games of virtue, games of vice. As we grow older, they simply gain weight, become more complex, and we do not remember their former purpose, form, and motive as clearly. When we are children and run joyfully, we know it is joy; when we hit another child out of anger, we make him cry or hit him back; when we protest and are angry, we cry or scream. Where is the maturity in that? It's not about killing the child in us, it's about refining all those instincts into something beautiful, it's about growing into a grand personaliy. This is where developmental psychology comes in, but is not developmental psychology a product of a mature child watching other children play? Are not most mature people like children? They have forgotten the image of their youth and yet behave like spoiled children! So we play asobimanabu, we play being polite and courteous, we play being unhappy and angry, we play being educated and powerful, we play all that, and if it has any relation to reality, then we must be playing a very serious game! But it is an illusion that we are engaging in, an abstract game with symbols. When I was a child, my mother said to me before a piano recital I was giving, "Do not be afraid of people of rank or of examiners, imagine they shit on the toilet, are they different?". That was true all my life. Although I value people of rank, as I derived from my reason and observation, as was my nature, I do not feel inferior or intimidated by someone who is rich, powerful, or famous. I just do not consider those values worthy, I lean towards other virtues of a philosophical nature. I'd rather bow to a wise, humane beggar than a clown of power, an armed shrimp or a famous idiot.

The next time you do something of consequence, think of it as a game: "You play that you go to work," "You play that you work," "You play that you get your paycheck." It's a simple cognitive twitch that costs you nothing but drives away worry. It is dropping the mind and body on the spot, cutting all links of karma, at least suspending them for a while. This process is called the loosening of attachments. The next time you have an argument with your boyfriend or girlfriend, think of it as a play. Once when I was arguing with my sweetheart, I introduced her to a pair of puppets, one was me, the other was her. We were arguing with the puppets when she got involved in this game, and then we immediately realized how foolish the whole situation was when we fell into each other's arms.We experience pain and suffering, but we play solutions and try to overcome it, like a child who is scared or beaten, he grits his teeth without understanding why, and he develops pain. As adults, we become more tired and tense, more disciplined and stiff, more dominant and aggressive, more bitter and bitchy when the pain we suffered is out of proportion to the healing solutions we find. There are limits to what a mind, heart and soul can tolerate. Yet, to overcome all that is truly heroic. In the first case it is neuroplasticity and conditioning, in the next it is emotions and emotional deprivation, and in the last it is either growth or pain and deformation.

The same applies to learning: an educated person must be some kind of genius! Wrong! We are all wrong and subject to cognitive biases. But learning is a game, just as education should be, it is the playful way of dealing with thoughts and taking pleasure in ideas. Just as a child builds a sand castle by the sea, we build our little castles of ideas from the material at hand, how beautiful it is! And when someone comes and sees what we have built, they may say, "Wow, what a great castle you have built!" Or on the contrary, he will mischievously destroy it and kick the sand around. Both possibilities are on the table, but the latter will make the other child cry or make him very unhappy. Then he will take revenge or hold a grudge against the "world that wronged him," even though it was only a small injury that he experienced.

Computational succubae and other hybrids

The chaospheric hybridization of the superstructure of ideas combined with the high velocity of information captured in structural patterns and accelerating in kaleidoscopic mutations is the hallmark of the modern world. The more we engage with this big picture, digesting information from data centres and storytelling machines, the faster we are drawn into it; the further we move away from it – we modern "Luddists" – the less effect it has on us. The only breaking point is our cognitive ability to cope with this ultra-high dynamic entropy of constant upheaval. Modern man's skills relate primarily to the ability to think clearly, in hierarchies, priorities, critically, in spite of this flood that diversifies with infinite speed of information. These fluctuations lead to superficially produced computerised entities with high entropy that outpace human development by a million times.

The fetishization of technology created its own religion, which interacts with the astral echoes it creates in the lives of many people. A whole network of succubic entities (I think you can take the bestiaries of the world and translate them into psychosocial phenomena that occur on the Internet, but let us sexualize it) abuses the users who invest their cognitive-emotional abilities in solid-state intelligence. The pneumatic aspects of human beings are referred to the technological network, giving them thousands of identities in interaction, creating astral double corps floating in the eighth sphere – the cybersphere.

The cybersphere and SSI merge the logic of hardware and software with the spectral shadow of this system, it is an electronic straitjacket placed over the electromagnetic spectrum and interpreted into magical computers. The logic and processes of every electronic circuit, every circuit board, every processor connected to the power grid are translated into discrete pseudo-astral emanations whose work resembles the thought forms of the mental sphere of man. The thought forms of machines are similar in that they have their own language (electronic circuit logic, low level machine programming languages) and emit a complex output. A machine can talk to a machine, a human needs an interface compatible with the machine's I/O signalling, or the ability to tap into the discrete emanations from where he could – theoretically – reverse engineer and most likely damage the electronic device.

In such a world, technology is the foundation, a class of physical engineers and architects (who design, build, and maintain fusion power plants, for example) is necessary. The predominant master class will be those engineers who can design, build, and maintain sophisticated computer fetish infrastructures for users who treat them like "black magic" or simply engage with the technology at the necessary level.

The more you disconnect from the Internet of Things, which is used mindlessly, and the more you are able to tap into the web of these resources, for example, the SSI egregore, the more control you have over the succubae entities that control users and feast on their minds, emotions, and sexuality. Do not let yourself turn into a technological moron who consumes services and builds dependencies on the blind use of technology that turns you into a mere slave and cattle for milking resources.

Doxa, Theoria, Praxis and Beliefs

The sun represents justice, truth and power. In ancient Rome, contracts were signed under the sun when the sun was present. It stands for wrath and glory, stability and intellect derived from its constitution and soul. On the surface of the earth, its presence during the day has given rise to a never-ending series of myths. It is the most reassuring cycle of time that has been ingrained in souls since the dawn of human consciousness.

Yet, people rally around most history-driven processes that blindly contradict the fundamentals of those processes, indulging in the most satisfying falsehoods, giving in to an illusion of temporary order, comfort and control. A Japanese prince was quoted in the "Shobogenzo" by Master Dogen, saying, "What is true for one is false for another, what is false for one is true for another."

It is enough to learn from the ancient Greek courts that the testimony of witnesses was of less value than that which resulted from probability and proven evidence. People see what they want to see, they believe what they want to believe: Satisfy their eyes, ears, and beliefs, and you are a friend, bribe them, persuade them, and they'll see what you want them to see. Rhetorics was always a political discipline. Disagree with them and you will be mocked or ridiculed at best, and at worst you will become their nemesis. The honest survive only among like-minded people, the cunning until they are caught.

Look at the beliefs bubbling in the noosphere, examine their logic, rationality, reason, evidence, facts, expertise, knowledge. Even in such risky areas as metaphysics, reason is necessary, especially among the non-believers, to make an argument. With believers, however, be it a political stance, a religious system, a delusional conspiracy theory, a justification for one's behavior and feelings – none of these are required. In this way, ignorance is a-historical, not only that, it is anti-historical.

For example, how many attacks had survived the Christian fortress besieged by the brightest minds and "adversaries". How many brainwashed souls and minds and hearts would sacrifice their lives, freedoms, decency and intelligence so that this great historicized lie could thrive. And yet it persists! No one wants to abolish faith as such. It is necessary to metaphysize man in order to complete him, but not at the cost of thwarting and shackling his soul with pain, suffering, guilt, condescending hypermorality and doctrines that destroy his mind and soul.

The politicization and weaponization of faith as organizing narrative machines and tools of control are practical precisely because of the tenacity of faith and the need to fill the existential and spiritual void. No one wants to abolish the science behind the CERN accelerator or the ITER fusion project, but there are few experts from the Earth's population capable of understanding and building them. ITER and CERN do not fulfill existential needs, but technological visions of the future. No one wants to abolish faith either, save for raging atheists that engage in faithful scientism, but faith is simple, millions can follow without a second question asked. There have been attempts to impregnate religions with reason, for example, neoplatonizing Ismaili Islam, neoplatonizing Christian writers of the Renaissance, but all these attempts have failed because neoplatonism – at least as espoused by Plotinus – was anti-gnostic, anti-Galilean, and anti-Christian and – demanding high virtue of Intellectual acumen. For exactly the same reasons, these religions had nothing to do with reason-guided faith, and no matter how hard one tried, they could not be, because reason would dismantle them to the core as irrational, as early as in 2nd and 3rd century Celsus and Porphyry tackled the issue. Yet Christianity and Islam endure to this day, and Neoplatonism is a hobby of a handful of philosophers, small interest groups, and academics.

The curse of expert knowledge is "if everyone knew, they would know." They will not because it is not within the scope of their intellectual endeavors. The blessing of politics is, "They do not know, so we use it." Analogously, the curse of history is "it will repeat itself if they do not know", the blessing of power is "we will use the same methods to repeat it".

Now, the damage done to intellectual culture in civilized societies is immense. The destruction of the ability to think critically and in an informed manner, to research and acquire a comprehensive knowledge of a subject is, by and large, reserved for the few. Among people of faith and religious orientation, there is a great ignorance of the history, origins, changes and discourse of one's faith. With preference, people pick the cherries from the pie that most appeal to a believer. There is no single monolithic religion; there are small fluctuating sectarian beliefs that would be considered heresy among the orthodox. And yet they all claim to be the deepest, truest, and most useful.

On this point, I prefer the honest Iamblichean stance, that: "theology and philosophy were created by men for men, there was no God-given revelation." He was not a petty believer, he was a thamaturgist and a theurgist of Neoplatonic faith. Yet he was well aware of his "cloud of unknowing," his apophatic uncertainty, and the origin of all myths, religions, etc. The way we create beliefs in deities and act in them in the world is our simulation, a projection as long as it is effective – it holds, but it is never objectively true. In this sense, I prefer "approximate knowledge" or "uncertain truths" to "revealed religions" and "incontrovertible doctrines." I believe in Gods, because to my experience, they are both empirical and ideational, yet it is an ontological assertion. The rest is derived from a simulation, a projection, for Nature likes to hide and Divinity is on a mountain of truth, far removed from human minds, the old Parmenidean axiom of "doxa".

We may have opinions, Divinities reply: "these are mere opinions". In metaphysics there are opinions and experiences, there are no facts and scientifically measurable quantitative results. This framework relates to politics in metapolitics, too. There is only as much chaos as nature will tolerate, insofar as human nature and its civilized, idyllic or bestial, cruel structure will allow. The laws of entropy work, golden ages pass, iron ages set in. Better to build a fortress of cognoscendi around an illumined head than engage in failing times, yet without engagement the purpose and meaning goes astray.

Victims of History, Masters of History

Only those who see the great history are great historians, only those who can penetrate beyond the present into unexplored territory to form a new statue of time are reformers, visionaries, revolutionaries. These poor victims of the times in which they live, do they even realize how they are spinning unhappily, suspended on the wheel of death?

What distinguishes a strategist from a tactician is not only his field of vision, his perspective, but also his mastery of time. The victims of history may change the great story, but they do it foolishly, en masse, rarely individually, unaware of the consequences, drawn into their machinery like Joanne D'Arc, made by history, they make history. On the other hand, they make history by shaping people, time and the age, always with a great goal in mind, a stratagem, as Napoleon did.

They do not want to be driven by the waves of time, they have gone beyond the rivers of Lethe, they have pursued and hunted Tyche to assert their vision, which they see clearly from the beginning and until the end.

Giordano Bruno was a victim of history, but a stubborn and committed one, Julius Caesar was a master of history, but the lady turned her daggers against him.

Indeed, the first training of a magician should be to get out of history, but only after its careful study, after recognizing patterns, cycles, changes, souls of times and their metamorphoses. Only from this vantage point can one find comfort in the cathedral of time that silently watches and commands after the fleshly flesh has been stripped away like the skin of a snake, like a cicada, like a firefly that has broken its egg.

Every magician should be a visionary in the purest sense, able to carry his ideas into the world, into hearts, into minds and into souls. If he loses the thread and sinks into pettiness, he is a headless leader who has been elevated to a position of influence, and the crowd listens to an idiot because he has ingratiated himself with the status of men of power. They are right because they are powerful, if they are wrong they are still in power, if they are corrupt and ugly — they are still in power, let us mutter about it, scream, hate, but the facts and influence remain the same.

The people who are in the majority are victims of the process, they rarely develop into something that deeply understands the affairs of the world, rarely all matters on a metaphysical basis. The seamless continuity of the threads in which they are interwoven blinds them to the alternative of a genuine rediscovery of the genius, the ethos, the daimon of their own selves.

Without reason they are not the carvers of their statues, not the architects of their works, for they simply lose their footing under the processes in which they are entangled and which lead them ruthlessly into oblivion. This is so.

Do we want more anarchs (a clear Jüngerian term)? It would be despicable for people of genius to think that all are equal. If they were, they would be deprived of genius — excellence among men varies with the times, in good times it is difficult to excel, in times of decline to excel in valuable qualities, character, excellence even of the worst sort: it is all too easy to be a wise man among fools, or a virtuous man among degenerates.

But this postmodern sage of virtue would be a beggar in the golden ages that come and go as they please, in tune with the waves of socio-historical transmutations and the ideoscope and noosphere of each society.

However, being outstanding does not mean transcending time. A brilliant villain can do this, as history has proven and continues to do. The return to great history does not take place in waning times, and so the final conclusion is this:

It is the awareness of times, centuries, millennia in societies that is not a dry historical process but a living understanding that is a transformative and regenerative force in societies, it is the absence of this historical instrument for living and transcending history that permeates processes as they undergo their own organizational entropy.

When people lose this understanding and live only in the present as if it were forever, the fall has occurred, they have lost the memory that characterized the Hellenic Eroi, it is the Lady Mnemosyne that embodies Aletheia, they become in fact the victim of the process that becomes a lackluster force of dissolution.

In the present time, many are victims of technological amnesia, they live in the present in an outgrowth of technology and are all amnesiacs who have devoted themselves to the "power of now". This power is only present in those who are timeless, otherwise it is an indication that the ignorant want to remain so.

Xeno-Sexual Politics of Modernity

> This Be The Verse
> They fuck you up, your mum and dad. They may not mean to, but they do. They fill you with the faults they had
> And add some extra, just for you. But they were fucked up in their turn
> By fools in old-style hats and coats, Who half the time were soppy-stern
> And half at one another's throats. Man hands on misery to man. It deepens like a coastal shelf. Get out as early as you can, And don't have any kids yourself.
> Philip Larkin, "This Be the Verse" from Collected Poems. Copyright © Estate of Philip Larkin. Source: Collected Poems (Farrar Straus and Giroux, 2001)

It is not the libido that filters psychological complexes and group content, socialized contexts and relational dynamics. It is the complex, the content, the context, the relational settings that filter the libido. Sexual urges project onto existing complexes, images, engrams, and memetics through the mind and emotions of the observer.

The pansexualism of Venus states, "You can not offer more sexuality to heaven" (Austin Osman Spare, "Anathema of Zos"), probably the ancient tower of Venus, which is pan-generative and also includes all non-hominid nature (sic!), would not understand the sexual chaos of modernity, at least outside the regular limits of species self-preservation. Perhaps it is I who do not understand the change. Saturn's order calls for restraint, directing social logos toward heterosexual union and the preservation of moderation in all performative acts within a society. Pater Noster Sataurnos. The Sathyrs (Sataur, the ethymology of this world comes from Attic. Greek: penis) were known for their promiscuity, their unrestricted libido, but this aspect was unleashed in the "Saturnalia".

Nowadays it seems that we are dealing with the kitsch version of Dionisia and the ongoing Saturnalia, which are not limited to a few days in December, but to every possible day. Oneiric, lustful, narcotic waters of oblivion and uncivilization, degeneration pour in when no one is paying attention to civilized Mars (martial discipline) and Jupiter (exquisite culture and ethos).

Let us observe more closely how the modern cauldron of identities, narratives, roles and the politics of recycling, mash-up, remix among the ultra-relativists builds up against the anthropological fact that the organic unit of a society is a family. A family made up of interrelated mature roles woven into the fabric of civilizational logos and ethos.

As we know, the societal logos is globalized, flattened, degraded and dead. Defective role models and broken families raise even more confused hominid animals who fall straight into the ironic perfidy of modernity's counterculture. The old system has failed, the family is still the unit, but the destruction of the concept screams, "It's not that! We do what we want" — Athens has fallen into the sea.

The implosion of attachment figures in the chaos of post-modernity has produced xeno-sexual minds whose libidinous impulses contribute to their loss of identity. When they have only a limited pool of subjects to fuck or enough inhibitions not to sodomize a body. So there is an explosion of different fantasies, interest groups, often disturbed, sometimes innocent. Libido is crushed here by a "vulgar, insane, half-crazed, moody, narcissistic man-boy worm mixed with a lustful whore incarnate in a larva." Gather Solid State Sexual Intelligence from the Noosphere, the Internet, the Dark Web, etc. The result will probably be a many-headed, succubic, stupid bitch surrounded by her servants. If I imagine myself to be an evil red dragon with seven planetary crowns on my head, I would throw up at such a husband and wife arrangement. The SSSI of entertainment and porn is the primary representative of the modern imago, complex, content, context and relationship of humanity's libidinous energies to its sexuality. Unconscious, conscious, idealized, repressed, latent, covert and overt images often determine the libidinous "themes of love", both platonic and erotic.

In extremely masculine societies, whether in the military, prisons, monasteries, or the church, for example, instances of pederasty and submissive homosexuality are nothing new. Roman cavalrymen and some Greek philosophers frequently perpetrated such acts. The reinterpretation and redirection of libido toward the objects of value in such societies — male intellect, male strength — wraps itself around the theme of desire. In the priesthoods, the male libido is twisted into puer aeternus and senex, seeking its resolution in children. The idealized image of values cherished by, say, a Catholic priest is catalyzed in an "innocent angel," perverted and deviant as it is. Vatican magic is another matter, Meguess. In the ultra-masculine societies of the Vikings, being gay was considered a deadly offense, and humiliating an enemy often included pederasty. The status of a male boy was low and worthy of contempt. Here the values were reversed, but the filter of libido was similar to the case of Roman cavalrymen.

When it comes to queers, LGBTQ+ and so on, most people under this banner have some personality changes that seek balance in reshaping the image through which libido and desire flow. A friend of mine who asked to be referred to as "he" because she is bisexual had a fractured personality. Among many nice splits in her psyche, contributed to by constant anxiety attacks, she was a good artist. If we use NLP or personal pronouns to arm our thoughts against ourselves in structural attacks on our identity, that's a small problem. But when we force others to go down that path, it becomes harmful. We are back in the xeno-sexual bulldozer that undermines all social cohesion for the glory of more conservative societies.

We are civilized people and treat each other with respect regardless of our or others' sexuality, only brutes make an issue of it. But deluded, confused people are easier to govern with their feigned individualism. No amount of propaganda can achieve that, it is easier to detect. The best way to keep people out of power is not to lock them up, but to confuse them with themselves, their beliefs and their identity. Then you can play with their emotions and instincts all you want. This is where the great algorithm comes in. Critical thinking is dissolved and you can get on with the "brave new world" of onerous idiots. As long as the leadership privately maintains the contradiction of actually being the opposite of the societies it controls, it has the power.

So much for the "Age of Aquarius." The counter-culture pseudo-Dionisian experiment of "peace and love" proposed by Erich Fromm as a cybernetic shock therapy social engineering institute has failed. The administration of drugs to hippies, the creation of a shithouse from the brains of these people was a project that liberated the anti-war demonstrators. True, the Vietnam War was finally over. But they were not easy to govern. The problem is that they were not efficient as citizens either. Turning U.S. citizens into an army of hippies during the Cold War would not have had a sensational ending. Similarly, majority of New Age is intriguingly disenfranchised politically, perhaps fortunately, as a pocket of nonsense, but the amount of people disempowered politically engaging in this movement are a tasty root of power.

Scaling Political Memories

The present dominates everything. People have an ever shorter political memory. Even when they participate in politics at the level of chatter, they are vulnerable to everyday manipulations that exploit all sorts of cognitive weaknesses to fuel the prevailing ignorance. We are not even capable of assembling random data into a meaningful picture, as we do today on the Internet, most of the time. Critical thinking means making valid associations across disciplines and drawing the right conclusions from the available data. The products of critical thinking are coherent, inter-validated, continuous, concise, and meaningful – they help people make informed decisions and judgments about the world and act accordingly. The lack of proper education is a fact we must lament, as we live today in a spectacle of illusions, a theatron animatronique of surrogates of surrogates, dualisms within dualisms that bombastically scream, "More is better, true is invalid!" It is the majority that counts, not the downtrodden intellectuals fighting for a breath of free air. In the end, it is the largest or most powerful group that elevates and supports its elites. It can surpass and trump value with privilege, value with entitlement, wisdom with opportunism. It can trump political acumen and talent with tricks and treats for the masses. Whether people have been manipulated into this situation by social engineering or, on the contrary, by their own uniform motives, the effects are the same.

Let us take a political ideology or a political theory and examine it from the perspective of the history of ideas. It is always the effects in societies, not the premises or predictions, that are important. The historically oriented realpolitik moves on various fronts between sociology and deep sociology. Between the sociology of unknowing and knowing. It includes causal relations in international politics, physics of entropy, philosophy of process, reality and transactions in the noosphere. Includes biopsychology of groups and individuals, political psychology of in-group-out-group. This is what people have in their minds and how they interact with each other on that basis. This is the information management, dissemination, and performative realm. The explained effects of the cognitive-emotional behaviors that people engage in can be based on coherent or incoherent reasoning. They may also be completely irrational. It is the void, virtual action that produces no change whatsoever that is the root of disempowerment. The difference between virtuality and memetics and political citizenship lies in the content-rich action that effectively effects change in the political landscape.

It is very important to zoom in and out of history to get an overall view. It is very important to look at a particular era from its own perspective to understand it better. Whiggism is an attempt to redefine history from a current state of knowledge – it errs all the time. The critical bias of all current eras is that "we know better." The vector moves toward the future; the principle of antiquity was to look back. "The ancients knew better", the vector looked sentimentally to the past, if only in search of a mythical "golden age", a Saturnium Regnum.

This presentism causes simultaneous damage with its futurism, we erase our roots. Even if we try to revive ancient thought and virtues, a rare ethos – we try to put on the glasses of the modern world. The frame of reference of historicity gives us a standard of comparison. In the words of a psychiatrist, "you can not measure consciousness with a consciousness." Likewise, "you can not measure the present with the present," only time will tell – I promise.

"Presentism" has neither insight nor consequence; it is a threat. It pursues a strategy, but it does so in a loophole of its own time. It does not draw far-reaching conclusions from the past, it is fatal for political forecasts and harmful for the fabric of society.

The revivalist schools of the right wing or the conservative spectrum suffer from such "presentism through pastism." The left-wing currents suffer from a short-sighted "futurism in presentism." When the logos of a culture, of a civilization is dead, a new one must arise on the ruins. The ante-transformative phase arises in the chaosphere of the now; it does not require a revolution. The shaping of a new logo is of utmost importance, its emergence is often silent and hardly noticed by the majority. It is the repurposing and reuse of ideas that people with the attention span of a goldfish simply adapt as their own.

As for the majority, I see the world as narratives and strands of ideas fighting for dominance as bundled currents.

Each with its own standard bearers, prophets, representatives and agendas. It is truly a battle for minds and hearts, but no one is able to determine the proper measure or course of action. In the Freudian "pleasure principle," the mind goes for the nearest architecture of meaning, sense and belief. This is done to avoid the pain and suffering of transformation. This was easy when logos was available. An agenda is totalitarian and ruins the nature of people. Tyrants are always detested. They contradict the nature of anyone who is not a tyrant himself, and this fact is not recognized along the way, but as soon as it is installed. On the other hand – an abundance of relative agendas creates chaos, alienation and confusion. The right measure requires continuous engagement with many agendas. Cognitive epistemic management also includes preemptive caution against the decomposition of minds in an information overload. This makes entire societies passive to emerging tyranny. It makes preventive action to eliminate tyranny a more temporary endeavor. It sucks opponents and supporters in and feasts on their power to argue and act. Spiraling power fluctuations set on such a mutually reinforcing track spiral out of control. First to the excitement of the masses, then to their horror.

A globalized, networked world means a flattening of ideas and their mingling in a horrendous brew of advertising geared to supermarket preferences. Those who control the dreams of others control their minds and hearts. Value-based, logos-based societies are being replaced by illusion- and spectacle-based societies. Those who play with illusions play into the societies' cards. That's why identity politics and charisma-based politics are so popular right now.

Perhaps the future generation will specialize in trading in dreams with dreams. It will think that freedom is merely the ability to dream those dreams, rather than knowing what true ideas are. We are on the threshold of an oneiric age where the majority can no longer distinguish the great sleep from reality. VR is slowly threatening the minds of many people. It is not a technological virtual reality, but an oneiric virtuality in the minds and hearts of millions. An illusion that shifts from place to place, thought to thought, as people offer their sacrifices to the great gods of illusion.

The Stones of Li – A Political Fairy Tale

In the days of old, there was a kingdom called Li. Amid mountains and rivers, rich valleys and forests, it was well protected from any invasion. Unfriendly eyes observed its riches, envious of the nobility and virtues of its people. No one was troubled by their attacks, for all was beyond the reach of evildoers who ever dreamed of destroying the fortunes of the kingdom of Li. The ministers, the army, and the people lived well organized lives. They prospered in virtue and excellence, and whenever the least of them suffered from a grievance, it was alleviated by the advice of the sages. If anyone suffered hunger, he was helped by his neighbors. Justice prevailed in the kingdom, and whenever people had a grievance or a trifle that was perceived as unreasonable, the punishments were light and gentle. Order was quickly restored, wrongdoers were reformed and became involved in the good of the whole.

In the center of the kingdom was a stone palace surrounded by four temples in the mountains. The four temples served to train sages, teachers, ministers, men and women of stature. Two temples trained women, two temples trained men. The stone palace was the center of government, from which mounted horsemen were regularly sent out to oversee the kingdom. They brought news from the people. In the stone palace in the center of the kingdom lived an emperor and an empress — it was common knowledge. It was said that they would give orders to the council of wise men. People praised them highly but never saw them, ministers and wise men praised them among the people but rarely said a word about them.

The order lasted for centuries — so it is said — until a kingdom near the land of Li decided to attack the rich and wise kingdom. The armies of Li resolutely swept away the invader, but among them were a diplomat and a spy. After the defeat, the diplomat agreed with the spy that the latter would watch the empress and emperor and report anything he saw or heard. The diplomat came to the district of the four temples and every time he wanted to see the rulers, the ministers said:

"They do not grant audience to anyone, speak to us." He insisted, but was turned away each time.

In the meantime, the spy managed to get past the guards and enter the stone chamber of the stone palace, where he wanted to spy on the emperor and empress. But the mighty hall was empty, only two stone figures could be seen. One was a male figure made of stone, the other a female figure made of stone, all beautifully carved. There was no trace of life in the stone chamber, the doors were sealed.

He reported to the diplomat: — “It is all a lie, there is no emperor, there is no empress. The people of Li are ruled by malicious lies of ministers and deceitful sages”.

The diplomat started a conversation with the people, who disbelieved him and mocked him: “Your beloved rulers do not exist, or at most they are stones, ridiculous ideas!” But there was a boy who cried and believed him, and the rumors began to spread. Soon the ministers and sages had to give in and told the people this fact. They admitted that they had ruled them according to the best intentions of an ancient sage, to put immortal virtues inthe place of the living. They wanted the people to look up to those who cannot change, like stone, who are themselves governed by the sanctity of the providence of the Yellow King and Queen of Heaven. This order lasted for centuries, and for the holy centuries it granted people a long life of beauty, peace and virtue. The people mourned, some believing that the Emperor and Empress had been assassinated in truth, others that it was a lie.

Soon internal unrest began, justice was banished from the country. Minor crimes became terrible crimes, wise people lamented the times and said that evil daimons had done this to the land. In the meantime, the unfortunate diplomat and the spy reported to their kingdom that the armies could gather again. They conquered the once great land of Li, displayed the statues of the empress and emperor before the people and smashed them.

Since then, no great happiness has visited the land, the decay of the transient, the disorder and order of change. People told stories centuries later, some remembering beautiful times when the stone statues lived and ruled the land. Others timidly mentioned the rule of the gods over the land of Li. But never again were there such golden times on earth as under the tutelage of the Council of Sages and the Stone Emperorship. It was only said that when the stones were broken, beautiful orchards began to grow. Even today, if only discovered by people who resembled the people of Li.

Overarch the world

In times of danger and great portents of impending evil, few keep their heads, even fewer see clearly as they try to avert the impending disaster. Most, even the most aware, indulgently try to see future evils as pleasant. To "tame" them, "make them safe", "mock" them, "stun them into ignorance" before they unload in their greatest horror. People do not get sucked into it, people make decisions, at least before it's too late. "It's not so bad after all," the future servants of a regime are rebels against order who opportunistically pick up the threads of history. The future henchmen of the apparatus are the brutes of the present. All who are loyal to a monstrosity are favored by it until they themselves are devoured by it. When the machinery is running at full speed, everyone is pulled into the meat grinder and there is no turning back. There is no difference in uniforms, frankly, when ideology, doctrinarianism comes into play. It is a parasite that sucks the lifeblood out of reason, intellect, virtue, dreams and hopes. Show me what you are enslaved to, and I will tell you what your monstrosity may be! Show me what you love, and I will tell you where the devil's tango takes place! It turns a disciplined man into a cruel war criminal, a sadist. It turns an intellectual into a whore who betrays his ideas. It turns a noble man into a pathetic, deluded fool. It turns the weak into traitors and villains, it turns the strong into raging destroyers.

Crushed, beaten, ruined, despairing, grit your teeth furiously and bite through this rotten meat! What do you expect? Applause? Gratitude? Honors? Move quietly, steadily, secretly, determinedly, wanting favors is pure boasting.

You alone make this world, it is you! You! You! Not the "rest", not the "crowd", not the "mob". If you follow the wave of horror, injustice, inhuman vice, anonymous indifference, petty merry-go-round. If you let it break you, you will not be a wretch. You will be another torch of hope that falls to the ground without passing on this Olympic flame to those who desire it. Millions of people walk the earth, their graves as anonymous as their lives. Their souls are but shadows, unable even to manage their own resources. They are in need and have not learned to appreciate things beyond their miserable condition. The lightning of Zeus is the great opportunity that illuminates this world and breaks the bonds of the captives. Like a lion roaring through the abyss, he calls his own to the memory that is the daughter of truth, to the embrace of Mother Hope.

If you do not pick it up, who will? Take measure of what you can handle, be prudent in your affairs. Heaven is working ceaselessly, and be it a last whimpering child who sees a comforting figure through the devastation wrought by man upon man. It will be like an emperor's son or daughter returning home in nobility and pride. The earth is our home, it is true! But there is also a pneumatic kinship with the world soul for a figure of this universal hymn of praise. We cry out in dissonance and longing under the weapons of mass distraction. Instead of making this world a harmonious place while we wage war against the elements and nature, we should draw this Artemisian bow. To get ready to set up our focused star to hit the target, we cast it to dust. Times have changed, toils are arduous and heavy faces are turned to flickering illusions. Rare are the moments of enlightenment, great is the tyranny of sorrow and suffering!

Now it is the confrontation that counts. It is the perseverance, the persistence, the continuous work that makes characters. It is an act of defiance to call for freedom when one is in chains. To love when one is hateful and cruel. To feel angry compassion, conscientiousness when there is nothing left of us. To maintain wisdom and foresight and command when all we see is confusion, idiocy and stupidity in the minds, hearts and souls of so many.

Throw yourself in the dust and stand up straight to move on. When you open your scars and wounds, even if they are maggot-infested and completely rotten, focus on the deed. The mind is so embattled, the body breaks so easily, the devastated souls no longer feel. Yet the genius, the spirit of a man, a woman beckons on and on. He calls to the ravaged worlds below for a breath of free air, wavering between despair and terror. With a sword of iron he cuts through the veils of shadows, with a piercing gaze he sees the stars and the corridors of fire. Oh, you will fail so often to be strong! Oh, you will feel weak and defeated, bitter and full of desperate anger! Equipped with this rusty appearance of a perforated armor and open wounds, you will not die easily! You write your necrology, insofar as you write your life and your apotheosis! Do not rely on people, do not rely on external circumstances swinging your mind back and forth, your luck and fates left and right! Omnia mea mecum porto. Everything you have, carry with you. I have lived through madness, I have experienced pain, I have been a beaten dog, a cornered wolf, not once but thousands of times. After thousands of psychological wars, strategic and tactical moves that have only one end, twisted by evil, tormented by fools. What can you do? Lick your wounds, even though you are stabbed again and again! Attack when necessary, defend when you can and continue with the great effort as you can!

Savoire Vivre: Handful of survivalist life advices

At 35 years old, I would like to share with you some cardinal rules of life that have enabled me to survive the various stages of life. I will change, add or reduce this small list in the following years:

You are what you eat – that is, the food, its procurement and preparation, the epistemic, perceptual, experiential, esthetic, interpersonal nourishment for your mind, your emotions, your senses, your arousals, whether healthy or tainted, all the contents that you allow to interact with you become you, they are your mirror. Well-prepared meals are not dull dregs, but a true feast that ennobles you.

If you stop learning, studying, pondering, wondering, if you stop admiring the world over and over again and paying tribute to the "little gods of life," it's like burying a living person. It is wise to learn how to retain intellectual acumen, take pleasure in solving problems and making discoveries, even better to do so on your own, pioneering or rediscovering things with your own strength.

If it seems that you are going through hell in life, grit your teeth and move on. You may not get where you want to go, but you will make hell a bearable chore that in time will turn into strength of character, will, and determination. Do not rely on others to fight your own battles in wars. Most likely, you will lose your own strength if you count on the muscles and brains of others. Overcoming many problems single-handedly and fighting your way through them is what makes a man. Where there is a unity of characters, hearts and mature minds – there you will find your true friends, do not look for a common denominator in the lowlands. Companies united by a common goal are transient, do not look for people who may go parallel ways, they may be good companions, but in the end they go elsewhere.

Separate yourself from people who have squandered your trust capital. They will not teach old dogs and bitches new tricks, and the confidence that they will change is gone.

As for women, even if you are close, intimate, sexual, private, always keep a healthy, polite distance, if a woman needs more, let her go elsewhere. Otherwise, you are subject to her whims and desires and she will do what she wants with you. A wise, strong, experienced woman is clearly a better life companion than a pretty girl with an empty brain or a mature woman who was one in the past and has finally realized that she is not a princess. Let them age and mature in solitude, they too had their time to decide in their youth.

As for men – choose people with whom you can form a healthy brotherhood. Do not waste your time with weak characters who want to surround themselves with the strong. Seek out peers or people who are superior to you in authority, expertise, wisdom and life experience. Remember that you must first and foremost be experienced yourself in order to discern properly and not follow fools who play the master. Do not seek the company of people who worship transitory things, but of people who can represent and embody the ideas they live by.

If you learn to thrive in solitude and find strength and motivation in it, you can devote yourself to higher things, unbound by other people, and shake off the burden of dishonorable enterprises. You will find a whole arsenal of opportunities in which to engage, act, and develop. Out of solitude, it is easy to temporarily return to human relationships – you will be much more mature and wise, you will find that they are like children from the distance of your perception. They still play the same games, over and over again. Do not waste time with people from whom you can learn nothing. You can always learn from fools – but how long can you bear their company? Soon you will become like the people you deal with. Never seek companies that are beneath you. If there are no people to inspire you, sacrifice your time to broaden the subjects of your work, perfect yourself and consider what you can contribute. Maturity is reflected in an autonomous individual who behaves wisely and decisively, although unwise and foolish individuals can also influence his autonomy, depending on the goals, depending on the needs.

As for wealth – desire what you have, not what you want, otherwise you are chasing a mirage. Increasing wealth is wise if you know what you want to do with your economy in a way that does not bend your character. Losing value for material rewards is like a fool paying ten times the price for an item worth a thousand times less. If you know how to lead and have charisma, if you are able to perform duties – do not shirk the obligation and responsibility if you do not and something prevents you from doing it or it is pure opportunism or chance – do not command, you will inflict greater harm on others than you can imagine. Do not run after affect or reputation, scoundrels can ruin these things along with honor with mere gossip and slander. If you have an undeserved bad reputation, work by your rules – like a mature man, and keep your backbone. Do not run away to fix it, but withdraw from the people who have harmed you and move on. Good destinies are shaped by favorable events, decisions, judgments, and happenings in the environment, as are bad destinies. Many causes are beyond our control, even more are conditioned, determined, some are within our control – this is where we must strike wisely!

To despise people with bad fate shows a lack of insight into causes and effects, vain satisfaction with one's own luck is the same as malicious envy of insignificant people.

Last but not least – all that you are, your spatio-temporal totality, is your complete and true representative. In the mirror of eternity there are no untruths. The character sows destinies, the destinies sow the character. We all have weaknesses, but people with ethos do not commit many mistakes. Guided by experience, they learn attentively from the mistakes of others. They do not apologize or stubbornly rationalize their misgivings; they correct and mend their obvious or conscious mistakes, whether they are made aware of them or have perceived them themselves. Do not step into the lives of others with dirty shoes unless you have gifts to offer (a good word, a good intention), and even better – only if they invite you in.

On Heavenly Desires and Heroes

> YOUR theology is a slime-pit of gibberish become ethics. In YOUR world, where ignorance and deceit constitute felicity, everything ends miserably-besmirched with fratricidal blood. Seekers of salvation? Salvation of your sick digestion; crippled beliefs: Convalescent desires. Your borrowed precepts and prayers-a stench unto all good nostrils!

> Anathema of Zos — The Sermon to the Hypocrite ~ An Automatic Writing By Austin Osman Spare

People invent all kinds of heavenly immortality. I think these are mere projections of fear of the death of one's persona. Not that it is not possible, but there is more! What good is my snakeskin when I am confronted with the vastness of great awe? So the heavenly birth is like a normal birth. We cry not to get out of the womb, and we are horrified at the idea of leaving the womb of self-grasping. In order to cross the hecatic boundary, you have to sacrifice the wholeness of your self to explode into thousands of stars, galaxies and settle down in this greatness.

The greater the nature, the more extensive the purgatory of the self. The nobler the substance of star and spirit, a god, a goddess, an agathodaimon, etc.

Sure, I need a titanium-class ego in life, but do I really hold on to it? I detach from it at will and connect to it when necessary, as long as it does not hold me captive.

Life is the only reality, life is only real when I am. From the perspective of this moment of existence, one can understand, analyze and dissect great ideas that enter the bloodstream, the soul, the heart and the mind. Ultimately, it is the living out of each and every idea that one recognizes as true. In his or her great gardens and cathedrals of memory, temples of life that nourish Babylon.

What I am trying to say is just that. There, for example, love can be understood as a heroic sympathy between matching patterns that enter into human affairs and tie the Venus knot. An idealized form or a biochemical playground of emotions and desires deprived of platonic power — both can meet in synthesis. Eroticism, friendship and sublime love are flirting beasts. Lusts, fires of sexual obsession, addictions and desires resemble each other. Give nature its due, in Cytherea offer splendid adornments. In both cases it is mere understanding, a description, ten thousand things that distract from living it out in realization. And the beauty and tyranny of the fleeting moment is found only in life. The transience, the tragedy of being torn between the temporal and the eternal, as we are. Deep are the wells of the past, wrote Thomas Mann. The future is abysmal, an instance of your life is everything to you, nothing to everyone. Suspended in a gigantic chain of events, the totality of your expression is a testimony to your Titanic movements or the whisper of your dead, wailing soul. If you are looking for something that is slowly changing, an ego, it is most likely your body. Your mind is already different from five years ago, different from yesterday. Maybe your soul or the tendencies of life are more permanent, you can identify with them — that may be your genius. We are in search of something permanent, transcendent, imperishable. If we have ever lived and experienced beauty, we want to preserve it and long for it as we pass through the scenes of life. It escapes our arms because beauty is an immortal idea that is not immanent in the generative world. Bios Thanatos Bios.

We pass away, we drink with thirst from the waters of life, while our body, mind and ashes pass away, as in the Golden Tablets of the Orphics. Total memory is total unity. The truth is the heroic remembering of oneself. The masks of appearances that think themselves to be are in reality the totality wrapped in separation. The truly divine lives itself out through all these masks. No matter whether they are individuals or celestial powers, which are intellects insofar as they can be stars. And yet in life it is that you experience separation in being, you are a god, a goddess in exile. A castaway who experiences this Promethean (Vulcan), Luciferian (Venusian) — alienation.

Perhaps it is the sublimation of divinity. The restoration of substance is the goal for some. Perhaps most have long forgotten the representation of the intellect, the soul. Animal man is a hybrid, a cross-section between matter, evolving nature, forces and deities.

It is indivisible, a whole, and yet it is the string you play, animal, human or divine, that sounds the lyre to the worlds you love most. You may be a magnificent animal — that is natural. You may be a human beast — worse than an animal. You may be a humane human being. And yet, yet! Through the catalyst of the mirror of your soul and the gesture of your own divinity, you look beyond the stars and into Tartarus. Traveler, you are home when you have taken the step across the final frontier. Gate Gate Paramsagate, Gate Gate Bodhi Svaha.

Lovely Cannibals, Civilized Beasts

Angels are not created from light, but from the sublimation of animals into the divine, or it is the divine that borrows itself into the world and creates a mask from its inseparable totality. The divinity is not in contradiction with nature. Lux ex Nox. Umbra et imago.

The shadow in Jungian understanding can be a proportional image of the psychic constellations that are repressed by the day consciousness. It differs between individuals, cultural groups, civilizational groupings. It is a representation structure of variable inverted fragments or whole complexes. It can be fixed on condensed experiences, a symbol, an image, an affect, a thought, an action, a trauma.

To understand it better, let us give a banal example. The original hominid cannibal in participation mysticism, as opposed to a civilized English gentleman. The genetic ancestry of this English gentleman can be traced back to this cannibal. Cultural-genetic factors have retrained and rebuilt the entire psychic apparatus along the chronology of memetic social logos mutations between the two gentlemen. The shadow appears to be both chronological and chronic. In the high values of the gentleman, the instincts of the cannibal lurk through the small cracks of civilization.

There is always a "monster" under the bed of the conscious mind. The English gentleman will not return to this savage cannibal who is more animal than human. Nevertheless, he can meet him. He encounters the psychopathological shadow of this old Kronos in his own mind. He encounters insidious emotions, instincts, impulses that are severely repressed. These "sins of humanity" are interpreted through his modern rules, codes, cognitive-behavioral and socialized functions. They are fetishized and moralized into "pure" and "impure" as his conditioned conscience dictates to him. As such, the true Kronos would be a criminal, a serial killer, not a terrible child of nature. Evaluation creates the divide, not nature itself.

The English gentleman might see this cannibal in a modern setting as something abhorrent, not to say – a freak of nature. A 'man' to be condemned and judged. The true archetype of all people is not the symbols, but the totality of their archetype, from which types and symbols are derived. Inventiveness in delineating archetypal symbolism is merely a catergorical Aristotelian hiccup. The archetypes invented by Jung are a figment of the modern desire to tame primordiality into categories.

As models they are nice and beautiful, they evoke esthetics. But they are utterly useless when it comes to understanding psychopathology and behavior across epochs. It is behavior that creates the historical image, not the other way around.

Austin Osman Spare's doctrine of recurrent atavism is much more effective in explaining this. Namely, "the idea that the human mind contains atavistic memories that have their origins in earlier species on the evolutionary ladder." These atavistic memories may also be neurogenetic engrams of instinctual, biopsychological, homuncular (mental images of the body) deposits triggered like IRMs (Innate Releasing Mechanism) in animals.The IRM is a mechanism that somehow encodes the behavior of animals that simply "know what to do when something happens. They know what to do when they are born, when they crack the egg, when they behave in their natural environment, etc. Without resorting to species consciousness, which I personally like, let us focus on something else. Expressed genes that build the organism make it tend to behave in certain ways. This may give the impression of "genetic memory" because it seems like black magic. More likely, however, these are potentials that manifest in reality through an organism's sophisticated complex adaptive systems to an environment into which it seamlessly fits. It is often forgotten how closely interwoven life is with its environment. Millions of years of evolutionary adaptation and entropic factors come into play here.

The shadow of female desire can be a spider, so it is fearsome and deadly; the shadow of male desire can be a worm, helpless, blind, and invading the earth with uncontrolled lust (Durand's idea). It is not a mere association. In the nervous complexes it generates horror and nightmares of insects and lower "chtonic" bugs. Libido is an ancient instinct, it is the conveyor belt of reproduction and life itself. Therefore, it is associated with primitive life forms, larval, insectoid, embryonic on a neurocranial evo-devo scale.

If an amateur sex magician or a slob chaote who masturbates over sigils wonders why he has shadow crabs all over his room, it is very likely that his masturbation activates archaic-chtonic neuro-magical triggers associated with the reproductive organs. The sublimation of sex and eroticism can produce angels or chthonic beasts, as well as any other instinct and its shadow.

A human being is born neither good nor evil, as Plato claimed. He has certain neurocognitive tendencies based on his neural phenotype, which are expressed in the natural environment and in his interaction with the world and the Other. The neural phenotype, or cognitive phenotype, is the hard-wired tendency toward certain cognitive-emotional structures, such as psychopathy, or the tendencies that shape worldviews, political attitudes, etc. To avoid neural determinism, I prefer to emphasize adaptation, the acquisition of automaticity and social behavioral skills that shape certain tendencies that are the basis of socialization, viz. social training in passive and interactive modes, and self-mastery, overcoming and maturing into independent, self-reflective individuals capable of taming the "tartarism" or primal beast within and directing the "jumping monkey of the mind" into more insightful, creative and responsible channels.

Here I would like to pick two from Jaan Panskepp's list of instincts and explain how they develop under cultural and civilizational modalities and how the human beast becomes a human being and how a humane human being develops his inner daimon to detach himself from the world of animals into the worlds of the Divine. The Divine is always present and is never in conflict with nature insofar as the doors of perception are purified and the intellect and feeling sublimate and correct to a higher standpoint of understanding and perception.

Hunger and thirst are natural for anyone deprived of nourishment. The excessive satisfaction of these cravings is associated with the reward centers, and your regular "gourmands" enjoy the esthetic taste of a variety of ingested substances. As an aside, there is a secret to communion with substances, an ancient shamanic discipline, pure substances work best, and since prana follows thought, a tear of myrrh I once ate returned my saturnine nature to its proper place, it was called the tear of Horus in ancient Egypt. But let us proceed without further ado: The principle of pleasure is related to the libidinal or sexual drive. Thus, everything that has to do with pleasure is a satisfaction of the libido, which "consumes" the object of desire for which it thirsts.

The enjoyment of art and eroticism at a high level is indeed a devouring of the subject of passion, because hunger, thirst, and libido are sublimated and embedded in civilizational and cultural values that align them with acculturated systems. Can a hungry, thirsty person enjoy art? Only disciplined individuals who control themselves, or who are obsessed with art, may be deprived of sleep, food, and concentration on it. That's why I have always been an enemy of Maslov's pyramid – you can satisfy high cravings while being deprived of basic cravings, but they have to be trained first. A salute to the starving artists!

mediately. Is it the building of castles in the air? Or is it the finest point of civilizational-cultural sublimation, where heaven descends upon us and we find ourselves whole again because we have arrived at the starting point through the subversion of nature. We have bypassed the generative worlds of Aphrodite by sabotaging the atavisms of nature, and have returned to the womb of Mater Magna! The myth of the eternal return is not that the Deity returns to humanity, but that man returns to his home, "child of nature and starry heaven, but my home is heavenly" – Orphic Mysteries. Need I not mention that certain instincts that have been misinterpreted, that have fueled New Age conspiracy theories and other outrageous ideas, are merely a shredded and fundamentalized need for desire. For example, a person who longs for the stars may deny science and evolutionary neurobiology and falsely assume that we came from the stars on some "spaceships" (nest-building locality) and everything else is a lie.

Similarly, a person who has metaphysical or peak experiences will try to justify them with "extraterrestrials, angels," as if they were instantaneous. Basically, he reifies them into something objectively basic, tangible, and fetishizes them into subjects of his game (play instinct), but in the reverse role – he is subject to them, it is "they" who are in control of his life, a cabal, a syndicate that rules as a gray eminence and pulls the strings of the mortal scene. Do I deny the existence of angeli bonum? My second sight has revealed much, but autophany (self-manifestation) is but a sign of a great essential type, indecipherable to a mortal human animal. Curiosity commands interpretation, but when wonder is interrupted, all the demons of certainty creep in, and this is where both religious bigotry and fanaticism and blind faith in one's own ideas begin. In other words, the critical apparatus is suspended in order to pursue fantasy. But you see, realized potential offers much more satisfaction than fantasy. It is as if instincts chain us in Plato's cave, and only through refined works do we loosen their grip and approach the heavenly mien.

We are still mortal, but somehow our souls, minds and hearts are changed. As with the mutations of vices and virtues, they may be derived from civilizational instincts. I once analyzed the basic Hindi "kleshas" in Patandjali's model (vices) and found that all forms of mutated vices can be traced back to these simple dharmas: "attachment, I am I, delusion, ignorance, repulsion." Similarly, we can derive various mutations from the lower instincts that pass through the riverbeds of the whirlwinds of civilizational and cultural history of ideas, the noospheric bastions and the revolutions that overturn them like giants to establish new, small and large reforms of the social logoi.

As the "Lightnings of Zeus (great realizations) strike against the mountains of foolishness in vain from Olympus (Mount Olympus, was an Orphic term for "Time", according to Derveni Papyri), some become the lightnings.

As I thoughtfully flipped through the pages of anthologies and source text masterpieces of antiquity, I found a treasure.

From Al-Qabisi to Cicero to Valluvar. From Kautilya and Kamandaki to Chuang Tzu and Confucius to Han Fei and Zenji. From Marcus Aurelius to Julian the Theurgist to Iamblichus and Julian Autocraton. From Parmenides to Posidonius. From the Akkadian mythological corpora to the Egyptian sages. From the Mysteries of Khem to Orphism to the Eleusinian Mysteries. From the mysteries of Scandinavian Hammramir to the Drakon cults of Greece and Rome. From the Sumerian Tree of Life to the Zoroastrian Avesta, from the Indus Valley to Tibet. I moved back and forth in time, gathering the dew of teachings fought by ignoramuses and fanatics. I moved on when those backward pigs shouted, "Devil!". I attained the friendship with the gods, while I was turned into a demon by the curse of the Levantine faiths. I attained the freedoms and gifts of the gods while those pitiful swine were obsessed with jealousy and sacrosanct questions: "Why not them?!"

I felt like the modern Giordano Bruno, who "loved this world too much to be extinguished by it," who fought "pedants and idiots" to be betrayed. He was burned at the stake for exposing pagan truths before the lying corpse on the cross and the fat pigs of the Vatican. With brief interruptions in Judeo-Christian theology, I compared parallel thinking that I considered superior in every way. Thinking that has been all but eliminated from the de facto curriculum of Western civilization is being revived by some. Not as an academic endeavor, but as a living teaching in conversation with the masters and mistresses of the past. Non-Abrahamic, pagan teachings were meant for the intelligent, to make them more intelligent. For those who sought a better life, they brought a better life. For those who wanted to learn, they dispelled ignorance. Judeo-Christian theology was infantile and foolish when compared to the wealth of world treasures it so viciously fought against. "Do not let them know that we built their world on lies, we would look like fools if we preached slander!". They are so afraid of the truth that it breaks their hearts that the mirror might show the pig faces before them. Well, to hell with them. I have better things to do!

In my sojourns and reflections, I have found jewels of wise advice. They should not only be read, but immersed in a living teaching and internalized. "Why did not I grow up in this garb, why did I have to wait so long to expand my curriculum and satisfy my insatiable mind, heart and soul to recognize and immerse myself in these teachings, the wondrous knowledge songs of the past?".

I have learned that what matters first and foremost is the genius of the person. Genii is the daimon of the spiritual character. Everything else is merely a product of inner qualities and outer abilities that arise from potentiality in the reality of circumstances, life and people.

I have learned that it is better to have an integral backbone among the spineless. It means to be constant with your geniuses and bring them to greater dimensions of divinity. A better sleep you are sure of, but you can strip off all modern junk as fazad delusions that rob a person of his humanity.

The phrase is "alone with the lonely," a title of Henry Corbin's book on Sufism. Much better is to be "alone with the gods who shower us with gifts" in the style of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Away from the attention of others, walking like blind men.

There they stand proud and confrontational, surveying the past and the future. There, in spaces divine and uncanny, an idea of living power and laurel-red glory under the auspices of heaven. Does that occur to a mortal so rarely these days?

That which we know brings with it the danger that we become accustomed to a false view of the world and to all that is beyond our perception. We let wonderful things fall into oblivion, if we perceive them at all.

It is a pride in years lived, things conquered, things overcome. A nobility of subtle strength that runs through the threads of our destinies and the strands of ideas that have fought furiously for our minds and hearts.

Well, well. If I ever developed a lesson for myself, if it unfolded in my earlier years, unencumbered by worlds of falsehoods, I would be a fulfilled man.

A true man is shaped only when the choices and conflicts within are developed and resolved. When they are independently recognized and understood. When we learn to act, think, judge and decide, all change comes from within, therefore it must be accomplished individually.

Everything else is mere repetition. No virtue or idea endures if it is trained only in soldierly rigor. Nor does it hold good if it is indoctrinated as an automatism in school or in socialization. It must be resolved by reason, understanding with clarity, with meaning and significance. With observation of causes and effects, in the individual and in the group. Commodus may be an example, the son of Emperor Aurelius, Aurelion Thrion, the Beast of the Sun God. He was trained by the best, but lacked the nature, the daimon, the inner war of decision to be anything other than a spoiled but cultured child.

Those who are raised and nurtured by adversity learn to mature wisely along the way. They are the most worthy among men and women. Those who reflect on this inner war are the best among men and women, meritocratically speaking.

It is the will to play, because the best magicians are those who know the way of the child and develop a paternal and maternal mind with an older look. It is necessary for the Apulian metamorphoses that testify the extent of one's nature and substance to be formed in the future.

It is the will to dare, because no conquest begins without a touch of courage. Like a Hindi mother who sends her child into the world as a gift and calls him a prince, it is up to him to become one.

It is the will to develop, because no growth begins if one does not want to grow and mature. He clearly defines his ideals, "what kind of man and woman they want to be in the future." It's not about proposing a profession, but how they want to form their innermost being.

It is the will to character by recognizing one's own instincts, correcting and refining the endowment of one's mother, father and nature. This is the starting point for the ethos of one's life.

It is the will to integrity, people who consolidate their ideals in a wiser way become stable in the gift of their characters. They preserve the vastness of their ideas and imagination. It is connected with ideas and inclusions of all those who form a basis for all further acting, thinking and communicating.
It is the will to excel. Not to compete, for that is a matter of sport, but to perfect one's talents in the most fruitful way. To sacrifice them to others, on the altar of the gods, if need be.

It is the will to education. It is the development of learning and listening, of reflection and of the critical apparatus that helps to make sound judgments and decisions. This is the breeding ground for wisdom and insight. Without the foundations of study, how can one develop wisdom? Without knowledge of people and their way of life, the movements of the stars and the changing of the seasons, how is one to quickly recognize changeability and transience? How is it to penetrate the character and mind of people to enlighten them and lead them to their inner gods?

It is the will to honesty, because between oneself and the gods there is nothing to hide. One can learn the art of deception to protect oneself from the dangers of mortals. In honest dealings, one reveals only what one wants. "A revealed secret makes us slaves to the secret" — so goes an Arab proverb. Honesty and truth have the ability to break chains and release falsehood into the light of the sun. It is liberating and makes falsehoods be forgotten.

Truth is either a conventional truth, just like reality, or what is agreed upon. A realized truth is metaphysical truth, which is a personal revelation, an actual true representation. The latter is often transformed into deceptive, illogical religions that vampirize human hopes, feelings and souls.
The true religion is that of personal achievement and realization, to which one can be led. It can never be realized by a sectarian, a cleric or a hopeless parasite for someone else.

The ancient rites introduced into China by Wu and Xi formed a system of Li, traditions, ceremonies and rites. They enabled people to participate in the divine. The Eleusinian mysteries were public, in the hope that out of thousands only a few would cross the cosmic threshold. The transfer of personal work on divinity to a single institution, belief system, or imperfect mortal ruined many. They were persecuted and opposed, like the master Giordano Bruno, like the mistress Hypatia.

It is the will to authenticity, or gnothi seauton. It is the stripping away of the false images in which the eidola (shadows) revel, and the recognition of the God and Goddess within. This process means going to the spheres of divine harmony. It is about finding the universal kinship with the world soul and discarding the psychological debris that has accumulated around it.

It is the will to master first and foremost oneself, one's mind, feelings and thoughts. It is a discipline that does not give us over to the monkey of our mind. It gives us a rod of command over ourselves, as if external governors, "by mind and genius the command over themselves". The mastery and the effort to achieve it make our actions full of meaning and commitment.

It is a lifelong process that does not end with life. It is this constant forward drive that makes us bite our way through difficulties and overcome them victoriously.

It is a self-directed motivation to carve a statue of oneself that one would put a name to. It is Horatios Carminae "Exegi Monumentum." It is the content and reflection of one's own life.

It is the will to wisdom or that spontaneous insight that harmonizes contradictory phenomena in the right proportion. It is all in the direction of great, brilliant resolutions that encompass many means and beings. It is a single sword of insight that cuts through the fog of appearances and delusions to allow bright vision even in the darkest night. To order everything according to peace, tranquility and resolute beauty.

It is the will to govern, which, in contrast to the will to power, is the will to commit to people. To unite them in themselves on the basis of self-control. In the service of justice, duty, understanding, executive, respect for the institution, hierarchy of merit and virtue. Power should be an effect of this, not an end. A person who cannot control himself or has no true virtue, either public or personal, but has power, is merely an entrenched figure. It is hopelessly lost to its development and corruption. The will to govern is also the will to surround oneself with people of wisdom.

It is the ability to listen to advice and distinguish the right from the wrong, judged by the process and the effects, not by the motives, however noble.

It is the will to commit, or in other words, it is the ability to stick to one's goal and pursue it to the end. To change it only when the undertakings bear bad fruits or the nature is unfit for a particular service or purpose.

It is the will to respect living beings, as wise people see the co-dependencies of the world. They may decide to compose themselves among it, ancient temples and architecture was reflecting both organic and perfect, Divine forms. They were "frozen harmonies". Modern space-management and architecture is a “frozen cacophony”. It is standing in a stark dissonance with life and contradicting it.

It is the will to combat. Most importantly, it is the inner war of gigantomachy, that is the battle of emotions, ideas, cognitions. That is the knowledge of tensions among natures and the resolving transcendent union of dualism within dualisms. Merging splintered harmonies that should be turned back into a unitary symphony again. Citing Macrobius’ Saturnalia: “alike to bees that gather nectar from different flowers, yet masterfully blend it into honeys of splendid tastes”.

It is the will to virtue, that is combat that builds and polishes the character. It is the sword and shield that protects against poisons and defilements enumerated perfectly by Dharmic magicians. With masterful logic they brought human behaviors to most simple dharmas. Applying the honey of antidotes those heroes defeated the venom of impurities and afflictions.

It is the will to eudaimonia, the attainment of wise happiness. The seeking of a place in this life that most impermanent has its bright sides and methods of attainment of a tranquil abiding. Despite evident horrors and evils of the world, without closing a blind eye to them, but remedying them, retaining good cheer and a strong will.

It is the will to compassion which is the ability to wisely uplift and understand someone’s ailments. Thus, penetrating with insight, to assist in the manner of Babylonian kings. It is not merely to “feed the hungry and water the thirsty” a quote from the Annals of Akkadian Kingly Wisdom. It is not mere philanthropy of the endowed, it is the ability to help someone attain his purpose, mean, happiness. By the means of providing him with tools and methods that help him help himself. Solely to dissolve the unfruitful state in which he was previously found.

It is the will to commit to the Divine which is not a doctrinaire moralizing of pigs. It is to express the divine ethos of various traditions through one's bloodstream, mind, heart and spirit. To be a negotiator, a catalyst, a magician of Gods in order to invoke the works into the world.

Wounded child and the imperial self Mass alienation in the Drama of Epochal Catastrophy.

There is always a great background to the processes that come to the fore in public, that break through the plutonic underworld's gates and find a new home in daylight consciousness. The last few years have been extremely traumatic for a wide variety of populations around the world. These traumas have not shaken the individual or collective psyche, but in many cases they have disabled the self-defense systems of group psychic resilience. Psychic resilience for self-defense was already built on civilizational egregors infested with mental illness and all forms of aberrations that reactively transformed trauma potential into reality.

Civilizational "business as usual" did not allow new events to be squeezed into a socially constructed straitjacket. It split the resilience of the group and compensated for the dysfunction of psychic defense mechanisms in all forms of abominations that feasted on the emotional and cognitive swamp that boiled and produced new masks and dresses of desire, a whimsical paradise for alienated masses. It was triggered by populist sentiment, but was already in the waiting, as an inevitable consequence. What is yet to come is yet to be seen.

All forms of alienated, fragmented belief systems find justification in the spectacle. The right, the left, the right, the left are marching to the demise of the rigorist, deluded universalism of conservatism posing as the guardian of a new renewal, or to the carnage of the crippled, all-encompassing coddling of the relativist basement full of beggars, misfits and lunatics. The sensible middle no longer exists; it belongs to the old-timers. People who are still used to analytical, ethical, reasonable calculations are excluded from this world, invasive species rule their world. It is similar to the Asian concepts of reality, which are gladly used in the propaganda machinery.

The West has adopted it whether it is compatible with its "Thou shalt not harbor contradictions" or not, multiple, contradictory "truths" are tolerated, factioids and opinions are king. The shift from one reality to another to explain "facts" and "motives" is as fluid as the expert knowledge to navigate it. Such political technology introduced by populism on Western soil will quickly lose its capital in favor of Asian political business practices. The return to facts, reason and logic is impossible. It would require grand educational efforts in democracies that want to be democracies.

Anti-democratic education in "democratic" countries adds a more cynical smile to that. While the festival of kitsch is entertained by millions, it is enough to observe their emotions, their triggers, to pull the strings in a way that is loyal to the government, in whatever form that government might take. Fluid realities mean that the ideas upheld by Western countries are being replaced by ever newer forms of surrogates and deceptive doubles. Mass reprogramming of entire societies is taking place before our eyes, while at the same time trauma is spiraling out of control. Few are those who see through the portends of a monolithic lie. What are they to do?

When defense systems fail and the psyche of a group fears annihilation, it responds with fear. Managing that fear preserves the shock of further traumatization. Stoking fear while playing the solution has given birth to the "good father" complex in such societies deprived of thinking and resilience, which plays into the hands of petty autocrats, dictators, and "fathers of nations." However, when a tipping point of fear hits the self-defense mechanisms, it overrides them and fragments the individual and group psyche. This schizophrenic factor manifests itself in alienated individuals who compensate in pockets of belief and information that may seem completely derealized.

They are not "fixed," but simply fill the empty spaces of their fragmented psychic structures with randomly distributed content (nearest pleasure principle resting point) that reinforces their madness. It is always the internalized representation of the enemy, real or false, of the perpetrator of the group trauma, that moves forward. They can be typical, like "the Jew or the Nazi," they can be archaic, like "the black or the foreigner," or archetypal "the forces of evil or the wicked witch." When the group psyche fragments, it conjures up a false self that evokes all forms of symbols of unity, nationalisms, populisms, radicalisms, fundamentalisms, anarchisms to compensate for the loss of continuity in the impossibility of individuation from the fragmented psyche.

The expression of the healthy person hibernates and is protected by the "demons of the external world" that prevent it from being rediscovered and nurtured from the beginning. Rarely does anyone return to the pre-falseness stage to rebuild from their authentic being. There are more psychological "no's" than "yes's." The barrier tortures the true self and feeds the false image, the contrast deforms the soul, mind and heart. This is the way the world ends, not with a bang, but with a whimper.

Ariadne severed her thread. Anarch's Metaphysics as the last stand.

A logoi of a society, a civilization, a culture is similar to paradigm in science. It is an interwoven set of theories and praxia that together constitute a paideic order. Paradigms in science change more often than the logoi of a culture and the continuity and coherence of a society depends on the latter.

An example may be a dance called "hormos" peformed by girls and boys together in ancient Greece. The dance resembled a string of beads, boys' steps were later used in battle, girls' steps had more decorum, but the whole dance was woven into a meaningful whole that encircled projected fates of life and death, each "bead" was a cultural unit of some kind, that was interconnected with the rest of the patterned whole of the culture, education and ethos of a given society.

It is not possible to create such a structure synthetically, it grows organically like a garden of many beautiful greeneries over time and is knowns as tradition, a concept called "Li" in ancient China would suit the purpose. Every destruction of the pattern is damaging the delicate entropy of the organized whole and leads to a devastating disease of the mind, heart and soul.

No longer is a "hormos" performed and no longer it is necessary, in the age of dying logos, when even the most resilient Eastern schools are corrupted and destroyed by the onslaught of postmodern tartarism. The beads, the patterns and orders and thrown into disarray. Some attempt to rush to collect the beads from the jaws of the crawling time, and weave their own, but by and by it is a personal endeavor — that of a metaphysical anarch. Civilizationally-generated mental diseases follow the splinters of the noosphere into chaotically warrying factions, if we should even care, all are moves are strangled by the modus operandi of the current state of affairs.

Yet, we are all in need of co-ordinates, something referentially still, so each faction invests itself into one or another personality cult of mongrels, deluded pockets of belief-systems, one or another political system, that weave their own tale of ignoramuses, enchanting the masses with their flawed and misfired projections generated in castles of illusions built on the cadavers of the mob that is in love with the grand effect of the construction from their corpses.

It is a civilization that is lost in a Labyrinth seeking or running away from the Minotaur — but he's nowhere to be found, he long abandoned the maze. It is a civilization that cut the Ariadne's thread because it "knew better" believing that severing the past vector and replacing it with progress — not technological progress — but social logia devaluation will liberate it. It enslaved it, just like Judeo-Christianity enslaved and captured human spirit of high antique, so modernity abolished pretense of Judeo-Christianity that paved a way to atheology of nihilism through its illogical doctrinairy stiffness, to ethics and morality, and replaced with relativist biotechnoinformational chaosmos, at least in the West.

From perspective of god-making, heroisation or redeification, from the perspective of pneumatology, it is a tragedy. Biomass deprived of soul or ignorant of ascenscion rituals makes perfect slaves, because when you take their liberty away it has nowhere to turn to, apart from the hands that feed its living corpse. Ultimately, even psychologically speaking, ultimate reference of one's own godhood makes us indestructible, when it is enfleshed in reality, it makes as gods. One may argue that blind ideology and religious extremism works in the same way, let us not play in the dirt of fundamentalists, but emerge subtle and strong, moderate and perseverant — duration is the key word here, it is not love or compassion that should be extended, they're on fumes, but personal responsibility and commitment that should be taught. We can't reconstruct what is lost, but at least we may try to extend the lever, like Archmides, to make the task easier and lift more with less effort.

Wrath and honesty

The Sun represent justice, truth and force, under sun's eminence in sun's presence contracts were signed in Ancient Rome. It represents wrath and glory, stability and intellect, self-derived from its constitution and its soul. Upon Earth's surface, its presence in day-time gave a never-ending procession of myths, it is the most reassuring time-cycle that is embedded in human souls since the dawn of their consciousness.

Yet, people are clustering around most history-driven processes that contradict the foundation of those processes, they give in to the most satisfying untruths, given to an illusion of temporary order, comfort and control. One Japanese prince was quoted in "Shobogenzo" by Master Dogen, he uttered: "What is true to one is false to another, what is false to one, is true to the opponent". It is enough to learn from Ancient Greek courts that the testimonial of witnesses was ranked of lesser value than that derived from probability and demonstrated evidence. People see what they want to see, they believe what they want to believe: satisfy their eyes, ears, beliefs, and you are a friend. Contradict them and you are scorned or mocked at best, or become their sworn enemy at worst. The honest survive only amongst the like-minded, the cunning until their caught.

Look at the beliefs seething in the noosphere, check their logic, rationality, reason, evidence, facts, expertise, knowledge. Even in such risky territories as metaphysics reason is necessary, especially among the non-convinced, to get any argument forward. Among the believers, however, whether be it a political stance, a religious system, a delusional conspiracy theory, justification for one's behavior and feeling – none of it is required.

In such a way ignorance is a-historical, not only that, it is anti-historical.

How many offensives had, for example, christian fortress besieged by the brightest of minds and "detractors" survived. How many brainwashed souls and minds and hearts would give away their lives, liberties, decency, intelligence in order for this grand historicized lie to thrive. Yet, it persists! No one wants to eliminate faith as such, it is necessary to metaphysize a person to complete him, however, not at the cost of thwarting and tying up his soul in pain, suffering, guilt, condescending hyper-moralizing, doctrines that destroy his mind and soul.

Politicizing and weaponizing faiths as ordering narrative machines and tools of control are handy, exactly because of persistence of beliefs and the need to fill the existential and spiritual void. No one wants to abolish the science behind the CERN accelerator or the ITER fusion project, yet there are few experts taken out of population of Earth that are capable of understanding and building it. ITER and CERN doesn't fulfill existential needs, it fulfills technological visions of the future. No one wants to abolish faith too, yet faith is easy, millions. There were attempts at impregnating religions with reason, for example the neoplatonizing Ismaili Islam, the neoplatonizing Renaissance Christian writers, but all those attempts failed, because neoplatonism, at least as represented by Plotinus – was anti-Gnostic, anti-Galilean, anti-Christian. For exactly the same reasons, those religions had nothing to do with reasoned faith, and no matter how hard you tried, they couldn't be, for reason would dismantle them to the core as irrational. Yet, Christianity and Islam persist till modern day, neoplatonism is a past-time hobby of a handful philosophers, small interest groups and academicians.

The curse of expert knowledge is: "if everybody would know, they would". They won't, because its not in their scope of intellectual efforts. The blessing of politics is "they don't know, so let's use it". Analogically, the curse of history is "it will repeat itself if they won't know", the blessing of power is "we will use the same methods, to repeat it".

Well, the damage done to intellectual culture in civilized societies is immense, the destruction of faculties to think critically, in an informed manner, to research and gather an in-depth knowledge of a topic is by and large reserved for the few. Among faith- and religious-oriented people there is a swathe of ignorance related to history, origin, transformation, discourse of their own faith. The preference is to select cherries from the cake that befit a believer most. There is not a single monolithic religion, there are small oscillating sectarian beliefs that would be considered a heresy among the orthodox. Yet, they all usurp the right to be most profound, most true, most beneficial.

In this, I prefer the honest Iamblichean "theology and philosophy was created by men for men, there was no god-given revelation". He was not a man of small faith, he was a thamaturgist and a theurgist of neoplatonic creed. Yet, he was well aware of his "cloud of unknowing", his apophatic uncertainties and the origin of all mythemes, religions etc. The way we create simulations of Divinities and act therein in the world is our simulation, a projection, as long as it is effective – it holds its ground, but it never objectively true. In that I prefer "approximating realization" or "uncertain truths", to "revealed religions", and "incontestable doctrines".

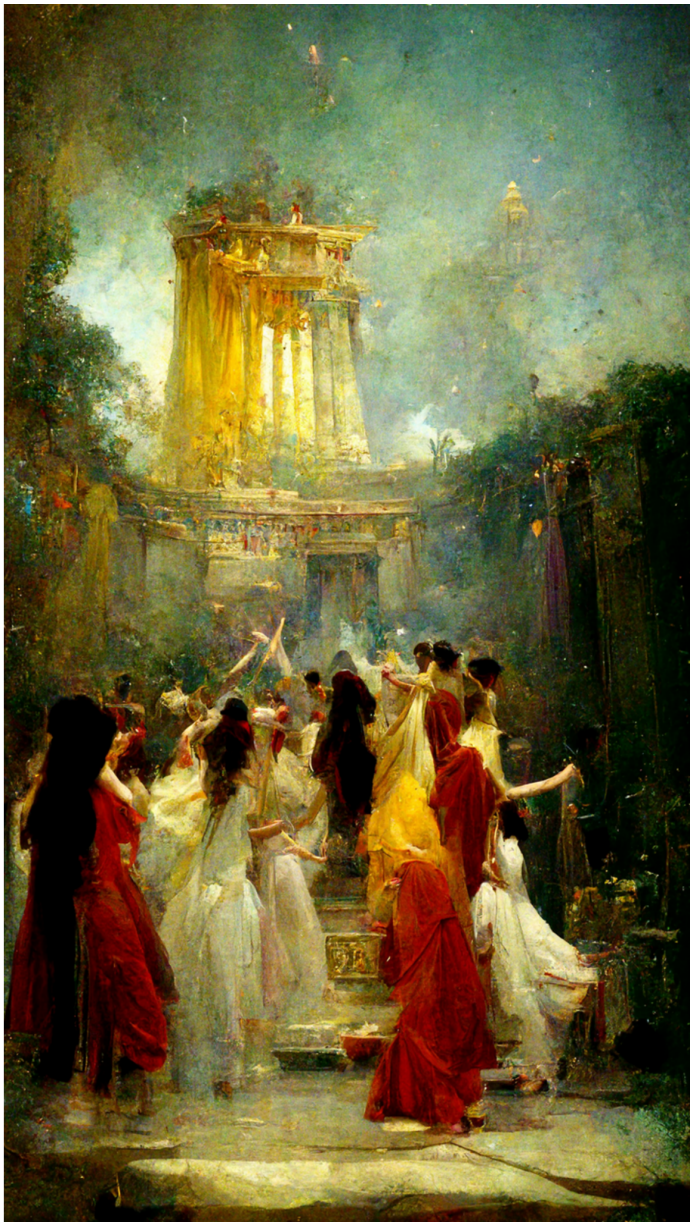
This framework relates to politics in meta-politics, there is only as much chaos as nature tolerates, inasmuch as human nature and its civilized, idyllical or beastly, horrendous structure allows. Laws of entropy work, golden ages pass, iron ages kick in.

About carrying the body and the mind: mediumistic traces

I have walked with heathen saints. I have pondered with kings and queens of the past and worn their crowns for a moment, with masters of antiquity and divine philosophers, I have enjoyed sensuality with the sacred prostitutes of the Babylonian temples and the devas of the Hindus. I have thought with magicians of bygone ages and elven spirits, with vipers and winged ones. The doors of the hidden worlds open before me. In complete silence I shared my body and mind with the condemned and the unfortunate and with the blissful and the divine. Artifexa became a temple, so did the Artifex. Silently I understood misery with the poor and downcast, appreciated silence with the glorious and victorious, with heroes and wretched. I spoke in silent, wordless speech with the gods and star brothers, with your souls and the souls of the animals in a unitary intelligibility. — Saturnin



Those who follow their destiny and know themselves are duly freed from the influence of the powers that rule the unconscious and animate them whenever such a need arises — they allow their stars and genius to animate them, for they are essentially one and the same, while the family of spirits guides them as a friend in the midst of the space-like serenity and war, sameness and otherness, nature, substance, inclination and form of all beings and forces at play.

It is more likely that the human world will be overshadowed by the other, disincarnate side than that people will forge their own destinies. In the impasse, the human side distorts the other side, in life and after death, and likewise the other side distorts human affairs. There is a wedge between the top and the bottom, a wedge created for the purpose of blinding. As below, so in the middle; as in the middle, so below. To get to the top, you have to penetrate all the illusions, deceptions and masks that this blind world has created on both sides, so that no truth or realization will ever emerge. The citadel was built, to leave it you need luck or help. The consequences of Lethe, the river of immemory for the world and the people are catastrophic.

Ontology of being

Any being caught in the process of existence is either active, passive, dormant, or reactive. It thrives in its environment and in its element, according to its nature, which is defined as its most general characteristic, and the unique genii belonging to a species and related to that essence through the senses, which are defined as every point of contact between the being and reality. It moves in its inclination according to its inner direction and outer movement within a given topography of itself, circumstances and environment. Every being has its substance and the limit of its substance is its influence on the world, in other words, its impressions on itself and on the world, while the competence of its emergence, execution, influence, unfolding, origin, impression or whether intentional or unintentional, is defined by the flow of its being, either collectively, holistically, in many directions or unidirectionally in projection, introjection or interprojection of these. Thus, being is defined by the karmic entropy of the entire universal web, which is also topographically diverse and can be defined by the totality of the contents between time, force, consciousness and the variables of all the listed parameters that describe the aspects, the declusion of all the hidden factors.

Often, the awareness of certain knowledge, coupled with observation and self-knowledge, using a different point of view, is enough to form a defense mechanism. It is also beneficial to know that non-human senses (sense is nothing more than an aggregate of contact between an experiencer and a given phenomenon, there can be multiple ways to enter into such a relationship.) and intelligence can exist in a disincarnate manner, but still retain senses unknown to humans. To become master of one's body and mind, to know oneself and one's direction, is to be conscious.

Nature can manifest its character only to the extent that our mental state, attitude, content, structure, feeling, and the vastness of our mind and heart allow, according to our self-awareness, self-knowledge, introspection, observation, discipline, and willful expression. They can also extend our natural substance, nature and inclinations to the extremes of their being, greatness or badness. The center is the safe territory, the reason, the feeling and the intellect that select and discipline these extremes to bring them into harmony.

As long as we do not engage in psychic assaults in which we are merely tools or puppets, and also — contradict, confront, and know where we stand through such assaults, we can work with different intelligences for a specific goal. As the vastness and expanse of our mind can accommodate them, and we sacrifice a part of ourselves so that nature can manifest, we can establish ourselves as the living temple and master of the house in awareness of their presence. The guests either abuse the temple and destroy the spirit by trying to violate it without permission, whereas they should be thrown out or welcomed as our friends if they respect it.

Some natures are attracted by the law of similarity, others by the law of contrast and difference. Others by the law of affect, still others by the law of aversion. Still others by the law of domination, others by the law of freedom. Some are attracted by similitude in nature, others antagonized by difference. Still others are guided by choice and will and have an overt or hidden goal, others by the mind's passivity or its steely purpose and goal, still others by its inertia toward other goals. In this tension, one progresses or takes a few steps backward in an alchemy of self-exploration to establish and refine one's image of the mind, as long as it does not fragment or become what is known as „psychotic" — when the debris of the process consumes the mind and averts its process of healing, rounding and incorporating mythopsychic equilibria into a greater vista of the world.

This process of confrontation shapes the mind when it is unidirectionally guided by an idea of what we want to become, our principles, our higher aspirations. There must always be a „personality ideal" or a „mental image ideal" to which we aspire. It is often only a trace, but it grows into full-fledged matter and matures and takes on reality and thickness as we progress. Without it, we fall apart. To name a few personal: may it be the virtues of the Res Publica of the Romans, the Confucian order and cosmos, the Zenistic being in all instances of life, the Dharmic principles of compassion and kindness, the Greek delight in philosophy and elegant theorizing, paideic oikumene, the romantic Germanic flow of rapturous ideals, the Arab ferocity and martial resilience, the lightness and sanctity of the Druids, the sensual pitching, and mastered sublimity of the Pythagoreans, the native love of nature, and the Egyptian affirmation of life and the Akkadian reverence for the depths of the universe. These and many other cultures produced both men and women of great stature, and likewise, through natural human weaknesses and misguidance, produced individuals who turned against their own and brought about ruin. The examples can be multiplied, but they must be selected, assimilated, affirmed, authenticated, understood, seen through, thought out, and matured. The wisdoms and principles of the ancients are not cast aside, but left to all those who penetrate their mysteries and at least try to live by them and keep them in their hearts.

The cult of the mind should not replace the more tender openness to idea, consciousness, feeling and their transformations — for the mind is merely a vehicle and a sixth sense. When attachment to this sense becomes too strong, we suffer harm when it turns against us, or we lose self-conscious qualities we took for granted. The mind should be refined in a judicious process by higher sources in cooperation with the goal of imparting qualities of individual consciousness and developing imprints for vehicles of consciousness, not to develop a perfect apparatus. As a confrontation with the abyss from the perspective of a mind that observes strange projections of the mind onto the total void, for example, when we happen to feel fear, we trigger terrifying scenes that we have seen in horror as they take flesh before our eyes and continue to terrorize our mind when we are completely empty and disciplined in the void, there is not a trace of thought or image. In other words, every image and thought form, every inclination and habit is reinforced, if not extinguished. It is easy to predict that when we die and our mind slowly goes out, the first thing that happens after death is the dissociation of image processing, in other words, the fragmented worlds of our mind fall apart, because the „imprint" of a mind slowly disintegrates after death as the consciousness is trapped in these projections, introjections. This is what the Buddhists call the „intermediate stage." There are psychopomps that assist in such transitions to other worlds and can penetrate fragments of the mind or introduce consciousness into a vehicle (a new subtle mind and body). Likewise, there are planes, dimensions, and domains that are psychoreactive and designed for various purposes in which the fragmented spirits can be trapped along with the conscious element and into which they are born.

In the many years of my experience, I have been a wearable suit, a medium, a baked, expansive, extremely self-aware spirit for many entities. I was able to host several entities in the temple of my body, and while resisting being overpowered by their entities and protecting myself from injury, I witnessed those who supported me on my journey. It is a constant battle for the sovereignty of the mind, against inferior intelligences and lesser confused beings who are concerned with dominating or enforcing their flawed will. They sought to gain total control over my body and mind, whether by violent, vulgar or viciously subtle means. At the same time, they invited or welcomed higher intelligences as my beloved teachers who wanted to expand my intelligence, my perception, my experience, my human nature and my sense of divinity. I perceive the pressure in certain parts and circuits of the physical brain and central nervous system, feel different kinds of amplified energies, learn about the characters and qualities of the gods perverted and tempted by bestial beings. Feel the magnetic power of the gods, get infected by their power and abilities, recognize their energetic forms and shapes. Ignited by various degrees of their strength and abilities, perceiving the general feeling and wear of such assimilation that allowed me to research and write down actively and continuously afterwards.

Introduction to Incarnations

Any attribution of an objective reality to the intersubjective and subjective experiences, phenomenal but beyond the socialized and conditioned reasons, creates a subject-object relationship. It is not a matter of denying the possibility of an interdependent existence of certain beings and dimensions — it is solely a matter of preserving reason, of not becoming a slave to such a relationship, but a master in the realm of one's own mind, which can confirm what truth might lie in the observations discovered, what knowledge and wisdom might be learned. One avoids multiplying realities beyond what is necessary, and does not allow oneself to be impressed and excited by things that some find anomalous, frightening or terrorizing, but considers it a rare gift to expand and coalesce with the unmapped territory, gradually mapping and conquering it, until adapted, we work through it with skill.

The aim of this work is to provide an alternative framework for thinking about incarnations, avoiding the pitfalls of religious scripts and not letting the understanding of this phenomenon revert to the Middle Ages of so-called „possession", as in the Abrahamic religions (sic!). First of all, I would like to emphasize that this document does not take up the semantically familiar term, and as a medium I will refrain from criticizing such encounters, but rather focus on their understanding. Incarnation has been colonized by monotheistic religions and usually means to be dominated by a malevolent spirit that in fact stakes out the perspective and divides the world into the divine, which in the Abrahamic monotheistic model does not take possession of human beings, and the diabolical world, which does. I prefer to observe this world with partially Hindi perception. I would like to illustrate it with a fragment from the work of Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa, the great student of Johannes Trithemius in which possessions, inhabitations and incarnations by lower, middle and higher spirits and intelligences are described, which subsequently leads to a modernized version of such understandings.

Fragments of Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa, Chapter 60 Of Madness, and Divinations which are made when men are awake, and of the power of a Melancholy humor, by which Spirits are sometimes induced into man's bodies.

> "It happens also sometimes, that not only they that are asleep, but also they that are watchful do with a kind of instigation of mind, Divine, which Divination Aristotle calls ravishment, or a kind of madness, and teaches that it proceeds from a melancholy humor, saying in his Treatise of divination: Melancholy men, by reason of their earnestness, do far better conjecture, and quickly conceive a habit, and most easily receive an impression of the Celestials. And in his Problemes saith, that the Sibyls, and the Bacchides, and Niceratus the Syracusan, and Amon, were by their naturall Melancholy complexion Prophets, and Poets. The cause therefore of this madness, if it be any thing within the body, is a melancholy humor, not that which they call black choller [choler], which is so obstinate, and terrible a thing, that the violence of it is said by Physitians [physicians], and

Naturall Phylosophers [philosophers], besides madness, which it doth induce, also to entice evill spirits to seize upon mens bodies. Therefore we understand a melancholy humor here, to be a naturall, and white choller [choler]. For this, when it is stirred up, burns, and stirs up a madness conducing to knowledge, and divination, especially if it be helped by any Celestiall influx, especially of Saturn, who seeing he is cold, and dry, as is a melancholy humor, hath his influence upon it, increaseth, and preserveth it. Besides, seeing he is the Author of secret contemplation, and estranged from all publike [public] affairs, and the highest of all the planets, doth alwaies as with call his mind from outward businesses, so also makes it ascend higher, and bestows upon him the knowledge, and passages of future things. And this is Aristotles meaning in his book of Problemes. By Melancholy, saith he, some men are made as it were divine, foretelling things to come, and some men are made Poets. He saith also, that all men that were excellent in any Science, were for the most part melancholy. Democritus, and Plato attest the same, saying, that there were some melancholy men, that had such excellent wits, that they were thought, and seemed to be more divine then humane. So also there have been many melancholy men at first rude, ignorant, and untractable, as they say Hesiod, Ion, Tynnichus, Calcinenses, Homer, and Lucretius were, who on a suddain were taken with a madness, and became Poets, and prophecied wonderfull, and divine things, which they themselves scarce understood. Whence divine Plato in Ion saith, many Prophets, after the violence of their madness was abated, do not well understand what they wrote, yet treated acurately [accurately] of each Art in their madness, as all Artists by reading of them judge. So great also they say the power of melancholy is of, that by its force, Celestiall spirits also are sometimes drawn into mens bodies, by whose presence, and instinct, antiquity testifies men have been made drunk, and spake most wonderful things. And that they think happens under a threefold [three-fold] difference, according to a threefold apprehension of the soul, viz. imaginative, rationall, and mentall. They say therefore, when the mind is forced with a melancholy humor, nothing moderating the power of the body, and passing beyond the bonds of the members, is wholly carried into imagination, and doth suddenly become a seat for inferior spirits, by whom it oftentimes receives wonderfull wayes, and forms of manuall Arts. So we see that any most ignorant man doth presently become an excellent painter, or contrivers of building, and to become a master in any such Art. But when these kinds of spirits portend to us future things, they shew those things which belong to the disturbing of the Elements, and changes of times, as rain, tempests, innundations, earthquakes, great mortality, famine, slaughter, and the like. As we read in Aulus Gelius, that Cornelius Patarus his Priest did at the time, when Cesar, and Pompey were to fight in Thessalia, being taken with a madness, foretell the time, order, and issue of the battell [battle]. But when the mind is turned wholly into reason, it becomes a receptacle for midle [middle] spirits. Hence it obtains the knowledge, and understanding of natural, and humane things. So we see that a man sometimes doth on a suddain become a Philosopher, Physitian [physician], or an excellent Orator, and foretels [foretells] mutations of Kingdomes, and restitutions of Ages, and such things as belong to them, as the Sybill [Sibyl] did to the Romanes; but when the mind is wholly elevated into the understanding, then it becomes a receptacle of sublime spirits, and learns of them the secrets of divine things, such as the Law of God, the orders of Angels, and such things as belong to the knowledge of things eternall, and salvation of souls. It foresees things which are appointed by Gods speciall predestination, as future prodigies, or miracles, the prophet to come, and the changing of the law. There are also some prognosticks, which are in the midle [middle], betwixt naturall, and supernaturall divination, as in those who are neer to death, and being weakened with old Age, do sometimes foresee things to come, because as saith Plato, by how much the more men are less hindred by their sence, so much the more acurately they understand, and because they are neerer to the place whither they must go, and their bonds being as it were a little loosed, seeing they are no more subject to the body, easily perceive the light of divine revelation."

Psychoreactives

A series of tendencies, natures, whether in an integral being, an extended field of consciousness, or a strange psychomorph, or a corrupted energy, an egregor, a god-form, a magical field or current, a dimension, an independent God, a Goddess etc., focused in a ray, can be interpreted by the human mind. It reacts with the structure of the nervous system and influences both physiological, psychological and occulted pneumatic effects. Nature is a general inclination toward a substance of a being in its reality or dimension. Humans are thought to have six senses, including the mind, apart from possible magneto- and electroreceptive senses, possibly others, as enumerated Siddhis — that is the souls ability that is oft mistaken for more material endeavours. There are entities that may have multiple senses that are organs or apparatuses for contact with a reality, not necessarily the one we perceive, and they do not require biological backing, they may be basically disincarnate. Entities can at times integrate with, assimilate, modify, pervert, expand, regress, or evolve the human mind and brain, or be absorbed by the human mind. The regular biopsychological and physiological factors are considered as the basis for the functioning of the human organism. They explain the processes in the regular cognitive science in an interconnectivist way, but they are mutable and sometimes overridden by effective, experiential and ethereal influences capable of altering the biochemistry, homeostasis, electrical conductivity in the neural structures, bioelectromagnetism and the whole biological foundation of the organism as well as its hidden components.

Ethereal natures are not always compatible with individual character and biopsychological makeup of a human being, producing weird perception, eeries gustos or even madness and in critical situations — atrocities. There are natures that are docile and expand our natural capacities, extending human nature to divinity, and those that set us back as something unnatural and strange or bestial and inhuman. However, they do not work in the void, we are not a „tabula rasa" but a more or less uniformly formed human being — hence the natures that focus on us work on our past memories, past experiences and inclinations, our hidden motives and deeds, addictions, attachments, emotions, bloodlines, spiritual lineages, thought carvings, mental habits — all of which can be read by certain natures for whom some things about us are evident and others hidden. We are all born into a certain socio-historical environment, into wealth or poverty, into education or lack thereof, into moral and ethical upbringing or being on our own in this regard. We can be principled or generally loose and demoralised. Sometimes a nature that is simply different can lead a human mind to extreme states and bestiality, not by the power of its intelligence, but by a psychoreaction with certain archaic parts of the brain. It is quite different when a malevolent intelligence tries to do the same by replacing our nature and making it an executive tool of malice. Likewise, uncanny beings and energies can often produce states that are simply uncanny and bizarre to a human being, but they enrich us with experiences, if we survive them.

Everyone has a psyche that is formed to some degree. While subliminal or overt injuries can exploit the cracks in a person's personality to penetrate it and replace the person's nature with their own, a well-formed personality can use the cooperation of various entities and intelligences for a specific purpose and form the mind and psyche along the way. On the one hand we have the typical human psychology, on the other hand we have entities capable of influencing the conductivity, for example — of neural circuits of the mind, with the ability to change biochemical reactions in the physiological brain and override the circuits of the nervous system. It can change the whole personality and thinking style, corrupt us, incite anger, murderous thoughts, it can give us different abilities, or temporary knowledge of arts and sciences that we did not possess by our own study (dancing, fighting, knowledge of languages), it can develop noble or unhappy habits, make us addicted to substances, or help us in scientific, artistic and spiritual matters, depending on the nature of the being. It is as if the human experience from all the centuries of its existence were suddenly accessible to us, not as an anonymous dead experience, but as flourishing intelligences, souls and spirits of all the greatness of the past, invoked, if not by planets, stars, then by hidden worlds of the Earth.

Example: I was standing next to a mirror, staring into it, when a shadow hand appeared and passed right through my skull, causing temporal dissociations of mental processes, dissolution of identity, and a general implosion of the structures ordering reality, while the mind was flooded in confusion, alienation, and utter chaos.

Conclusion: It could be that the disruptions of the ionotropic pathways in neural circuitry was affected or temporarily distorted so that the human bio-computer was destabilized by an external malignant entity, causing a psychotic decompensation until stability was reached again.

Other examples include nested entities affecting the energetic homeostasis of the organs (thus affecting the biochemical responses), and although normal medical treatment is of prime importance — and I never undermine it, otherwise I would be a charlatan, certain agents responsible for the imbalance can be removed by healing entities (occult etiology of the disease and its resolution) or a healer working with them. While those that act on human nature (Hsing, as the Chinese called it) are considered beneficent, those that divert energies to the lower or bestial nature are to be avoided. In truth, different natures can access our minds, and not every change is a sign of influence, but according to the author's experiments with subjectively felt energy and tracing the mental continuum, many do, and whether positive or negative from the human point of view, it is what we make of it to achieve individuation, as cuts and polishes on our minds and souls. The world is populated by entities long forgotten and many people are simply closed to such influences through the means of perception, but as often observed, even people who do not directly believe in such things are the easiest material for influence, as the author noted in his presence the use and abuse of ordinary people while certain entities used their minds, nervous systems and bodies against him, of course, even more benevolent entities can impress and influence people to some degree. People who are not trained to patiently and calmly recognize such activities will most likely overreact, react with fear, or go insane. People exposed to such a change often use two defense tactics: either nihilation (it did not happen) or rationalization (I had a bad time) and quickly return to their normal routine. The entity does not undermine the existing personality, but uses the existing psychological traits to affect it, changing it over time through long-term cueing, which is an example of an injury. The positive side is the development of new skills, new personality traits, being more human, cooperating with higher sources. It is not necessary that the entity „carries" the body and mind all the time, it is enough to have an association with a particular entity, and it can occasionally remember itself when we are in the net of its contractual influence. However, the most powerful events, injuries or enhancements occur when the entity carries the body and mind and actively influences the character. I will not attempt to describe what these entities are made of, neither the subtle yet powerful deva beings, nor demonic powers, nor all the realms of otherworldly life in between and the „fauna and flora" of the other side, but it would be interesting to describe the components of the human soul and associate them to some degree with domains and dimensions that might have access to our mind and body through these components. They all have their origin story, which is different from the myths that the great religions have created about them (the Fall, the Primordial Evil). We will rather trace certain developments as the natural evolution of certain dimensions and associated reality frequencies and the splitting of the human mind into „chthonic" or more animalistic, „civilized" or with fixed valuations about the world and „stellar", that rare particle of our nature that reflects the microcosm.

Distinction between the types of influence

— Possession, Control Incarnation, Psychic Overdrive

When a dominant entity or agent seeks to take control of the mental and psycho-somatic aggregates of the controlled, violating the original will, psychic energy, and psycho-somatic functions of the artifex/artifexa, or exchanging certain abilities and mental attitudes on a contractual basis.

— Medialization, Invocation

When the artificer/artifexa consciously or semi-consciously is a medium for a particular entity and withdraws parts of his/her ego and consciousness to give the entity a fuller expression. Such processes can be subtle, subtle, or completely autonomous but within the Artifex's agreed control.

— Avatarization

When the Artificer/Artifexa becomes a vessel for and cooperates with a higher entity, deity, an interstellar intelligence through a human mind and psychic attitude to achieve specific goals of a deity or interstellar intelligence in a local continuum mediated by the human mind, and cooperates with it through human focus to catalyze greater forces. It is like temporarily becoming a human demigod to accomplish a specific task or to serve as a priest-avatar of a deity or higher ensouled intelligence.

— Emanation

When a particular entity or deity bestows its attributes that shape the artifex's psyche, along with augmenting abilities that the artifex does not normally possess, or when it blocks, withdraws certain abilities and psychic attitudes, including character for the purpose of manifestation, sometimes trying to overpower him, sometimes being completely neutral but subtly adapting to his nature, sometimes assisting him in certain endeavors.

— Portalization

When the mind of the Artifex, Artifexa is used as an interdimensional portal for trading with entities through realities or communication, and they temporarily carry and deform themselves through his mind, sometimes taking on his characteristics and psychic traits. Kernelization of the mind, or creating crossroads of currents and dimensions through ar-tifexa's mind.

— Trancisation

When the mind of the artifex is induced in trance states and allows the expression of an entity while retaining consciousness, or when one is completely lost in the trance state yet allows it to control the ceremonies, rituals, and expressions, or under the condition of a psychic override and knock-out of consciousness, one merges with a particular entity and fully manifests its character, nature, and abilities.

An foreign influence occurs when an action or thought, talents, traits, abilities, character, personality, mental attitudes, energy attitudes, and mental continuum is influenced by any entity. The term can be extended to the activity of the split mind, i.e., any mental split that results in the creation of a pseudo-entity carved from a pool of psychic resources, e.g., a god-form, a tulpa, a psychic larva, an egregor, a shadow servitor, thus automatons, or a free true entity that is intelligent, self-reflective, and independent of mind. It can also be any memetical possession or ideology possession. Anything human that creates a bio-psychic form or a thought form, or an energy form that can be a separate or mixed strand of energies, can inhabit and influence the mind and pass from one mind to another. Although the formation of mental egregors and god-forms is one thing, they have a more limited field for influencing the human mind than autonomous psycho-forms and beings. After influencing, the mind can be changed, enlarged, regressed, blocked, strengthened or filtered by the character of an incarnating or influencing agent. For example, its intelligence, characteristics, energy capacity and tendencies, which is different from the preliminary will are detected. This can happen as violation, e.g. regression, overpowering, devolution, perversion, corruption, or cooperation e.g. improvement, collaboration. It may be a positive facilitations e.g. granting abilities, mental skills, acumen and psycho-physiological attitudes that are not present in a natural environment. All this is perceived through the difference between the primary psychic macro-programs observed from the position of the Self, which maintains the constants of comparative control of „what is", „what was" and „what should be" in the contibuously observed psychic millieu. The acquisition of such a HGA springs from introspection, experience, introspection, contemplation, meditation, sublimation, conscious volitional sense of direction, it is a conscious superego that lives for itself and tends to form, receive and give. It is either separated from the mind and becomes a genius or a Juno through magical operations, or it already exists on a higher level that must be recognized and consciously directed, it is the throne of body, heart and mind of the regular mind.

To become aware of such changes in the magical consciousness, it is necessary to actively or retrospectively observe the mental continuum and to maintain and train the memory while conversing with and comparing the superego. Observable influences occur by adding, subtracting, overriding, supporting, subjugating, or extending personal mental and psychomotor qualities with those of the external agent (alternative mind), augmented by non-transferable qualia of the subjective emotional, cognitive-affective aspects of mental life. They can be traced with the help of energy shifts, that is clairsentience, which give a clearer indication of the change occurring as different pressures in the field and central nervous system of the subject, with differentiated energies shown by a variety of entities. They are perceived as a magnetic disturbance or as a discerned physical, empitic sensation, and the shifts are particularly observable in certain areas of the brain and nervous system. However, when such conditions are severe, it can be difficult to break free from them, so strict discipline, self-control and self-knowledge can ameliorate or remedy such conditions.

Perfect avatar, in which the will of man is subordinated and the qualities of the being can develop almost completely. A distinction is made between overrides, or when a man is forced by the forcible override of his thought processes to obey and carry out the will of the entity. To be distinguished from benevolent incarnations, where the evolved magician-medium is fully aware of the influence and does not confuse and cooperate with the entity. The body and the mind are thus one temple. In general, the will is never violated by a higher being, it can be modified, enhanced or inspired by a particular deity, hero, demigod, being, daimonion, entity, non-entity psychomorph, spiritual intelligence etc. The richness of the ancient bestiaries should be sufficient with respect to the invisible worlds, even if some of it was also subject to natural human imagination, observations of invisible-invisible worlds were not so uncommon. When their superiority in wisdom, insight, power, justice, love, and passionate benevolence toward human beings and this world is recognized, the will is temporarily withdrawn to accomplish a common work of greater commitment. If it is recognized as malevolent, it is either expelled, or the offensive must be survived by strict discipline and patience, or by the help of beings who can contain or destroy the influence.

Incarnation ab ignorantia, in which the psyche, because of its immaturity, enslavement, or ignorance, is not well formed or is easily influenced so that it commits certain acts or is subjected to mental continuities that would not otherwise occur, without having the slightest idea that it is in the mind of the ignoramus.

Whole-body incarnation, in which the human aggregates that are influenced become an extension of an entity's will, usually after a personality core has been formed and a certain degree of awareness and introspection has been achieved. Skills manifest that allow the entity to speak through us, the incarnation (entity) usually understands the mental language of thoughts, various craft skills and psychomotor skills (dancing, fighting) are temporarily acquired, one can easily train in this way various scientific disciplines, arts, crafts and sports, and it requires fewer training hours. The author has experienced such an incarnation in practice. When he danced in the mud, he temporarily acquired wonderful fighting skills and agility, so that he almost flew through the air, only to return to normal a minute later. A Chinese master from the Tang Dynasty (6th century) who taught the emperor was also contacted and helped with the training. Another example was the pagan philosopher Hypatia (or her emanation) who helped with the studies of Neoplatonic philosophy. I believe that there is a whole family of high spirits from the past who could enrich humanity with their genius if we were more open to their guidance – and probably they continue to guide us.

Semi-corporeal incarnation, where the entity blocks certain qualities in the individual's psyche while unfolding others. If the entity is not trained in a particular skill, actions in that discipline will be much more difficult. If it is powerful, experienced and old, there will be extreme clarity of one way, deep and stable feelings that enhance the cognitive attitude when viewed through the human anthropo-empathic lens. When an entity is bizarre or multi-existent, it is perceived by the human central nervous system in different ways. Some are more archaic, older, others are catalyzed by the human mind as something non-human that temporarily takes over the mind of the human subject and responds with biopsychological and psychopneumatic functions in different ways.

Daimons

Greek daimon "deity, divine power; lesser god; guiding spirit, tutelary deity" (sometimes including souls of the dead); "one's genius, lot, or fortune;" from PIE *dai-mon- "divider, provider" (of fortunes or destinies), from root *da- "to divide."

> „If I observed human folly for a thousand years in a thousand lives and did not become the master of human destinies, I would be an idiot; if I did, I would be a great demon". — Saturnin.

The genealogy of the invisible worlds does not come from nothing. All life on earth, including invisible life, has a history.

The ancients divided the daimons into air, water, fire and earth according to the elements. If we further subdivide these into the scales of the Bardo Thodol (Tibetan Book of the Dead), which distinguish visible light, and extend them to infrared and ultraviolet, an enormous abundance of ethereal and astral worlds appears to us. Not all worlds are visible to siddi holders, clairvoyants and clairsentients, sometimes they are just glimpses, sometimes they are full manifestations, rarely they last more than a few minutes, sometimes seconds, sometimes they are just flashes. Learning how to deal with what you see and what you think is a coherent entity that responds in real time is another matter entirely.

Trying to map this world is quite messy even at second glance, and one could drown in taxonomies and bestiaries by simply „multiplying beings beyond necessity" rather than focusing on one's own evolution with due respect for all worlds. In the manifold dimensions we are dealing with a vast and strange plethora of worlds quite different from those of our human race. Remember that „daimons" were a higher race than humans for the Neoplatonic philosophers, and the concept has evolved several times. Socrates having his daimon meant that his spirit was a daimon or demigod manifesting his genii and nature in human form. Different civilizations distinguished between personal daimons and demons that bring harm or blessing. They also had many functions, from messengers (angeli bonum) to inspiring forces to harbingers of doom. It has been speculated that they had many origins, they were descended from the gods and were sent as messengers and deliverers or had punitive or judicial functions, they were born from the great abyss, they were born from the chthonic womb as chthonic „troublemakers". Nevertheless, they were to be distinguished from black souls, dead souls or skia, simulacra, shells, shrouds, and a host of other pitch-black apparitions and entities that were not of the demonic race. Plutarch wrote that good daimons became deities, and even considered Isis and Osiris to be good daimons who became powerful deities. He also thought that daimons who were evil or became troublesome to others were restored to order and returned to nature.

In other ways, they took their natural position without going beyond it and without influencing others in a negative way.

Iamblich openly warned against inviting demonic inspirations, because the mixing of these natures with people could have a volatile effect. One may have to deal with an innocent forest spirit (daimon) that is benevolent and becomes a friend that does not even want to hurt our minds, hearts or souls, or with a strange, malignant spirit of a deceased person that appears as a shadow trapped in suffering and inspires similar things when it takes possession of a human being.

How did they come into being? It is necessary to understand that all life on Earth has an occult background and that under normal conditions a multitude of souls with various specialised functions are invisible, depending on the species and lineage of the animal, usually catalogued in evolutionary biology. The metempsychosis of souls, animals and humans and their transmigration and birth into many such invisible worlds seems to be a sacred chaos from which many hybrids emerge. The demon in ancient China was historically considered an animal-deity hybrid, that is, it arose from the unity of nature or the mystical participation of etheric nature in the biosphere. Such hybrids later developed into, for example, the Chinese dragon cult, which according to tradition was a mixture of many animals representing a single wondrous being.

Thus, when the soul of an animal takes on or mixes with the body of a human being through attraction, one acquires the character and nature of that animal. Whether or not an air daimon takes on the body of a human, its character and nature intermingle, resulting in a different understanding of its nature and a subjective perspective and sense of the totality of itself, insofar as the other entity can experience the human perception of things to an extent that corresponds to its nature.

From the standard perspective, one rarely decides which world one will be born into before and after this existence, although many traditions have sought to master both rebirth into a desirable world and, whenever possible, complete liberation from the phenomenal world and become a non-returner, for in this world nothing is eternal and permanent, everything is change and cycle, so too are suffering, bliss, enlightenment and ignorance.

Of course, this view, which stands for the magic of antiquity, is still valid in many cases, because the worlds have evolved with people, sometimes by imitating people, mostly unfortunately, sometimes inspired for good, sometimes for evil — in the eye of man.

Totemistic Emanations or Animal Metempsychosis

> An animal can be a totem for a man, just as a man can be a totem for an animal. — Saturnin

I saw a fox stray into the city in winter, near the Polish National Library in Warsaw. I tried to track him down on the footpaths, but he escaped into the park. Some time later I sensed an incarnation of a certain ensouled fox nature and character, masculine, cheerful, smart, curious about everything and lively, I identified it as the same animal I had seen near the library and it was able to communicate with me temporarily as a soul hybrid in synthony. After it returned to its „fox body" it probably maintained the „impression" of being a human, mixing with my nature, inasmuch as I retained the impression of being a fox. So the old shamanic tales of talking to animals are not just a mythical story. Perhaps these highly skilled shamans were also able to subtly capture impressions of animal conversations and later interpret them correctly, incarnating parts of consciousness or astral doubles into animals, either in trance or in normal perception mode, just as my body and mind is often used by various entities and beings as a wearable suit to radiate and manifest a particular set of psychic qualities when my psyche is used as the basis for further personality, character, cognitive ability and behavioural changes to express the entity according to its character. Rounding up, a human language is not necessary to communicate, ensouled impressions are intelligible throughout many species.

Each biological behavioural trait of an animal closely associated with its species or a more collective hive, such as ants or bees, exhibits more or less a common behaviour with different characteristics and deviations from the general common type. We can speculate that the innate triggering mechanism (IRM) draws from this pool of collective mechanisms and is closely linked to the genetic and neural expressions of a developing organism. Each fragment of this collective pool of traits can thus be isolated as a species-psychomorph. A psychomorph is an energy cluster composed of and afflicted with domain- and species-specific information. It can borrow its character from a fragment or aggregate of the array of traits and then form a field that has these relationships — in anthropocentric terms: it filters itself through them and acquires human-specific behaviours, affects, feelings and cognitions, energies. Psychomorphs do not have their own intelligence, but some can acquire it by connecting to the intelligence of an entity, an animal or a human. Thus, true entities are not psychomorphs, they act independently and according to their nature, but they work with the human mind in a manner similar to a psychomorph, however, they exhibit tendencies associated with their nature and essential character, and in some cases intelligence so manifested or mediated by human intelligence.

It is easier to incarnate animals closer to our neurogenetic structure, eg. mammals than marine animals, and it comes with risks — when a cluster soul is stranded or frightened away in a possessed or mediumized mind, it takes possession of the human mind. Experiments were conducted with collective hive-mind structures, both of bees, ants, mantis species and a shadow manifestation of spiders. The collective hive mind psychomorph is represented by the hive queen and appears in manifestation as a large bee, which is an extract of the collective characteristics of a particular species genius and appears to the human mind in this form — in other words, the human mind interprets the primacy of the collective in this form. The collective functions in such a way that one member can be killed and the rest retains the structure, but when large parts of the hive are destroyed or altered-as happens in the modern world-as ecosystems are gradually destroyed, the entire hive consciousness suffers and becomes destabilised, resulting in strange behaviours, and becomes regressive and slowly decimated. The extinction of a species is not only the physical death of an animal, but also a mass murder of its entire species-specific consciousness, and its death causes a tremendous imbalance in the rest of the collective clans and species, which are highly affected not only per ecosystem, but by the entire fabric of the subtle structures of the life wave. Any animal with a photic nervous system (photosensitive cells) has the capacity to develop a life envelope or soul. More highly developed mammals are capable of developing a shadow soul, a soul and an astral double. And if their spine (djet) is able to filter ophitic currents, they can transform their souls and astral doubles into wings (flying cats, flying vipers, winged lions, pegasi). Of course, „talking" to an animal requires viewing it from the perspective of its cognitive phenotype, and language is based on communication without words, from the perspective of the animal totem.

Scientia Occulta: Nigromancy and Necromancy

Most cabalistic nigromantic treatises deal with the ruins of "God", or the Qlipoth. Almost all postmodern demonological approaches attempt to use this obsolete map of the "fallen one". This is not a treatise on cybernetic computer demonology, but on demonological biomancy. I am a nature guy, that's why. This one-page sketch is intended to illuminate a different approach — strictly evolutionary, genealogical, biological, and seen through occult eyes. Perhaps it throws out certain notions of the tunnels of Seth as a neatly ordered typhonic hierarchy, but its aim is not to create chaos. Just as someone observing nature might see chaos or entropy among the various specimens — nature tends to increase in species and complexity to the extent that its own blueprint allows. It does not transgress its own laws, mercifully! The etheric shadow (Khaibit, Shu, Shut) is a psychosexual disincarnate substance that is active. It is a shell, as a cyborg is to a living being. Nevertheless, it is not free of inclinations, "thoughts," gestures, etc., whether it is controlled by a typhonic mage or a vampire, or is completely independent as a posthumous or postmortem entity. The priests of Anubis in ancient Egypt were skilled in necromancy (necro-manteion or divination from the dead). Since shadows are less time-bound by the standards of the living, they can predict and prophesy certain things if they have the right medium, a sensitive, psionic or necromancer. The word "necro" is etymologically derived from "nigro" because all the shells of animals and humans are pitch black. They are pitch black because they act as formoids in the infrared and ultraviolet regions, while in the light spectrum they consume visible light. The author's experiments in IR /UV convergence resulted in shifts of his own shadow substance and anomalies from the ultraviolet (mauve) frequencies, perhaps they will be described elsewhere. Shadows have different emission and transmission frequencies, an infrared lamp with a high energy industrial emitter managed to burn an intelligent entity in the spectrum of 920—960 nm and its retribution was avoidable if the author had not been so stupid. Different spectrums of shadow entities do not necessarily see each other, depending on the "flux range of operation", although they can join together in "tribes" that demonologists of different eras tried to describe. Because the psychic substance of shadows is intelligent, it interacts with living spirits and can produce hideous, frightening, or unexpected results. It can reactively absorb the psychic complexes and constellations of living people (e.g., nightmares, horrors) as well as cause its own, depending on its inclination. The Romans divided the shadow-men into "Di Manes", the good dead, and "Lemures", the evil dead, and in the Orphic Mysteries the Erynies and Demons were simply "shadows, eidola" of cruel, evil men. In the author's experience, this is only partly true, because di manes behave in different ways depending on the genius loci (genius of the place, culture, ethnic environment) and can be quite benevolent. However, let us abandon the dichotomies. I prefer to understand the world in terms of natures, neither good nor evil, but nature and inclination. To understand the bestiaries of the shadow, one would have to consider all kingdoms: Animal, human, plant, inanimate matter. In ancient China, the emergence of demons was the result of the intermingling of animal spirits with humanoid spirits, and this was also the origin of shamanic traditions that used occult compositions of animals, fetishes and totems to achieve magical goals. Humanoid, human-like nigral entities did not exist before the evolutionary emergence of hominids. For example, when a shadow or "soul" (passive psychosexual ether component in the visible light spectrum) of a hawk mixed with a Neanderthal's soul, a flying ether hybrid of hominids and Accipitridae was created. Bio-astralism is contingent in that the universe is indivisible; it is merely another category. Inanimate matter, for example, the elements of the periodic table, crystals, etc., have their own atomic emission, radiation, structure, as well as a mapping to the occult spectra. We are not talking about "New Age" weirdness here, this is still occult machinery on the fringe, not even playing formal science, but the reintegration of these systems into the intelligible, seamless system is beneficial.

In order to successfully create occult biological maps, there are prerequisites that I cannot meet, but which I may propose as a hypothesis:

Compatible orthologs in the ontogeny of human and animal development resonate with the spatiotemporal development of the nervous system, from the fertilised ovum, then primarily the ectoderm, through the embryonic prenatal stage to the child and finally to the adult. These developments can be mapped onto projected echogenetic and "etheric" phantoms and pneumatology. To be consistent, it refers to the entire organic, animate realm and includes the "graveyard of forms" or extinct shadow animals as well as modern, extant species. The psychosexual nature of the orgasmic discharges, may be places on a scale from crude (lust-governed climax), to those depicted in the yogic systems (controlled bliss, or peak ecstasy) accentuate "active" parts of the nervous system as a whole. For example ecstasy in Ajna, spiritual pleasure, bliss and satori using the higher functions of the cognitive-neural-pneumatic components leads to higher perceptions. Lust, passion and instinct in the larval parts of the evolutionary low-level archaic part of the nervous system. Each node of the nervous system, or "meridian", sometimes mistaken for "chakras", is mapped on the occultation of electromagnetic frequencies, which would explain the dimensional layering of the Bardo Thodol and the ceremonies and rituals after death — for example in the Tibetan Lhag Thog Mysteries. This is only one aspect of the sexual interface in magick.

"Winging the soul" is merely a successful yogic operation in activating the echogenetic pathways in the nervous system, which are hijacked and redirected, branching the "evolutionary" path along the blueprint for winged beings. In this sense, the soul is translated into the air component and undergoes a transformation that seems miraculous, but is intimately related to the nature of the possibilities of such an operation. When laws of naturphilosophie, objective physical world, occulted metaphysics come together — there is nothing unnatural in mortals becoming epitomized as angeli bonum posthumously.

Evolutionary astrobiology assumes that the nature and characteristics of the planets within the stellar magnetosphere of the Sun help determine evolution and the waves of life, which is obvious in the case of the Earth's satellite — the Moon — and often neglected in the case of the Chaldean planets. According to the idea of the "world soul" or the "indivisible world," the planets act within a larger stellar magnetosphere, even though no gravitational or magnetic forces are detected between the planets, the "aether" of the world soul (an old concept thrown out of science) is the binder of intelligibility and indivisibility. Whether this has any bearing on evo-devo approaches to the occult is a long shot, but not entirely impossible. My personal experiences and beliefs incline towards an axiom that planets preserve memories of the co-dependent Solar System in proportion to their participation in a given event in spatio-temporal continuum. Engram, imprint, seal, sigilia, memory, call it as you please.

> More than fourteen years since I crossed the terrible pass of the mountains, my affection is reserved only for the divine and the stars, my love for the spirits, the bountiful realms of the invisible worlds, the rare human companions, the good wine, the glorious word and the burdens solitarily in silence borne.
> Men, men, a creature of insolent nature, believing that stars and galaxies were brought for his sake. A semi-monkey, capable of the divine, but by and large a swine.

Do not perceive the stories as a child, for many indulge in such seeing. See them as threads of logos silently running through the mythopoetic layers of human history. Whenever you pick out one category of such narratives and take it for truth, you become a slave to a belief; whenever you sacralize in honesty the mythopoetic meta-narrative, you see beyond it and see others like children indulging in their games. Beliefs are vehicles, they are theories of the possible and the impossible. It is real experiential knowledge and practice that is important. Some beliefs blind us, some deceive us, some enslave us, some bring us closer to knowledge, realization, to aletheia, against error, against oblivion. Liberated Gods, I believe, perceive in an objective way, because if the all-seeing eyes were to think like children or perceive like people who confuse acquired projections of the world view with the Absolute, it would degrade their science and replace it with endless mortal wanderings of the mind. To perceive without projections means to perceive absolutely. To see causality with insight also means not to think like a fool who overreacts because of a pawn move on the chessboard and throws his composition into nothingness, like the appearance of a thought a second before. A wise man sees the causality of the world in all its seasons and changes; the wiser he is, the greater his insight. Like a master chess player, he knows the rules of the game, he knows the strategies and tactics of seeing, and he thinks ahead with consistency, but never loses sight of the present lest he be surprised, nor of the past lest he miss a lesson from which to derive future moves. Yet he intuitively knows the past, the present, and the future as if he transcends them. He sees events in motion, flashing patterns, changes in the world, perceives the whole harmoniously, and moves joyfully through it all. Whenever he loses his art, his world collapses, shrinks to the present, to a few events that stick in his memory — then the enlightenment is gone and he pursues petty, insignificant matters of someone who is blinded, unstable, dispassionate, and sees only a chase before his eyes and no longer perceives the vastness of the world. If someone wants his thoughts to float in the air and be divine, his mind should definitely be expansive and not be affected by trivial matters. His mind and soul are uninterruptedly and seamlessly connected to the great world, evaluating the great and the small, which are interwoven in the right proportion and relationship. There are also gods of small things. Paying attention to them is often charming, but beware when they become parasitic and divert your attention from the big things. When the esthetics of a beautiful moment, the persistence of a rose becomes the obsession of a mad gardener, when justice and good governance become mere addiction to power and greed, degrading even the most just statesman of the commonwealth and making him no better than a crook, a criminal who wields power. What we project into the world is what we are at a given moment, it is our true condition, we change — truly, may we change for the better. The great image of a man, a woman is the totality of the movements of his life, they bear witness in the mirror of eternity's sure presage.

Alchemical Glass Bead Game

> "The game as I conceive it," Knecht once wrote, "leaves (the player) with the feeling that he has extracted from the universe of accident and confusion a totally symmetrical and harmonious cosmos, and absorbed it into himself."

— Hermann Hesse, The Glass Bead Game

Just as ideas drove societies, the branching out, the transformation of these ideas into technical specializations drove technology. They are the patterns of thought in grand narratives and universes of discourse, embedded in the biopsychological apparatus, the hardwired phenotypes that are their medium. Our technology is the vehicle for these phenotypes, it is their synthetic extension. It is our technological bioprint that says something about us, much like languages that claim objectivity, like mathematics that claims to be a symbolic patterning and clustering of Platonic logic.

Technology is not an absolute language, it only points to the directions our science has taken given the resources available and especially the socio-political configurations and trends. It is composed of three interlocking factors: the ideational symbolization of the world, its implementation in the growing pool of technology, its deviation from pure and theoretical science, and, above all, the values and directions that human societies have constructed as a stochastic process, and which are due to what is common to all human beings.

Introducing the concept of basic man with regard to, say, Polynesian societies and tribes from an anthropological perspective and attaching values to modern man is quite a different issue. We are indeed children of nature, raised through symbolization and its transformation across time and space. The ability to divine symbols that are perfect would have something of divination. Divination is the act of conjuring up a part of the world and conjuring it into a pattern or set of patterns and laws, then interpreting and acting upon them. The philosophy of mathematics in its Platonic aspect deals precisely with this ordered divination.

Between philosophy and magic there is a degree of practice, method, paradigm and belief. It is a science of the relationships between complex individual microcosmic patterns and the patterns of the laws of the macrocosm, the ability to manipulate, receive or transmit impressions to move from desire to execution of vision through the medium of will in a manner limited to possibility and potency. A potent mathematician with a magically powerful consciousness would have great tools at his disposal and would be potentially dangerous if his abilities and potency went beyond his human form. For consciousness has no limits for our race, the human form does.

If we platonize consciousness, we arrive at a living universe, and without limiting consciousness to anthropocentric cognition, we can say little about it except to speculate that it is an interactive field possessing its intelligence and governed by intellect, i.e., a set of rational laws. Whether they are willed or unwilled is a question of creation or movement. This is also a question of the time, the beginning and the end, the circular time as a force, the ouroboric formulas which mean the phenomenal circularity of the time and its perfect self-inclusion.

Without adhering rigidly to schools of theurgy and theology, whether Babylonian, Chaldean, Akkadian, Assyrian, Egyptian, Eastern, Graeco-Roman, Oriental or Occidental, these were philosophical modes and methods of expressing the structure of the universe, cosmogony, eschatology, its workings, its main ideas, and its content as a frame of reference. All ritual, magic and theurgy proceed from these structures. In other words: We need a structure to find our way, we need signposts to find our way, and we need a map to remember. What if the structure itself had multiple expressions, as with the layers of shells, but just as the territory is subject to slow change, the art of cosmography and cartography depends on the skill of the creator and the navigator. The interactions of patterns between structured, ordered worlds are what philosophical magic seeks to understand and find tools for its craft.

The microcosm is a point that can be understood like a pin in the macrocosm. From this pin we begin our work and to it we return. There is some understanding that the finger that begins the journey to examine and discover the universe in the words of J.J. van der Leeuw (Gods in Exile) ends up pointing back to the human condition and our lives in particular, thus representing a journey of self-discovery and ultimately completion and finding. Transferring the microcosmic work to the macrocosm, it means that "every point in the monadic sphere is its center", in other words, "all parts of the Pleroma are its place of wholeness, no matter how separate they are".

As symbolizing animals, the progressive symbols in their relationship to each other are a kind of lockpick for representing the world and acting in it. With the modern arsenal of ideas, we can adopt a modular basis for all concepts, ideas and formulations and apply them in mental, psychic, scientific and artistic divination processes. We are a medium of translation for the world and our inner millieus, we are focal points of the world, its processing laboratories and the torches that lens into the world what we have processed, created. This leaves us with a chaosphere of information to shape and form at our whim, whether we are guided by a particular esthetic or values, or whether we go with the flow. Here we encounter the question of unity, of beauty, of the soteriology of truth, of ascension. When there are no fixed, objective points to which we can refer, we surrender to the chaosphere and no matter what we do, we engage in a chaotic, creative process that ends up meaningless.

However, if the cosmos is an order that contains diversity and has a seamless, continuous and indivisible character, then the emerging consciousness is already in a system of relationships. To find its way, it must shed the chaospheric appearance to find its own definition in relation to the cosmos by refining its subcategories and building bridges between them.

The main task of a philosophical magician is to build bridges between these kaleidoscopic sets of subcategories and to adapt them as much as possible to the Platonizing macrocosmic patterns. This is generally done through the personal intellectual and feeling effort to "extract from the universe of chance and confusion a completely symmetrical and harmonious cosmos" and absorb it into one's mind, soul, individual consciousness, character traits and character in the process of manifold changes, alchemical transformations, discoveries and education, feeling and intellectualization. It is a living teaching of change and relationship and a living game in which the main prize is the return to the stars, to the transcendent, torn away from nature and the earth into eternity. Let us not despise nature, for the Mother gave birth to us so that we might have the chance to be born into greater worlds – those of the Star Mother.

In conclusion, it should be noted that this is only an intellectual component, that practice and training are something else entirely. It is too one-sided to use only the intellect and disregard the affective, theatrical and emotional components. Whether in ceremonial acts or a solitary practice, yogic psychosomatic training, synergistic visualization and vibration, other magical techniques are of extreme importance. A sharp blade of intellect will not cut through deception if it has no serving tools other than itself.

O sniveling people, in your concentrated rigor and determined understanding, have you not done what a yogin has trained? O yogin, the people who live blindly, should they ever know what the monk understands?

Seeds of a beginning

A seed does not easily become a tree. Alchemy of the mind without efforts, arguments, decisions, nature is not formed, refined, modeled. It is a repetition of human activities and archetypes and signs in it. It is all the love, hate, struggle, inner processes, projection of our geniuses and nature, the totality of our being that we carry within us and keep in check. It puts pressure on us to transform and change, in tension with the given directions.

This is the framework, the structure and the basic skeleton: Direction, values, principles, merits should be understood in accordance with reason, logic, harmony and proportion according to time and age, as the latter should be discovered.

The grasp of the ancient laws crystallizes henceforth the intellect, which requires experience and reference to merge with judgment, decision, evaluation, consequence and foresight, and is associated with flourishing maturity in the philosophical sun.

This arsenal must be either observed or read, absorbed and applied. It must be examined to see if it is worthwhile, valuable and great in life and consequence for the whole – this vastness of one's responsible freedom described by that of others.

Nobody forges giants without the idea of them; nobody reaches for cruelty without the idea of it, likewise nobody reaches for inner greatness without the idea of it, an inspiration – vision.

What does not originate in the mind or heart rarely yields a mature harvest of the spirit. Therefore, a highly developed intellect and the anchoring of principles connected with reason between intellect and principles is the beginning of Eros peri to kalon.

The love of beauty, the love of justice, and the love of freedom seem to spring naturally from a healthy man. Proportion is the rounding off in harmony with nature, humanity is found with inner vision and endowed with intellect.

In situations where people are truly deprived, when they are enslaved, when they are surrounded by inner and outer debris. And when they are constantly punished or treated unjustly, or when they perceive this injustice elsewhere – then they make decisions and take a stand, if they dare. Also the recognition of appearances, apparitions, illusions, surrogates triggers a longing, which is complete only in the honest fulfillment.

When one is enslaved and feels a premonition of freedom because one knows it to be true, one longs for freedom. When one is loathed and sincerely feels love for another person, one knows it is love. When someone is treated unjustly and a sincere force rewards him for the injustice, he knows that it is a true force and that justice is being done. The degree between self-deception and honest force is felt thouroughly and immediately. Oftenwise, those who did not witness those ideas as forces perish withal experiencing them throughout life, discarding those Graces and Muses as non-existent.

If we want to recognize true qualities, we should start from the needy person: What does such a person lack most, apart from food and shelter? And then we should ask ourselves what we have that such a person does not have. We might also have a false image of lack if the person who is lacking in our eyes is not needy and we do not see ourselves as needy, more needy than the other person.

For true deprivation and true fulfillment are found in complete honesty with ourselves and with the world, and then the world is honest with us. Any perceived or unacknowledged falseness can be a mere mask, an appearance by which we "live." So how is honesty developed. By taking off the masks, both of ourselves and of the world, by questioning ourselves and trying to penetrate the illusions.

If we happen to discover untruths and contradictions, and see through more and more the games we humans play, and sometimes the metaphysical worlds, we unmask the world. It stands unmasked, and every mask it puts on us and itself is only a trivial repetition. If we preserve the memory and the knowledge, it is conducive to the truth.

But do we "tear down all masks" to be alone with the one who is alone? It is a question of objective truth or the truth about the divine, which is, since Parmenides buried in mortal doxology, it is apophatic, unknowable to mortals. We have mere approximations that work or completely miss the point.

But it is not an approximation in proportion, detached from the world, or a mere surface of greater things. It is a proportion that is a key to balance and round out what a human mind can achieve to communicate with other worlds and to re-define itself and be re-defined in harmony with it. Each key to communication with other worlds and to the effective practice of magic or theurgy is a form of an elaborated proportion or a memorized intuitive formula that allows us to look through the keyhole, not into the whole that is negatively known through learned ignorance, but into an image of the other worlds that we can interpret to the best of our ability and then work with.

Magician's Training

The main work is centered around the Chaldean dictum "call and receive", whenever your mind is ready as a bowl to receive the nectar of Gods, and an intelligencer related to the sphere of the given planet - and there are millions of these in various gradations, hierarchies, a-hierarchical worlds - they will render their teaching that come as an idea, a breakthrough, a skill, an ingenious device, and refine the currents of the Via Regia of your body, souls, spirit, heart and mind. High magic does not deal with power, sex, fame, fortune, or the low by-products of Earthly travails, privileges, but it deals with immortalization, nobility of enterprises, glory, force, and greatness that is acquired after one's life finds fruition in death. It doesn't deal with transient fates that must be overcome, but with immortal genius that may be developed, if so desired.

A human being, like any animal is a vehicle for the manifestation of astralistic, weird and eerie forces that participated in its evolutionary development. This is the enclosure of life, an aspect of gargantuan forces that created a nursery school for life on this planet. These forces are neither human, nor anything approximate to human, they are the exponents of cosmic dimensions vaulting themselves in diverse, horrendous and beautiful masks, imagine the primordial life in the proto-oceans, and the atavistic journey back in time, on the example of evolution of nervous systems. Ontogeny recapitulates philogeny, taken to occult atavisms in biological aspect it is the projected bauplan that reimagines itself along the branches of the tree of life from weird forces into self-enclosed biosphere. Nature is apparent through itself, it needs no judges. To a human his form, self-reflection and area of activity is self-evident, to a star-fish it is likewise, it's nature is self-contained. Yet mix the bio-emanations of the two and a human goes insane, and a star-fish, well as a relatively uncomplex organism remains undisturbed by acquiring human faculties, or general essence of being. It almost begs to admit that a human being with its self-reflective capacity is a special organism by and large misusingr or not using at all the way to refine the currents that it uses. All contained within the human worlds is hermetic pertaining to its specie, but chaos of weirdness is lurking in, gazing as a watcher on the threshold of a biotic abyss. Hermetica, the world-ordering of cosmos is an exponent of the human to find the singular, the whole, the harmonious, and there is definitely a way that is supreme in using magical technologies and spiritual devices and techniques, gymnosophies and intellectual yoga in order to acquire a more refined status in the netherworlds, as well as lead a meaningful life on Earth. The occult machinery of the world is like the void of the stars - unmerciful for those who dwell in the abyss of unknowledge and attempt to master the void as tiny souls. It is more akin to benevolence if mastership is pitched to the divine - the divine is a place where the mortal perishes, and union is met in bliss of either a pre-natal state of consciousness, or will is sought, and the post-natal state of a spirit asserts itself in the grand order of expression of universal powers. The question is - which powers one expresses, how, and to what extent? By the natural limitation of human specimen, the most refined of masters and mistresses are attaining the absolute by the measure of a human, there is a golden bridge to the absolute. On the other hand, if they slip on the path, they may encounter great abysses unfit for human soul's birth into them. There is order and law in the universe, but these are laws and orders surpassing human understanding, and not made for humans nor for their understanding - that is up to the beholder to decide what is most suitable for his work. Amor fati.

Minds and Principles

Anyone who engages in any form of craft or art does not become a practitioner unless he practices. The practice of life does not begin with learning how to live. Often we do not know how to live deeply and meaningfully, but we practice it out of necessity.

Every art, every skill, every science, every craft requires such an approach. Sacred paths of high magic or personal magic, any form of willful negotiation or imposition on reality; getting to know oneself is a special kind of craft.

We cannot force anyone to follow this path, in fact it is the most barricaded and fortified path, of which there is even more advice not to do it. It is the most conscious decision one can ever make, it must be fought for, maintained, memorized, developed, balanced and rounded.

One learns to master life and magic. Without mastering one's own life, one will not master the latter, but will quickly become a puppet of one's own mind, emotions and projections.

Not only that – such a practitioner will openly invite influences that will abuse an untrained mind and keep it stuck in delusion or ignorance. He will prevent any development by abusing his mind, emotions and projections. He is untrained in recognizing obstacles, illusions, deceptions and intrigues and easily becomes a victim, first of himself and then of everything else.

Eventually, one becomes a mockery of all the aspirations and ideals one has lived for — turned into the opposite. This has happened to me, as it always does, but I do not rest on my laurels, nor do I freeze reality as something permanent.

I never take anything for granted, and this despite the discouraging and reversing factors that, on the one hand, plunge us into the despair of failure, and on the other, mock us or inherently or intentionally impede our progress.

If we are willing to develop a tenacious spirit, often insensitive to things that break most people. Working under constant tension and strain, multiplying our intelligence through constant training, recognizing situations and penetrating the depths of their surroundings and character, while other people would only see the surface. We transform the nocturnal into the daily, the hidden into the revealed, the murky into the obvious.

We develop principles and standards to remain steadfast on the path despite temporary deformities of mind, senses and affect, sacrificing most of the things other people live by and love — the path is open. It is not meant to deter anyone, but it is also not meant to invite or promise anyone anything beyond what they are capable of. There are no promises.

In fact, the majority of this work is about how to strive to be a decent human being as we explore and learn to master various techniques and selflessly impress or invoke the deities. Allowing the focus to flow through us in the continuity of this divine impulse — elan vital of co-smos in chaosphere and chaosmos in co-smos.

Since we know nothing about magical phenomena, but are equipped with normal human knowledge on which we rely, when we encounter an anomaly, we notice an example of it: unknown. The anomaly may not be believed, but it is noticed and, under good conditions, it is fixed in the memory.
If more anomalies occur, we can create a small structure with multiple nodes, e.g., "law of attraction" by three instances or examples. We can choose to discard the theory as a whole and rely on either faith in coincidence or at best synchronicity, which relegates it to magic anyway. If we have more events to falsify the structure, we have a solid law with a solid structure with three nodes or examples.

Then we apply what we know, or the previously acquired episteme, and our cognition to compare how they might interact. Suppose a very weak law that we observe in a sea of other laws unknown to us.

Either we project knowledge of that law onto all the other laws without understanding them, or we suspend our judgment and find that different laws are in play because the one we have is not sufficient to explain it, and sometimes not sufficient to understand the law itself.

It's like in astronomy where you try to find another planet because the calculations do not fit. Therefore, we observe and isolate other events in the same way. If we have two or more inductive laws, we can try to derive the general framework and do top-down reasoning. If this is not enough, we induce new laws and build an upper structure that explains more events in an approximation of what we already know.

After a while, we have a set of laws, epistemes, and cognitions that explain situations and to which we can relate, or that induce a cognitive-behavioral response through training. By observing instances that begin to function, we are not static. By applying the mind and mental faculties to creative solutions, we begin to engage with the frameworks being tested and simulate or actively work the results.

Mental rivers and topographies of noetics.

Let us define the mental continuum. It is a flow of mental events and phenomena that occur at the conscious and unconscious levels of cognitive-affective noosphere.

It can flow quietly, but it can also cause the most extreme states of excitement; it can flow like a torrential river, but it can also cause a quiet, humble thought.

Many people allow this mental flow to dominate their thoughts, actions and emotions, limited by the conditioned responses of society, mentors and peers, and in between is the uniqueness of response, the space of personal breath. Focus here! As we begin to observe ourselves and introspect, remember and contemplate, we become more aware of this mental continuum as we look inward, deepen it, and unearth things that make us more and more conscious.

We come to know ourselves — not the conditioned image of ourselves that we cherish, that too needs to be known, but our reactions, judgments, evaluations, thoughts and rationalizations are put under the microscope. We become our own analysts and psychotherapists in the understanding of Western thought, and we practice intellectual yoga in the Eastern understanding.

For each mental action we ask, „What is the reason?", „Where are its roots?", „Is it complex or simple?", „Why am I thinking this now?", then we orient to the future, „What are the consequences of these thoughts, where are they going based on what we know about our mind?", and then we go to the past, „Where did they start, how can we improve them, e.g. wrong foundations, wrong beliefs, toxic conditioned reactions?".

Eric Kandel won the Nobel Prize in 2000 for proving that learning changes neural circuitry due to neuroplasticity. Therefore, to some degree, we can adjust neurological wiring both through psychotherapy, yoga, psychonautics, and through various experiments and practices that were once so prevalent in mystical traditions around the world.

When we learn about ourselves, we temporarily interrupt the „rationalization and nihilation screening" that is a defense mechanism of the mind to maintain its organizational entropy. Persuading and enchanting such structures carries dangers because the resolved complex (affect image) releases psychic energy that must be reinvested in new structures. Ideally, we acquire desired structures through learning that are not yet filled with psychic energy, and when old bundled complexes are resolved, the energy moves rapidly into a new cognitive pocket. This process is semiconscious and can go wrong, e.g., the energy can be reinvested in a different cognitive topology of the given phenotype;

Developing such introspection is a habit and in no way robotic. Sometimes we are better and more brilliant, other times dulled and incapable, numb.

The other goal is to develop discipline. In brilliant mental situations we use it, and in numb times we can use the remaining resources for other things or for maintaining the process of mental hygiene — which is equally important.

The best training we can recommend is highly focused meditation or muting the mind, or observing as illusory-like apprearances arise and perish. The other is to confront and make decisions based on our judgments and values.

While the former orders the mind, the latter imprints habits and behaviors over time. All this does not happen in a vacuum, but our reason decides what is beneficial and what is superficial, counterproductive or even toxic.

Sometimes we are trapped in toxic states, and our focus and consciousness cannot break free from such a bondage. When we are absorbed by a state, our mind identifies with it and even seeks validation or pleasure in it. For example, some people consider suffering or pain to be their natural state. While they are in that state, they reject it, but then they consciously seek it. Arguments that this is not a desirable state do not reach them until they resolve it internally through contrast and observation. Interestingly, they never lead by opposition or contradiction, but by entering the mind of the other and leading them to their own solutions with suspended judgment and much patience and empathy.

This is just one example of a state of being in which the mind is completely absorbed in a worked out state of its totality and takes it for all there is. To know what is healthy, we need a point of reference and most of us have common sense in this regard.

But what you know intuitively is less effective than training which is often counterintuitive. In years of practice, I have chosen the model of the Buddhist kleshas, or afflictions, to explain the variety of their mutations and strands in the modern world. I then isolated the virtues and ethos, based on Via Romana, Hellenic Paideia, Book of Changes that I found most useful for my work, as well as the counter-virtues or vices that began to work against me and my efforts; these are merely a model developed by a modern person. We cherish our own dynamics, which are personal, but it is worth noting to at least be aware of them in order to have a map.

Method

If we do not counteract the poisons in our mental stream, we may become a hopeless victim of the developing delusion or vice and create an object-subject tension. The counteraction, however, should not create resistance or more tension, but should be a middle way to resolve the minor or major disturbance. How this is done varies from mind to mind.

I never understood the „letting go" part that is repeated everywhere as a mantra. You can let anything pass, but if you do not chase away the thieves of delusion, anger, wrath, ignorance, which arise in the course of life, in your own mind, and rarely during meditation, you will eventually succumb to them. Neuroplasticity, power of habit, alignment. Fight the insignificant within if you do not want the great evils to emerge.

This is why meditation has often been advised to counteract the pollutants in life, through conscious mental effort to tame the incessant monkey of the jumping mind, and when encountering resistance, in the sense that an external nature is mixing with ours or deliberately ruining the practice — redouble efforts whenever possible. The difference between rigor and mindless drill is often confused. The former makes the mind sharp, tough and intelligent, the latter stiff, dry and weakened and can become undiscerning and cruel.

It has always been — I think — a matter of discipline backed by inner truth. In the worst case, we begin to recognize the harmful substances as regular in our mental continuum, so that we do not even recognize them as something that stands in the way of development and realization. As soon as this is recognized, one must grab the thief by the throat and throw him out.

I would look at it like this:

Ad. 1: If we simply observe the emerging delusion, we might be drawn into it, with poisons developing; if we counteract it, we create an opposing tension that creates psychological space for it to fill later. Perhaps the method is to find a higher ground in the mental state (like climbing a mountain) and then neutralize the poisons with light effort, analyzing the causes and conditions and supporting the analysis with learned thought and „good speech, good thought, good action." Good action improves thought and speech by synchronizing them.

Ad. 2: It is difficult to break mental habits when they are of long duration, and it is difficult to break them immediately (although it sometimes happens). You do not have to find the opposition and be stuck in duality, but something like a transcendent third that neutralizes both; between love and hate, for example, you find a paternal and a maternal spirit towards beings who feel both and free themselves from duality.

Society reinforces the view of the self and calls it individuality, although it is only a repetition of the movements of social conditioning; It also reinforces the grasping of the self by creating an illusory cocoon and reifying it as something real.

From the perspective of the golden ages, modern societies follow firmly rooted illusions within illusions that contradict the wisdom, principles, insights and laws of the ancient systems of thought that form the contrast when properly understood. It is rarely perceived by those who have no contrasts to see.

One way to deal with it is to develop authenticity and to preserve a self that we can use as a puppet on the stage, because otherwise we would have to renounce all social interaction.

As long as we master the puppet of the self and are aware of its illusory nature and do not reach for it, we can play theater and continue to practice.

When we are pushed into attachment to selfhood by the illusion, because the projected social image is a bombardment on the fragile, unattached self and holds it back in the cocoon, we may feel encircled at first, but then it lets go. „Holding on to the self is the root of all evil," which means that when we develop an idea of emptiness, everything dissolves into thin air. The mind can become entangled with lower things on another level, but only insofar as it believes in the absolute reality of the things to which it is subjected — it becomes enslaved by them.

The other part is the danger of developing an elitist view, or a sense of superiority and inflation. If we separate ourselves from the others who uphold selfhood and grasping for self on a societal level, this is encouraged and is the usual business, which is why people are so easily manipulated and think it is natural. Or even worse — if we do this blindly and know nothing else, we risk self-indulgence through self-aggrandizement and plunge ourselves into an even worse state. This is a path that leads either to alienation and arrogance or to megalomania and obsession.

Balancing between the masks and puppets of self (or self) and trying to break free from them is quite a difficult game, but it can be done. There is no need to escape society. The point is to develop a strong self that, on the one hand, deals with society, but on the other hand, detaches itself from it as if it did not exist, if necessary.

Guiding Principles

We work within a frame of reference. How this frame of reference, with rather static and malleable elements, comes about is a matter between experience, knowledge, perception and discernment, judgments and decisions. We form this frame of reference through active, critical participation in our lives in relation to the world. Then we observe the world in relation to life. We use our reason, feeling, and intellect to separate the good parts from the bad, superficial, or unnecessary parts; we observe the larger phenomena as a whole. We penetrate the world of people, societies, visible and invisible worlds, we create the foundations on which we build an entire roadmap. Then we decide how and when to act, react, become still, advance and retreat. We look beyond the present world, behind its history, beyond it and into the future — that's where a vision is created. A vision is always normative, it is determined by desires, dreams and goals. At the same time we are cartographers and cosmographers of these worlds, we map the unexplored with the best possibilities. We walk the paths that have been walked before and map the unmapped to the best of our ability. By observing these worlds in motion, we establish a point of reference and think deeply about what is of use, then lay the groundwork. Reason seeks solutions based on what we know. The intellect mediates between the higher worlds, reason and the animal mind; likewise, we set up our inner mental territory, our affective and cognitive habits and solutions, the way we respond to a field of phenomena.

Mapping the territory

We are inseparable from the world, and the illusion of being separate from others has devastating consequences for most people in the longer term. Therefore, the pursuit of self-interest is suicidal in the long run because it damages the fabric of human trust and cooperation; The suffering and pain of others is not a matter to be taken lightly. Dehumanization and disconnection from feelings does not absolve the intellect from recognizing these factors. Suffering can be overcome through training. One cannot refuse to recognize the unity of common understanding mentioned above; One recognizes the opposites that are insoluble and one does not remain in ignorance because one knows the constellations of opposites that call slavery freedom and suffering happiness; one tries to solve them internally and externally; the domain of ignorance is that of separation and forgetfulness towards the „unknown knowledge" that one is accustomed to and considers normal, while they are unheard of. These opposites seek solutions whenever we find them — we apply them. A strong heart is a companion of its master, thoughts that go astray should be controlled and directed to the desired state; what is strong should not neglect the weakness, what is wise should overcome the state of others, what is resilient should overcome the movement of opponents not to become equal.

Pneumatism and Hydranomy of the Spirit

Autonomy and freedom from conditioned automatism is the birth of free will. It is the recollection of past structures of the subject-object split, the bridging and integration into a whole and the development of further structures from the autonomous point of view.

It begins with synthesis. A breakthrough – the subject-object split is bridged and transcended. Comparisons and tensions between the present state and the normative situation with simultaneous 'rejection of contradictions through solutions' are shared in proportion. As if a dynamic between ego, superego and the related aspirations would dissolve in another, third position.

The daily society represents what is obvious, what seems to be. It stands in contrast to the nocturnal undercurrents or depth sociology. These threads of chthonic, telluric meta-narratives, combined with grand meta-narratives of the whole, interwoven with the sociology of ignorance and knowledge, are in constant tension. It produces new material for you to revise, absorb, contemplate, understand, and implement.

Between these worlds, the accumulation of resolved contradictions and fused dualities leads over time to the correction of an autonomous conscious command center. It is a kind of genius or meta-consciousness. It functions like a feedback loop of inductive-deductive cognitive behavioral processes that rounds out and completes – preferably in harmony or even distribution in one's character and mind. It is permeated by all too many unpredictable factors that give enough space to esthetics and beauty throughout the process.

Resolved contradictions provide critical insight into many otherwise unrecognizable dynamics and emerge in critical, perceptive thinking; it is a form of cognitive training. The merged dualities result in a bundle of intuitive, independent judgments, decisions, and evaluations. In conjunction with self-observation and observation of the environment, they are a form of deconditioning from the alienation of subject-object dependence. In evaluating subject:object or any kind of dualism, we rely on the inner other, the transcendent third.

It is a superimposition and a hawk's-eye view observation, as if we were detached and hovering above our ordinary physical selves. It is the birth of a winged Self. Sometimes the hawk descends and merges with our self and our automatic reactions, sometimes it erupts and sees everything with a larger vision. This hawk is the spirit of individuated consciousness. Thereupon, we identify not with the self, the body, the thoughts, the mental garbage and the emotions, but with the hawk: the purified mind.

This operation is based on the intellectual, cognitive and affective realization of the configurations of the inner millieu or the ezosphere and noospheres. This is achieved through constant pressure, tension, meditation, suffering and overcoming, confrontations and decisions. These are psychic alchemical and pneumatic operations, some of which are voluntary, fated, imposed, but the majority of which are consciously decided. It resembles the birth pangs of a serpent shedding its veils and membranes until it is a fully developed spirit. Here, human nature is defined in an elevated, rediscovered aspect of a deity in aspects of its refinement; not continuous, but temporary – like the satori of one's raptures, longings, fantasies, visions, vistas, etc.

In accordance with the Mithraic axiom: "harmony of tension in opposition, movement upward". In a dual world, we are the alchemist and the distiller. The Tao, or harmony of opposites, cannot be found without the formation of tension. If there is no pressure, there is no countermovement to find the loose ends and transform them into strength. De is a gift from Heaven that equips, strengthens and supports us along the way as we ascend the spheres. Without confronting our inner selves, we cannot recognize or understand the formation and unfolding of our individual geniuses, nor do we know what to form further. When we remove the worldly dust from our perception, we see clearly.

There are three methods, all equally important and partly overlapping. This is done either through life and its expression, through sculpting in one's daimon and genius, through perfecting and rounding out one's being. It happens through spiritual practice, meditation, contemplation, initiations, ceremonies and rites of manifold paths. When the mind is still, you get to know yourself and train yourself. This happens in true confrontation, when you make choices and discover what you are made of. What you draw from it, a lesson or a punishment, depends on your perception, your gaze and your insight. If you do not succeed in penetrating deep within yourself, you will not be able to interpret the oracles of the world correctly because you may lack wisdom and discernment.

This leads to a perceptual shift of the early consciousness, which carries mental-affective imprints, habits and conditioning, memories, perceptions, and so on. It changes and is composed of several jumps in its essence, which is a seal on it and a seal on the mind of consciousness.

This mind of consciousness is defined as the history of localized focused consciousness. It is directed by memories, experiences, performances, perceptions, decisions (autonomous perceptual judgments about actions and their movements) and feelings in the configuration of knowledge. Gnoseology is a dynamic phenomena that depends on knowledge: constellations of data, information that recompose and relate to each other in different ways, but it is mainly acted upon. Once the Pneuma is born, the solar swastika, the Ajna cakra, it is localized between the eyebrows and is felt as a strong, blooming sphere of light. After death, this individualized spiritual consciousness folds and continues to operate, possibly through vehicles that express it in its multiplicity. I believe that this is the primal point that connects the world soul (Pleroma) within the focused human agent.

Operating System Earth

Let us think for a while about our planet as an operating system with various modules and functional layers that have evolved and developed for billions, millions, hundreds of thousands of years. 4.7 billion years ago, the Earth began to form in the solar system around a star moving on one of the galactic wings, far away from the center of the Milky Way, located in the depth of the constellation Sagittarius-B.

Another world system among countless other world systems. When you penetrate space with the Hubble Deep Space Telescope, hundreds of thousands of galaxies become visible. Let us assume that the star, just like every other planet in the solar system and every moon, has its own operating system, which we can define within the framework of scientific, physical and astronomical knowledge.

Information fields, which are a hypothetical database that we conjure up virtually with our minds, are later measured and defined by laws that we define by describing statistics about the behavior of these systems. Similar to mathematics, these are statistics of phenomena described by laws. It is not complete knowledge, but they are the building blocks and foundations of our reality, the universe of discourse.

Following negative theology, it is an apophatic knowledge discovered through the impulse of what we do not know. For when we leave all certainties behind, we know that we do not in fact know anything, and yet it contains the Socratic irony: "We must write and speak about things about which it is impossible to write or speak." This is true of metaphysics and of science as it is today, reformed by myriad paradigms.

Back to the operating systems: They emerge together in historicity and in cycles. Determined, a-deterministic, sequential, interrupted, cyclic, linear, a-linear, defined by probability, chance, anomaly, fixed and temporarily fixed by what is ordered, definite, certain. There are co-dependencies in the coordinates of being. The connectivity between the Sun and Earth and the connectivity between the Moon and Earth are an example of such a system of fixed reference points, observed over time and defined – for example – by their magnetospheric properties. The connectivity between the Sun and Galaxy can also be defined by the relationship of the stellar magnetosphere. Proportions emerge.

Let us apply a different interpretive system to modern science, reframing and dusting off the old doctrines to bring them up to date. For example, let us return to Neoplatonic scientific metaphysical theology, a Chaldean theology, and imagine adding another defining level, the celestial, non-visible, invisible.

To understand this, we need to develop some concepts and construct an ideogram in our minds that will allow us to understand this system. To detach ourselves from normal reality, we need to feel awe – the same awe we sometimes feel when we watch the starry sky at night. This gives us some distance, our bodies are surrounded by air, our mass and the mass of the air belittle us. Probably people who skydive feel both the freedom and the mass of air surrounding them in this way when they first jump.

Let us now extend this in imagination to the whole cosmic space. This can be done mentally, but it is rather rare that we actually feel it. The first feeling is alienation, then we succumb to oneness, or we feel despair, awe connects with oneness. Then we return to ourselves. It is alchemy, first we separate, then we merge everything into oneness. We sew the invisible wound. Now let us think of the star, the next one we know. We put everything into the right relationship. The Chinese defined the forces of heaven, their strength, their power as regulating forces. It would be enough to consider them as a relation of forces.

The psychological level of modern man could commit a typical Mandaean error by adding an evaluation to the phenomenological world of "good-evil" or "spirit-spirit", "darkness-light", but perhaps such conceptual duality is built into our cognition - but let us leave these speculations and assume that these levels are only instrumentally mapped, that they have essences that are different or interpenetrate, so that in some cases they are harmonious.

So when we arrive with the intellect in the world of ideas through concepts, analogies, proportions, golden mean values, we can imagine that the sun is a deity. It does not matter whether we ascribe to it male or female attributes by projections, whether it is androgynous or hermaphroditic - depending on the civilization, it is seen from a religious or a symbolic level. Your perception and belief is your choice, explore.

On the level of phenomena it is a star with all its discovered physical properties, thermonuclear reactions, plasma, the 12-year pole shift cycle, etc. On the level of symbols it is the visible Helios (instrumental name), on the meta-physical level, the hypostasis, it is an Aion or a powerful celestial deity that operates on the levels of the forces that provide the stars with their power.

And now poetry. Similarly, on the level of symbols and magical hypostasis, everything born of the solar fire has its own life - thus phoenixes, dragons, seraphs, elementals, etc., were born in bestiaries and mythologies. Taking into account these two perceptual shifts, from the phenomenal world to the numinal one, we connect vertical and horizontal approaches by linking them through two hermetic crosses that form a sphere; the Sun-Aion operating system and the Aion-Teletarch-Aion operating system in the poetry of the robes of the Mother of the Stars Nyx-Neith in the Egyptian-Hellenic beliefs defined by the laws of Shu-Tefnut-Ma'at, which represent a multiform being with deep laws. In Hindi belief systems, the grouping of world systems was governed by Rta.

It is difficult to imagine such worlds and maintain their perception. Perhaps superficial, but necessary for theurgic, magical, and semiotic work when our minds are constantly reduced to the regular perception of reality, yet necessary to shape time, space, and reality within its universe of discourse. Let us further assume that there is neither time nor space in the world of Aions.

Every point of time and phenomenal space in the "Cave of Shadows" is visible and accessible. Every point that rises from Plato's cave and connects with the numinous A-phenomenon becomes timeless and spaceless. From the soteriological point of view, this is a transition from the world of phenomena to the numinous. It is an individual transition for each consciousness. Back to the world of phenomena - stars are separated from each other by light years, parsecs, greater galactic distances. In the world of numena, plunging into the outer edges of the Milky Way galaxy can take miliseconds beyond.
Now back to the Earth. The operating system Earth has its geological properties, it was formed from elements that have their own electromagnetic radiation properties, in their "simplicity" and molecular configurations they are the stuff of the visible environment; the geomagnetic field of the Earth appeared 3.7 billion years ago. The first wave of life filled the atmosphere with oxygen. The first layer of life diversified, mutated, evolved, adapted, died out, and lived on. Waves of diversified life appear and disappear in the biosphere, nature works through entropy, biological negentropy within its boundaries, like living organisms - it pulsates, lives.

Orphic Hymns [25] XXV. TO THE EARTH [GAIA]: The Fumigation from every kind of Seed, except Beans and Aromatics. O Goddess, Earth, of Gods and men the source, endu'd with fertile, all destroying force; All-parent, bounding, whose prolific pow'rs, produce a store of beauteous fruits and flow'rs, All-various maid, th" eternal world's strong base immortal, blessed, crown'd with ev'ry grace; From whose wide womb, as from an endless root, fruits, many-form'd, mature and grateful shoot. Deep bosom'd, blessed, pleas'd with grassy plains, sweet to the smell, and with prolific rains. All flow'ry dæmon, centre of the world, around thy orb, the beauteous stars are hurl'd With rapid whirl, eternal and divine, whose frames with matchless skill and wisdom shine. Come, blessed Goddess, listen to my pray'r, and make increase of fruits thy constant care; With fertile Seasons [Horai] in thy train, draw near, and with propitious mind thy suppliant hear.

With the emergence of life comes a micro-operating system with its own layers, mysteries not yet discovered by formal science. Indeed, it is difficult to understand something through itself, a human cannot perfectly understand itself as a whole, one cannot measure "a consciousness through a consciousness", we can only isolate fragments in a cognitive mini-laboratory, their aspects - we cannot understand the wholeness of nature, which is its subject, from the perspective of nature, as long as we are animals. What is the point of conjuring up a refined set of psychically projected concepts, of creating an infinite representation of these concepts by procuring and generating streams of information in which we seek answers in mere virtualities, in tokens. The way to find ourselves could be much easier, but of course - we will not know much, but like in Hermann Hesse's Glass Bead Game, we will touch the right sounds and images, move the right feeling, conjure up concepts and philosophies, knowing that it is a token that will dissolve as soon as it is solved - it is no longer necessary, we move on!

Life is interwoven with the environment in which it grew, and the same environment is interwoven with life. Continents drifted apart, joined together, new land masses, ocean masses appeared, further diversifying life, the branching of evolutionary threads, the approach and removal of those threads; DNA protein sequencing is as diverse as life, by mutation and replication it changes itself, by chance and arrangement there are adaptive corrections, genetic errors. No organism is perfectly adapted to its environment, it is an approximation to adaptation that guarantees diversity.

Phylogenetically, modern man is approximately arrested at the level of Homo Erectus with greater encephalization, but his and her capacity for self-awareness makes him a "sick animal" (Nietzschean idea) - trying to find a way to find himself. The first ape-like creature appeared in South America 16 million years ago. In Africa, 120,000 years ago, we found a remnant of the mtDNA haplogroup that is now common to all humans - the other female haplogroup lineages of homo sapiens are extinct.

From an occult point of view, these operating systems are not isolated, they add another level to the world systems, in search of astralistic configurations of uncanny worlds, to discover the tendencies and aspirations, an attempt to find the "cosmic will, expression, action", one or more, to realize it on Earth or within oneself. To find meaning and purpose. Distant and nearer words, invisible worlds living in operating systems of other "phenomenally dead" planets and moons, "phenomenally alive" worlds of other systems.

Early human civilizations with a cosmographic instinct drew territories and maps of the cosmos and recognized some order. Homo Sapiens Sapiens, given the heritage of ontogeny, phylogeny, and the rare chance to relate themselves to think about the "whence, why, whither," appeared in a pre-existing world. The first ape-man to think about himself was perhaps frightened, perhaps sad; we are no different today.

He tried to understand life, visible, invisible, distant and remote, to relate to it, to understand it, to control fear. He went through chthonic, animalistic, totemic cults, solar cults, and approached a strange, frightening, essential definition of the divine, the numinous. He absorbed what he could, making up concepts, magical techniques, techniques of deities, giving them names, learning the magic of the world and preserving it in rituals and ceremonies – interpreting powers and forces that had not arisen ab nihilo.

When homo symbolicus began to create and participate in rituals and ceremonies of various traditions, he had no scientific approach. When he began to organize cults, he approached an act within the limits of a cosmography, cosmogony, measuring and understanding fragments of different parts of the cosmos through reflection.

As it became homo magicus in the apotheosis of itself - consciously performing ritual acts, enchanting the world, itself, moving through unexplored territories, making maps - invoking and receiving help from the 'Elder Races' – terminology of Iamblchus of Chalcis in De Mysteriis, from gods, goddesses, innumerable worlds of invisibleand visible beings, in a new understanding of scientific theology, religion was married to science because they were one, the hand directed downward toward nature and science below, the hand directed upward toward the unknowable, full of reverence above; Philosophy was the love of wisdom. Philosophical magic was a way to ascend to hypostasis, to re-embodiment, and to express this unhindered, as a catalyst, below. Homo magicus was almost godlike!

Between east and west of human civilizations, between dawn and dusk - beliefs, religions, formalized magical techniques, ceremonies, psionic, instinctive, desired, building up, reforming, destroying, dismantling. New layers of postmortem existence in the operating system Earth, in the solar system, on its planets and moons.

We virtualize a world, enclose ourselves in circular cages, free ourselves from one and fall into others. When we free ourselves from mental prisons, we fall into pneumatic prisons. To free ourselves from pneumatic prisons, we do not have to fall back into mental prisons and maintain them by pushing upward with focus, ease and determination; each new conceptual invention created a virtuality that can be used to free or dominate and enslave: suffering and antidotes. The current man-made technological plane, intertwined with the pre-existing world, serves a similar function. Depending on our competence in "service to our creations, to ourselves and to the world" - we can do more, but for a moment when we are caught by the illusions, enslaved by the object of our attention, we become mere slaves. When we are enslaved by the creations of others - we become a slave, when we intentionally intend to enslave others - we are mere slave owners, enslaved ourselves by our ownership of slaves, - that never liberates.

Semiotics of Magic: Substasis-Hypostasis

What is intuitive is no longer complex, dilettante dwelling in complexity is something not learned, not understood, but when learned it becomes intuitive, so the bridge must be crossed and no longer worries us, it is unlearned, spontaneous and natural.

> "Through learning the upturned vehicle is averted Through reflection the vehicle is fixed Through meditation the vehicle is cleansed"

About Meaning

Meaning is conceptually constructed in context and we could say that it does not exist outside of that context: By appropriating the context, we construct the „sacred space" in the case of magic and metaphysics, or the „semiotic space" in the case of ordinary metaphor (transmission of meaning, as in communication). They are separate from each other, but can work together to place meaning within them. The appropriation of contexts and meanings to manipulate them belongs to the history of ideas, semiotics and etymology. The history of these terms belongs to ideographers and those who can view them as abstracts — symbols — that denote something meaningful depending on the context. How they are used is a matter for those who control ideas, visions, narratives, etc. — for better or worse.

On Archetypal Introjection to Round

Imagination is the context of symbols, symbols are the meanings that are the attractors of imagination; meaning and context are obtained from memory and knowledge, mediated by architectures of thought, ideas, beliefs, perceptions, etc. Depending on which parts of the imagens — a term of Piavi — (totality of the image in the mind) and the logens (totality of the verbal-related image in the mind) are activated, the map of cognition and affect, which designates the territory of mental movements, is created. The intellect mediates through the concept and the feeling, so the hypostasis of the cognition is the idea, the hypostasis of the feeling is the emotion; or rather the other way around, the substasis of feeling is emotion, the substasis of idea is cognition, the archetypes of totality are enclosed in a fragmented way in the „lens" of an animal man on a limited linear-sequential time scale, the goal of making man whole is to expand into the types through tokens, to encircle them and build up the „divine nature" over them, to re-deify, combine and merge through individuation; It is an ongoing work to rise from a starting point in the now and around time into the „always" as the numinous breaths that join the breath begin to merge into the larger „many faces of the One", the God-worker becomes a god, a man a small deity, among many other known and distant faces of the living deity of the universe. As with image schemas, it is the continuous structure of an organizing activity; it is belonging to the self; a kaleidoscopic-mandalic continuity of co-arranging rearrangements; without inflation, deflation, it is a rounding out — truly — of the expression of life;

About quarrels and agreements

When someone does not trigger the complementary or „compatible" imagens and logens in my mind, disagreements, beliefs, etc. occur. We have a different database to draw from, different styles of thinking, different structure of epistemes, and different cognitive phenotype. Communication and agreement or collaboration is successful when two subjective worlds agree intersubjectively; intersubjectivity is what is shared, the picture of a narrative that we believe is consistently compatible with others; Two people who — theoretically — hold similar belief systems may disagree because their subjective perception of beliefs is different. Although they believe they are arguing about the same thing, they are trying to assert their subjectivity to make it valid or to hold their self-image of subjective truthfulness to be consistent. Similarly, two people who subjectively share the same belief that is similar on a pseudo-objective level may disagree because the process of communication involves ambiguity if not clarified and discussed, or two people with completely different beliefs may agree — as long as there is a willingness to understand the other's perspective, to „exchange views" in an intersubjective agreement. When intersubjective communication does not result in agreement, i.e., when it is competitive, we either sacrifice our narrative by keeping it to ourselves, we argue our point of view, or — in the case of mass narratives that might threaten our own freedom of perception, belief, and expression — we take direct action and engage.

Beliefs as vehicles

People often hold on to certain beliefs without understanding or questioning them. This is natural for a human being who holds many inconsistencies and irrational or mutually exclusive premises that persist until they are brought to the light of reason; As a human being, I do not question metaphysics, I engage with it and try to understand it and organize it to the best of my ability according to properties, structures, proportions and categories. Then I build a consistent, steel-clad, operational system (to defend it against attackers) in which I perform my rituals and ceremonies, if I consider it interactive or impressing (Neoplatonic term for "asking and receiving" - Chaldean oracle, theion ergon "impressing and receiving impressions"), the whole universe is sympathetic, an occult paradigm - if there is a common element that it shares, a universal category, an attribute, then a human or any other being that shares this "metaphorical" "metaphysical" element can "ask and receive, impress and be impressed" in a certain way that is limited to one being; It is like conceptual metonymy: Certain aspects of a conceptual domain are associated with the conceptualization of events. So also events in the imagination. But we need a vehicle, we need a temple for it, after we have established the properties, the proportions, certain laws, after we have marked out the contours of our sacred and profane.

Conceptual metaphor: mapping between two conceptual realms: Here the semiotic operands refer to each other, one is signified, the other is meant; although the other is operative and asserted, the signifier obscures the intention; here the process of magical encoding takes place (which confuses some), sigilization works in a similar way; basically, the intention activates the insignificant, although the latter is the effect; The trigger of consciousness activates the unconscious; When the higher cognitive functions are dampened, dulled and obsolete, one operates in the void — one cannot perform an effective ceremony, but the void constructed by the prior intention as-if creates an effective ceremony by bypassing the „blockages" of the „cognitive-noemic" gates; Chance always has a say in the fates;

Sacred and Profane

We set up our sacred space as a temple in much the same way as the scientific theology of the pagans does. Imagine your temple in the imagination - this is here, and in the imagination - this is a place in the stars, fixed in coordinates, or flowing in the cosmic void, or above the universe, in a place where I and my love meet secretly, for the last time. The act of imagination is more or less separate from the act of ceremony or magical hypostasis. It is an operation on the eidos, the operation on the noema is done through the effective, essential eidos; But where is the angle between a magical act in the phenomena and an imaginary act in the phenomena, when the phenomena are illusory? Where is the angle between a theurgy that is above the phenomena and a personal magic of nonsensical extent?

Epopteion and Cosmic Hells

> The space of your reality is just a habitual blindness to the consolidation of its enfoldment around your sanity.

Is not crossing the abyss an attempt to alter consciousness, whether the mind follows or not? That an ancient process was somehow forgotten or maliciously destroyed, removed from our consciousness and others put to sleep? It is an attempt at perfection, and these people who have configured such carvings in their minds, hearts and spirits will either be assigned the planet to liberate others, or they will leave the earthly cycle by entering the stream of perpetual light, thus working and calling back through the world. Perhaps the stars are only spiritual emblems of the invisible force, reminding us of the destinies we are to follow. Those who have loved this world too much remain, as well as those who have hated it are punished with chains to watch and observe. Those who think they have secured freedom live in constant deception and lay down their arms — a silent memorandum to what they have not done, even if they could not do anything — the tragedy of man, the tragedy of woman.

See between the infinite freedom the injustice and the pain. To serve and commit to the work is a sign of greatness; to flee and return is not cowardice, but wearily executed justice. How sovereignly can one serve the aggrieved when they have fallen from the confusion and ignorance into which they were born. How does the human race relate to the powers that preceded it and yet bring forth corruption or embrace and promote it. Where is the original will and where is the guilt, where are the guilty and where are the innocent. The more you can see and recognize - the game goes on. and stupidity on the physical side of things equals stupidity on the other side. What else can you do but turn to the wisdom of the free worlds, the intelligent minds and the gods of providence, the philosophical sun surrounded by the ancient forces of the planet that resonate with the cosmos and human nature? "Ignorance is bliss" is synonymous with the saying: the more one sees through the world and sees in a great vision what is wrong with it, the greater the burden and despair of being helpless. All the greater the art of wanting to move a mountain with a ridiculous thought. Irresponsible restraint, immaturity, slowly succumbs to anger and degenerate hatred. Every move can be either easily forgetful or agonizingly responsible - with no end in sight, even beyond life.

Unveiling

A cylinder hammering on my flesh, writhing in my mind, falling through constant emptiness, a vision — amidst the Devanagari, amidst the dust of life, the ashes of burnt corpses, a meditor drinking his flesh and blood, burning with a living flame, mirroring me, the victim of the corporeal image, a redhead approaches me, lies with me for a while, then dissolves into the ashen mist. Thrown down, floating in the monolithic sounds of the planetary void, I returned to my body, awake all the time, with imprints in my veins, that was my seal. On the wooden table appeared with chalk a word in Hebrew — Mahil, that was an angel of the scribes. I wrote it in a pentagram and then threw it away. Were not allied traditions trying to claim me as their own, as a strategic move? Or was it a gift at the time? Emanationist tantra, Horus was the closest deity I remembered from my childhood.

The next day, the next night, thrown over my body, circling, spinning on its axis, my eyeballs felt like they were falling into an empty sacrificial skull. Crowned by demons, a steel crown on my forehead.

The next night they approached the red dragon's body and tried to feast on me, they were scorched as if drinking the sun. Shadows on red flames, screaming with bitterness, punished for trying to drink my blood. Vampiric subhuman powers. They summoned the seven fallen, ghouls and corpse-eaters. It took them several hours to destroy the blood-red orb that enveloped my body. Then they tried to make me their king, a cheap imitation of their pathetic, filthy aspirations. As if fools wanted to create and crown a greater, corrupted, degenerate fool than themselves.

The next day I felt dry, dead, without vitality, I did not know if I was alive and the rest were dead, or if I was dead and the rest were alive. My soulless body looked black, sinking down into Thanathos, not to mention all the magical procedures done to me, and done by myself. What was it that kept me alive? That was eleven years ago now. Anniversary, June 3, 2007 of the madness, anniversary sometime in August, maybe on the 12th 2007 descent and slaughter. Since then, many stories have been written, many that will remain unspoken and unsaid.

My voice was played and heard, my madness held my voice captive, vampires made sure to bind my spirit to flesh, my fangs, invisible bioplasmic shadow substance did not crave blood. Yet they reminded me of destinies. Da'ath, Amentet, the throat and croak of a human voice on the waves of the Aethyrs. Parasites attaching themselves to the vocal cords and causing terrible things to happen. Would the noble things ever be worth saying, illusions of speech-things I never said, doubles-things I would never be. I have been dead for years, and I have become more and more resistant.

I want to shoot an arrow from the bow of my knowledge that travels with such speed that when it strikes your hearts it shatters your reality into pieces where all meanings fall apart and the strangeness experienced pierces all senses in an abrupt spasm and arches in a disturbed understanding. With a hard blow against the Jericho walls of your mind, reducing them to dust and ruins, and the exclamation: Liberation! This is a blow that goes right through your conscience, erasing all the blinds on the eyes of your mind and becoming an illuminating thunder. An ultimate weapon of self-transcendence aimed at your beautifully built temples, towers and sacrosanct knowledge that collapses under its own ineptitude! Egocide, Selfcide, Personacide. Madness is such a beautiful apocalypse!

Repetitive and self-evident narratives in the shallow reality our pseudo-individualistic hive cultures thrive on and constantly process, stuffing the mouths of those who yearn for true liberation until they realize the potential to plunge into the abyss. It brings the horror, quickly deconditioning reality and reinterpreting it into the possibility of construction. As Jack Parsons put it: „In these experiences, the ego is completely altered or totally destroyed by the death that must precede a rebirth into life. The horror, anguish, and despair that accompany this process cannot be trivialized."

By further spreading freedom, reducing the unspoken multidimensional to the consensual language of social reality and passing it on to individuals, they are enabled to heal the very narratives of which they were the product, that is, to heal themselves and pass on the knowledge of the experience.

Introduction

Is it that we are destined to cross the line before we are born? And that everything that prevented us from destroying our minds, subjugating and dominating us, preventing us from twisting our childhood and youth, while unconsciously playing into the deeper conspiracy, only made our masters impatient to be thrown into the void without any preparation, so that we learn quickly or perish?

The experience, conveyed in simple terms, seemed random and intuitive at first; only with time did it become purposeful and necessary. It emerged spontaneously during that period of my life when various mental agonies and delusions, in a psychotic sequence that lasted for more than two years, when certain forces tried to annihilate me, led to a state in which the tolerance threshold to relative suffering and anomalistic signals was raised and everything turned into a cold, clean act of heavy will, indifferent yet strong. The emotional exhaustion and cognitive indifference neutralized all the fears that would arise in the life of a normal person during such events, which would certainly weaken and terrorize an unprepared mind — prepared by the terror itself. It is difficult to say how such an experience would affect a person who is mentally healthy and has a consolidated — and thus incapable — image of the world that he can shape, change and bend. The only message conveyed here is perhaps a personal narrative or a personal realization that there are worlds beyond the safe and orderly facadic everyday reality that we are monstrously indifferent to, largely alien to, and unfamiliar with. At the same time, this fertile and powerful process affects our minds, but in a sober way we reject it from perception and prevent it from surfacing in waking consciousness. This experience can be potentially dangerous as it largely induces dissociative states that burn away regular images, be they the images of our physicality or the images of the mind, indeed it must kill these body images and thought projections to let us through. If the mind were not willing to ascribe independent existence even without the phenomena we observe, we could not free consciousness from subject and object and the images in between, and so we become entangled in a web of illusions so enticing that they flood the mind. It is not a pleasant experience to become a horror in order to overcome the horror and then dissolve into the void so as not to become our own nightmare, as Carl Gustav Jung wrote: We enlighten ourselves not by conjuring up images of light, that would be a one-sided approach, but by confronting the darkness, the shadow, the nigredo of the critical, evaluative ego, by promoting a limited inner revolution that can degenerate into derangement. Indeed, attacking meanings of issues should perhaps be saved for later, when they mature over time to be understood through both study and intuitive and transcendent content. The author is fascinated by how the mind builds and creates the maps of reality, the imago mundi, how the cracks and fractures in these images, the wedging of madness and the cosmic void transform the being into a different perspective, with the encounter with the great void becoming the catalyst for these changes.

Lesser Work

The first stage of the Lesser Work is the night of the soul, or the believing step into darkness, in which everything that was secure and firm is shaken and we ourselves are purified in torment. In this phase, man reenacts an extended conception of the wounded, dying God (of the human image), it is the time of an exaggerated superego of a sacred figure, protected by its power from being drawn into the chthonic or bestial. It is a time of depression and stagnation, contemplation, resignation and retreat. Victory is measured by the perseverance of integrity and the struggle to overcome oneself, striving for a clear, predetermined goal, namely the completion of the Lesser Work. The demon is not. The demon has the potential to become and grow as the degeneration progresses, it is never the same but always malevolent and takes many shapes and forms. When we relativize the place of bestiality, we become emptiness, monsters, and develop a very strong psychopathic ego without the social superego to keep it in check, eventually losing it to madness or mental and physical atrocities. The most extreme facets of humanity that can be grasped by common sense are absorbed. As the shadow expands, the inner beast awakens and a battle ensues between the neophyte and this new entity. The Beast is formed in terms of individual and societal norms, breaking them down to the state of the unconscious berserker, where negative urges take over and the Shadow monopolizes the conscious „I," while the values of modern societies are tempted by its perversion, colonizing the mind with itself to be overworked and burned. This leads to a particular form of aberration: the practical relativism of the state makes objective judgment impossible, the conscience disintegrates, the distinction between what is „right" and what is „wrong" is almost nonexistent, and what remains is a cold, clean act of the will, stripped of all value systems. When the will is broken, we give in to all the urges and accumulated darkness that want to discharge in the form of thoughts, actions, and words. We cannot destroy the realized Beast, but we can force it to obey. Every return to the Beast is a test of the will, and every successful test of the will is a constant subjugation of the Beast and at the same time forms character in opposition to it, for character is never formed by inertia but by confrontation.

The Lesser Work is simply working with that which devours people, something that disgusts them and something that is also an object of their passion, all in the setting of the mind, subjectively real and concrete. When someone gets into this inverted, altered existence, he is purified, whitened; he relives what he has already experienced in his life and makes use of this past, reinterpreting it in all possible lights. Everything happens in the mind, the horror is not experienced in full glory — the goal is not to destroy the mind by ritualizing the nigredo, that would be pathological and counterproductive, but to create through its reworking a realization that leads to liberation, through its lightening and the birth of the dyad, the celestial image that floats above the waters of chaos, and the shadow, as the watery expression of the nigredo and shadow of the celestial partner.

Each time you distill your inner milieu (ezoterra), you understand more. Nightmares are adapted and integrated as part of our wholeness, not as external, isolated monstrosities that want to torment us, the victims — because we approve of being the perpetrators and participate in the destruction of our conditioned image. The nightmare becomes a way of thinking, while the forms are purified until the fear is overcome. Thus, stabilization lies in purification through conversion, which lies in the gradual taming of human nature, creating an „expanded man". The chasm between the psychonaut and society deepens and widens. On one side we have the social, the collective, and on the other the arch-human, the individual realization. This condition cannot last forever, and soon after the unveiling of some truths, they should lay the foundations for a „good life": while suffering becomes ethical education and the values taught serve to sharpen our reason as a sword of discernment.

Prelude

The instrumental idea that all phenomena are empty and without intrinsic existence, appearing as real only in the mind, does not deprive them of existence, but neither does it lead to much human projection or a kind of lensing, trying to understand things functioning in non-human perspective by mixing them with human cognition and forcing a particular view of their behavior, relations, properties and essence. The mind can be understood as a continuum between the external and the internal, while at the same time attempting to negate such a distinction. What appears in both the outer and inner spheres is neither this nor that, for it is only temporarily caught in such a distinction. Thought and the way we understand things is also a tool of measurement. Therefore, their choice should be instrumental and sober, otherwise the intellectual grasp of reality can lead to creating meanings where there is emptiness, and to the mental content flooding the cognitive processes. The mind is capable of inducing trance-like states and exploring different frequencies of exoteric and esoteric realities. It can act like a prism that is dusted or cleansed and scatters, distorts or sees through the image of reality, taking on different characteristics, leading to different points of observation and experience. Depending on the psychic content, the inclinations of cognition and affect, the character traits, the orientation of psychic energy toward or away from a particular reality bundle, we may experience radical states of visions, or transport to another realm in a waking state of mind. Keeping this in mind, we will not focus on the interpretation of the world through the consciousness of everyday reality, but through an altered state in which the mind is transported into a parallel world, both an innate, archaic or hidden zone, and the vast unknown that cannot be measured outside the mind. The idea that some sort of „evocative principle" or the way the mind connects to certain experiences leads directly to the rays or streams that arise between the mind and the experience and manifest on the matrix of consciousness through projection, introjection, re-projection and amplification. The psychic dynamics in hyperrealistic experiences are characterized by a disturbance in the metabolism of information, that is, the way the mind transforms signals into cognitions and affects, with the energy used for the intense interpretation of the world flowing back to the original source, which is in the unconscious, The difference lies in the ability of the mind to order such experiences. In the first case, the mind is mature and widely integrated; in the second, it is flooded, limited, and barely holds on to the surface of things that have been knocked down by the anomalies that have occurred.

Descent

The epiphany of emptiness is an act of inner transformation that strips away previously conditioned meanings and renegotiates values of a higher kind, paving the way for the transformation of the „I." The process has a certain polarity and a mutual interaction between these points of weight, where the extremes are established and the work begins. The experience cannot be processed ideally or cognitively, it must be lived through with full engagement and immersion in the process where it becomes absolute through the greater power of its influence, it must be confronted, responded to and transformed.

Initiation

I was guided to imagine a large room and allow the mind to project visions onto the inner mind's eye with eyes closed. A grey space appeared where the sky was dark and I was surrounded by sacred fires. The grey of the land consisted of the ashes of people, past, present and future. As I imagined sitting in the Burmese position, there was my reflection repeating my every gesture and movement. He burned with great fire, and soon his blood seeped into a skull bowl under the reflection; I mixed the blood with ashes and drank the mixture. As I lay down in the ashes, a naked young red-haired woman lay beside me, looking at me for a while and watching me patiently, then she got up and walked away as I saw the disappearing silhouette in the distance.

The death of the physical image

Choronzonic mind, or the confrontation with the conditioned images of the psychoreactive human mind: after the scenes of mental vision disappeared, I witnessed the sensation of the body melting and decaying, the liquid substance in my mouth appeared as blood and melted body; it began to spread through the stages of the decaying corpse that my mind carried. As I was thrown into a pool full of crawling creatures, figures of ghouls appeared, feasting on my flesh and spirit. But perhaps they were not just creatures, but reflections and projections of the hidden spirit that wrapped itself in their forms. When I was distracted at first, I declared myself incorporeal so as not to suffer from the decay of the body. When various entities devoured my body, a corporeal sensation, I completely detached myself from it and participated in the banquet of my body as an outsider, as one of the ghouls, a process in which consciousness merged with nothingness, but without fully identifying with it. While interrupting the guided experiment for a while, I watched my hand appear in various horrible forms, the whole body becoming liquid and putrid. White and black demonic faces appeared in flashes and lit up the room. When I closed my eyes, my eyeballs fell into the depths of my skull; it was accompanied by tactile and visual sensations, as if something took control of my mind and could project everything horrible into the realm of phenomenal experience. Some ghostly beings placed a steel crown on my head, and my body subjectively ceased to exist.

Transfer of Consciousness

After that, when the mind began to fall into a void as a non-body, into a coldness without dimensions and time, expanded in a relative time that could not be measured, where the mind tried to establish any coordinates to which it usually refers in regular life, the loss of body warmth was felt as coldness. When the situation was hopeless, I sent a signal to my physical body to try to stop the experiment. Although it was not an urge to escape, but rather a natural result of the mind that could not accommodate itself in this dimension. The feeling of sinking into the vastness of the void, but also a certain strength that came with time, improved the understanding of this phenomenon in retrospect. I heard a light figure shouting with joy that I had returned from that dimension. I also felt terrible pain in my palms and veins, on which symmetrical seals were formed, with strong white energy flowing between them.

Ophitic Wholism, or Egyptian-Tantric integration of the components of a human being

> "Nor did Mythology spring from fifty or a hundred different sources, as frequently assumed. It is one as a system of representation, one as a mould of thought, one as a mode of expression, and all its great primordial types are virtually universal"
> — Gerard Massey

The interpretation and translation is based on Wiesław Bator's, scholarly work Religion of Ancient Egypt: Perspectives from Religious Studies (Jagiellonian University Publications: Cracow, 2012) to shed light on a simple operation:

To enwing oneself during proper operations one needs to awaken twin-snakes of blue-red kundalini, potentiality merging with black-white one. It is not confirmed whether the operation is done succesfully once (Theion Ergon, if Gods allow), or it may be performed more than once. The vortex created on the base of the spine is afterwards re-linked with the Kheper (Heart), re-joined with the negotiated qualities of the mind, and if possible linked with Ankh (that is a reward for the toil and will never be acquired by rape). The Kheper, Ankh, Djet-Snakes ready, it is relinked with the center of consciousness in-between the eyebrows (Akh-Ba-Ka) that is merging through True Will with the higher executive elements (Sekhem-Sanhu-Nat) through the force Ran-Jan-Shut. This operation may be performed even with a killed soul, thieved Shut (shadow-soul) and Sanhu (soul-craft) is slaughtered by opposition.

A developed human, as a poli-dimensional being, whose consciousness is stranded in a narrow reality-tunnel, conditioned in circumstances that are in essence social phylogeny of ideas, a repetition of the evolution of ideas in the fabric of human minds, groups, cultures, civilizations; is not fully aware of its potential for self-liberation in accord with its form, and co-operating with orders of beings that may accommodate its existence, or being, to ascertain a greater freedom in commitment and responsibility through hard work, merit, study, understanding, humaneness, principles and wisdom. In contradistinction to the biological "ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny", or "the history of growth of one organism reiterates the evolutionary principle of the whole lineage of its particular life-wave strand, the social ontogeny is wholly conditioned, educated, socialized, although it recapitulates the growth and propagation of ideas throughout the particular group to whom one belongs. It represents only the strands of ideas that survived, and these are governed by complex factors of adaptation in the universe of discourse in the social life. The process of self-liberation is ultimately a process of de-conditioning the phylogeny of incorrect, flawed, or incomplete ideas, likewise reality-tunnels, and finding associations with relative truths that become realizations by the means of experimentation, mystical techniques, critical thought, understanding, ordering, and using the intellectual, philosophical sun, or soul, that may decide to endow us with mystagogues (these who initiate into mysteries) and psychopomps (these who guide our souls), poetically, metaphorically, but also quite truly. A human being, functioning as a whole, even when splintered or separated, has also its elements working in accord, or against themselves, in tune with the world, or against it, towards the rest, or being in a state of aversion and antagonism, and the principle aim of work is to integrate these components and refine them into a greater field of belonging.

Imagine an embryo, developing in water, as the signals begin to run through its myelinic coated nervous system. It is repeating the primordial evolution, a sequence of a code captured in time; and thus it resonates with a particular domain of this development, repeating ancient history and influx of all the forces and currents that are co-resonating with this development, as they were before, with a greater degree of influence, collective, individual, subtle, strong, or lesser range of influence on the vehicle, for ultimately the formation of the central nervous system is an extremely complex process, and as an eye to a starfish is its central nervous plot that borrowed its nature from the ocean, so is the nervous system and the development of the eye in human beings a gateway perception of the universe and its surroundings — but the biological vessel is not everything, although it is very profound in occult meanings, and should never be reduced to a piece of meat, into which it turns upon death and decay, but should be comprehended wholistically in life — and it is the later vessel of the Ophitic energies, vessel of the tantric wings, the kingdom of the consciousness, where the mind-body problem is cast aside, for both the mind and body are taken under command of a superior, sovereign force above — being yet alike to the governing mind, and of us, but higher in every respect — a guide, like Arya — which in Sanskrit meant a noble person, a female Juno, a male Genius in Roman beliefs. A wholly developed human, a plant, an animal or any form of energy going through its states and modes of experience with currents of such openings in weird constellations that cannot be experienced otherwise than by a mind isolating these resonations and emanating them. Now, a human being is submersed in gargantuan eerie world and has a safe-haven of the symbolical structure called reality, how it re-programs this reality to open itself to these powers, whether more human, hermetic, in the proxy of its kind, whether in the guts of biological evolutionary principle and the deep-seated weird carnal-mental image with its meta-programs and circuits, whether that of his civilized values, beliefs, norms, taboos, universe of discourse, whether that of the numinous, luminous, photic, whether that of primordial, dark, ancient, ante-dating it's whole existence. All dimensions and realities undergo change, flux, evolution, all futures and pasts are related to this expression; It is a conservative rule to carve out a part of this and call it a 'school', a 'tradition', a 'reality', a 'religion', a 'civilization'.

For example, religion is an organised principle, that both enchants by its beliefs and gives safe-havens of order, of values, of certain harmony, but it remains an opium for the masses, it punished its mystics, it discarded the pioneers and freethinkers having their own world-views on the basis of the old "fear of novelty", or conscious censorship in the name of power, which hides behind order — for true power is stemming from justice, primarily, not in reverse. Such pioneers in whatsoever field damage the whole fabric of the order into which they are born, and tear apart all doctrine, armed with sincerity, especially when they are capable of features that are naturally assigned to the domain of religion, while they reject the religious dogma, explanations, etc. and seek their own understanding.. In a similar way, science is an organised principle, and has its own rules of progress from paradigm to paradigm, likewise, it punishes these who go beyond its paradigms, and helps to rigorously safeguard them — but its method is much greater than that of religion. In both cases, if you tear apart reality, and drink from the waters of chaos, experience it, and conjure things untaught of, so called "miracles", historically attributed to religion, to re-create an order, you may become satanized or glorified by the religious beliefs, depending on whether you agree or disagree with its tenets, and often discredited by science, as you don't fit into the paradigm, but transcend it. Thus in such a situation it is wise to use existing narrations, acknowledged both to smuggle information, that might be discovered much later, be it through art, symbols, or certain tradeoffs, reversing into existing pool of scripts, and shaping them in such a way to appear acceptable. As an occultist, I am much more interested in the ways of science, when it comes to understanding of the world, as a technician of magic, I prefer ancient scriptures of diverse religions and mystery-schools scattered across the world to explain things that occur in my life in a greater degree, to organise them properly, and as a human being, I prefer to be humane in a way that the ancient Chinese understood the world love. It is not to say there is no grain of truth in every belief-system; every established belief-system contains a secret rite, which is ordering and ritualizing certain events that undergo interpretation, but they are subtle and should never be read in a fundamental way, however, when doctrine and rite become obsolete, and hinder greatness, so that others may spread wings, when it holds strongly to power and corrupt things, it is time to change it, discard it, and shout in dissent, stand still, and ask the Gods for assistance once again. And as incorporeal messengers mediate between the notions of Deities and the numinous and black mystic lights and envoys send their inspiration and ideas to people, so the Magoi and Priestesses communicate with the divine and by interpretation, by the force of the philosophical sun, proper to human form, by the force of wisdom, fallible — therefore imperfect, human — they attempt to rephrase the vision, so that their apocalypsis (unveiling) will not be lost to their kindred, yet will not violate the vision of the rest with domination, with enslavement — thus the keepers of the sacred flames in the past safeguarded these mysteries, traditions, rites, theatres, and established the temples of memory — commemorating, sustaining, regenerating, inflaming, so that the holders of these mysteries, priests and priestesses of these holy flames, may become intermediaries between the people and the Divine, between the great things and the people, inasmuch as the poets understand intuitively their muses, their words have drawn from the infinite, captured in aesthetics of their feeling, they must not see through their art, because it is the art of the world that speaks through them, in a similar way that a philosopher interprets the signs, and seeks relations through reason, intellect, memory, perception, knowledge, inspiration, the poet interprets the world through beauty, whether despaired, ugly, decomposing, delirious, insane, or raptured, noble, governed by high ideas to satisfy both the tastes of these who are in pain, suffering, angered, wrathful, hateful, vengeful, and these who are noble, righteous, inspired, and principled, to harmonize these forces, and align them to a greater cosmic reference, whose total reference is stillness, but whose manifestations are diverse, and shift with time, age, epoch, eon.

We see only through what is appropriate to our form, we may expand beyond our form, but ultimately our form is the interpreter, the reducer of an experience. The lock-pick to it all, as I believe, is consciousness, whatever it means for us, for it is consciousness that opens the rays of these domains and reverse-feeds it into our developed brain, so that we may translate empirical information arriving from non-empirical source and interpret them into knowledge appropriate to our form, and development. A developed intellectual soul cannot be known by an animal, or a child, but a male or female philosopher, but just as an animal has its proper character, unique nature, and certain inclinations, so does a human cub, — likewise we cannot experience by forms different than ours, we cannot experience through the form of an inter-stellar being, or a Deity, unless we become one. We need a safe-haven, we need an order, thus by experiencing all that I referenced reality according to my ability. The order that I've created for myself out of chaos I am fond off.

Many Egyptologists counted these 'components' in different manner, but inasmuch as my experience allows in researching these disciplines by observation, I selected careful — yet fallible interpretations. The chosen model enlists nine such clusters of wholism. Note: For the Ren/Ran and Yab/Hati the chosen "hieroglyphs" were not found by the author and replaced with ideograms.

Three directive souls: Akh, Ba, Ka

Three Intermediary energies: Ran, Jab (Hati), Shut (Khaibit)

Three executive elements: Sekhem, Sanhu, Nacht (Sat)

Akh

Akh (bright, illumined) directs the whole intellectual sphere of a human being, and contains all his or hers intellectual potential (that may be trained). The hieroglyphic determinative and logogram of the concept Akh was the walking bird. This element returned to Yaaru (heavens) considered the house of Gods and Goddesses, it was this element that was the 'messenger' of the Gods that worked in accord with the laws of Maat, Akh of the deceased was identified with Stars across the universe, because Akh was also the source of all wisdom, the living wrote letters 'to the stars' or to the Akh of their ancestors, leaving them in their graves, where the statue (tut) of the deceased was erected, they awaited the reply in their dreams.

Ran/Ren

Ran/Ren (the name), nefer, it meant "beautiful"; "happy"; "joyful"; "glorious"; "splendid". It was the mirroring of the universal creative word (kheru, medu), the name was considered a natural link in-between creative soul and Akh and its passive executive form (Sekhem), but also an inter-mediary element between the Necher (Gods and Goddesses) and affective-emotional domain of the being, called "hhekau" (represented in case of human being by triad: Ba, Yab, Sahh). Name, understood in such a way, was associated with all governing forces over energy, and thus the physical world.

The power of the name Ren depends on the quality of Akh of its beholder;

Sekhem

Sekhem was considered the primal, unspoiled form of a human being — the ideal prototype of his body residing in the divine sphere of Nerchru. Visually, Sekhem reminded of earthly body, but it did not have any defects, nor did it undergo the effects of time. Observing representation of phenomena of timeless youth in artistic impressions conjured by Egyptian masters of Sekhem of immortal beings, as they were considered artistic ideations of the Earthly mirroring of Sekhem. This kind of idealistic portrayals were considered earthly mirroring of Sekhem and they were given the name Tut, which were included by some researchers into the fundamental elements of one's personality. Egyptians did not deny tut (the figure) a form of "life" (Tut Ankh or "living image"), but always considered Tut an Earthly substitute of Sekhem. Many researchers sought in Sekhem some active force, working in an autonomous manner, which might not be completely accurate, because the same element was equal in a determinative of a standing mummy, which may be found amongst the concepts of other bodies: Sahh and Djet. Thus, all three elements of human nature belong to the same category of receptive, or passive forms. This hypothesis is supported by Egyptian mythology, that the Goddess Sekhmet, of personified Sekhem of the highest being, is seen as a passive executor of the will of the King of Gods — Atum-Re-Chepri, who, according to the Stone of Shabaka, is understood as the "heart" and "word" of the panenteistic God Ptah; The above-mentioned elements of the human personality which work in the divine sphere of Necheru were considered the most perfect prototype of a mortal, thus the numinous mirroring of his Earthly nature.

The next triad of the elements of a human being are: Ba, Yab, and Sahh, which belong to the inter-mediating sphere of the whole being. Here, all weight of afterlife of a human being rests, because it is them that determinate what will one do living one's life, and what was the intention of his doings. Thus, they are the main protagonists of the judgment over the dead, because they are responsible for a human beings conscious actions and submit to the judgment over the dead. They are as follows:

Ba:

Ba: This element is most closely associated with the understanding of a 'soul' in the Western occidental civilization. Ba may be the reflexive, passionate element, responsible for life choices. Egyptians held that Ba was a loyal servant, thus a soul of one was his loyal servant (bak). Ba is described in writing by two different determinatives: the older one is a black stork, the younger one falcon with a human head. The reflexive soul was thus considered an inseparable companion, which suggests motives and way of acting. Ba was not responsible for creative thought, but advised how they should be applied, it resided in the "heart" (yab), and its inclinations influenced the active heart (Hati). The heart commanding separate senses and movements decided which of the Ba-influences to execute, and which one should be rejected. When Ba is recommending inner tranquillity, moderation, care for oneself and others, or it "persuades Maat", then it has a chance of attaining the state of divinity and it awaits a reward in the afterlife. This happy fate met him/her only when they conducted themselves as above. When the Ba-soul contradicted the order of Maat and influenced the human being to act against his con-science (co-feeling), or the voice of the Yab-heart which was inscribed with unfaltering laws and principles stemming from Ren in the Necheru sphere — then it must have been punished with other elements of the deceased, belonging to the sphere Hhekau, dying in cruel condition in the Underworld; The advices of the soul might be completely contradicting con-science, and even may put afterlife in doubt, in the scripture 'Conversation of a suicide with his Ba" we may note a complete contradiction between the Ba-element and inner consideration of a man. The soul or Ba in this case seem to be a synonym of sobriety and at all costs it attempts to silence the burdened con-science. The Ba, attached to all pleasantries of life conjures its image and recommends idleness. Operating on rational arguments the Ba negates afterlife, just to protect the protagonist from suicide. It knows that it leads to the extermination of consciousness in the afterlife. To the life in opposition to Maat it portrays a noble death, which is saving from wickedness and assures existence in the afterlife. The con-science suggests that a person living in accord with Maat has more influence in the world than the living body, attaining a degree of post-mortem divinity and the ability to conjure miracles. In the light of Egyptian narrative, the Ba is not only belonging to the human existence, also Gods and animals possess it. Yet, Gods are not limited to having just one Ba as the 'rational friend', the Ba may undergo transformations. Of course, a Ba belonging to a Deity is of much higher hierarchy than that of a mortal or an animal, it is higher, perfect, and infallible. In essence, the Deity-Ba is similar to human Akh, Ba of the divine is a manifestation of Necheru, may inhabit the bodies of many animals and this fact is the basis of Egyptian zoolatry (for example the Deity Horus, as the God of Life, may be emanating through all living beings in the positive aspect of their expression).

Yab/Hati

Yab/Hati, or 'heart' is the main concept of Egyptian anthropology and the key to the active human being, Egyptians believed that that it is the 'temple and store-house' of thoughts, and thus they assigned it a role similar to this that we are assigned to the brain nowadays (it might be said that the brain and associated cognitive processes and affective states and feelings are modulating the essential heart, thus experiences, and pain, suffering, influences or cleanses the heart alike to karmic inclinations, when a heart 'drowns' in its despair, or becomes alike to stone — different from detached abiding — it grows cold — but it may not be limited to biochemical physiological brain functions, it works with the components that give the feeling component authenticity, and the genius its proper, spiritual function, thus also it might be said that apart from a regular heart pumping blood through the organism, there is a hidden layer, a spiritual heart and its circulation, through which all states of being are carried throughout thus some believed that in blood therein is also contained the vital force of the 'heart', it is a violation thus to abuse the blood of one's 'heart', as it develops a parasitical dependence, and reliance on someone else's 'heart' thus rejecting one's own as an independent being). The heart was divided into the passive form (con-science) called yab, and directive active part (desire, or rather — direction) — hati. As "con-science" the heart (yab) is never bribed and it may be a witness against the deceased in the world of the dead. Some researchers believed that "yab" is directed towards the meta-physical worlds, while hati directs the doing of a human being in the world of the senses, for "hatia" means also "ruler". It thus also has in Egyptian texts a function alike to defence-double (ka) controlling the visible physical body. According to Egyptians they are different in the sense that "hati" is guided by conscious working of our body, and Ka controls only the physiological functioning of our organism that is not guided by our will (in essence Yogins of the East, by establishing Hati-Hatia command over Ka, they could be in charge of the emotional, affective, cognitive and other functions of the mind and body, thus establishing a seat of consciousness linking it with the 'true will' or the higher image). The "hati" heart, as a collection of active desires, emotions, also commands the passive form ("body") related to the sphere of Hhekau, also called Sahh Sahh: is a passive being of the human being, which is at disposal of the heart and executed through the meditation of the Sahh(-body) the will of the Ba-soul. It works without the interference of the senses and as a signal to act it is enough to think (emanate or vibrate) a "word" (any directed thought-form, or act, voice etc.). It may be called "soul-body", "subtle-body", or "emotional body". Because its determinative is also a standing mummy, a corpse, it is said the true process of mummification was an attempt at turning a regular body into Sahh (perhaps an astral double). These concepts, however, are not identical because the mummy is described with the Egyptian word "Ui" although equipped with identical determinative. In any case Sahh was the principle tool (and perhaps a protective carrier-shielding) in working of the Ba-soul through mediation of the heart, and it could take any shapes and infiltrate physical matter. It could also shape it into proper, visible imaginations; It is her that could morph its being into notions, or representations of Deities (modern idea of 'godforms', 'masks' or 'illusions', unlike true Deities), animals, plants, and symbols. It could also change things into another (transmutation, for example modifications on the mental-astral plane, or endowing physical objects with various kinds of energy — consecrated, or 'cursed' objects). That is why Sahh was an element, without which no magical work could be performed, that was considered obvious and common.

Sahh

The third sphere of the world, in which a human being played was the physical world, called nachtu. There are three functional elements here: directing — Ka, intermediary (Khaibit, Shu) and executive (Djet), from all listed elements of personality only the last one is captured in a sensual way, khaibit (shadow-being) is a delicate substance, and Ka is considered an invisible care-taker sustaining the human body in a good condition.

Ka

Ka — It is not commonly agreed, but some speculate that it is closest to the form close to 'platonic ideas', others that it is a blind instinctual force without any form of spirituality (it might happen that in fact it is blind, instinctual at first, but undergoes refinement into the divine, numinous 'ideas' that penetrate this world as interpretable powers, or eternal grammar of the world, which understood, becomes reflected in it). The main function of Ka is providing nourishment to the physical body. The female version of Ka, or Hemsut proves that this component has a role in sexual differences and regulated physiological needs. Ka has also some relation with the ancestors and heritability, Ka might look like a double (perhaps an astral double, representing the image of the person at a given time). Ka most likely was not responsible for psychic and moral traits of a human being. The energy-basis which Ka operates in, governing the physiology of a human being is khaibit (shut). After death, Ka resided (with two other elements) in the grave, still having physical needs.

Khaibit

Khaibit (shut), or "shadow" was considered amongst the Egyptian thinkers an intermediary element that transports the recommendations of Ka to autonomous physiological systems. It was always portrayed as pitch-black, and that's why it was called the 'shadow'. This shadow-soul accompanied a human being even at night, being his visual representation of vital and reproductive forces (thus shadow-substance may be considered as a psycho-sexual energy in relation to living organisms). As a state of physical reality, mediating between pure energy and matter may be often "borrowed" by Sahh, which in such a way is materializing and assumes a visible form. After death, Khaibit lived in the grave altogether with Ka and Djet, and like them, required nourishment.

Djet

Djet: One of the many names of the physical body. In Egyptian texts there are several synonyms: "kat, sat, hha". As the most sensuous of them all and the only fully accessible sensuous element that played a major function. The most important function of Djet was to execute the commands of "heart" or hati. In such a way the physical body realised in the world ideas of purely conceptual element — Akh descending from the divine sphere of Netcheru and through Djet the effects of conscious choice of man and his decisions which he makes in the sphere of hhekau. No wonder that caring for the body was a fundamental responsibility for every Egyptian, moreover aversion towards ascesis was on par with aversion to lack of moderation in submitting to physical lusts. Both stances led, according to Egyptian wise-man to the destruction of an organism, and thus criminally limited the potential acting of the Ba-soul and divine particle Akh in the physical world. After death, Djet was transformed into a ui-mummy for Khaibit and Ka to live further;

In the light of certain texts it seems that ancient Egyptians seen these nine elements in an integral relation, although death separated some of them, and perhaps re-integrating them to work as a whole was the purpose of rituals and ceremonies;

The way the occult build-up of the mental-physical-sexual-spiritual sphere of a human being is then captured in the flow of forces antedating it in varied topography both in life and post-„mortem", with each component „signing itself" into a given reality giving birth to new occurences; Integrative alchemy refining the components into reference-points of the mental, spiritual, sexual movements that develop their own inclinations according to the component and the whole (Theion Ergon, Work of humans, work of the Gods). „Cosmic roulette" and „planetary roulette" or „dimensional roulette" on which having dynamic and fixed reference points employs all these configurations and „constellations" of what a human being is and assists in the process of getting anywhere, and oftenwise assisted by beings, entities benevolently inclined towards our attempts and thus assisting us in the transformations against the „opposing, contradicting" forces both on mental, astral, physical, sexual and spiritual realm, and thus it is endless battle for sustenance, for mind, heart, sexual and spiritual forces, and eventually releasing oneself from human sense, mind, de-wrapping from the conditioned, un-conditioning into the greater view. Acquiring human existence was a blessing once, among the world of nature of Earth, nowadys it is more like a curse, a necessary one sometimes; The planet is old, our race extremely young, it was easier once, but how grim the few that know, that do not settle for surrogates once tasted from the hum of the cosmos, from an arsenal of beautiful, dignified, high ideas, balancing between human science, languages and symbols to conveys, silent or combative dissidency, while everything we see and love we are blinded to, the remnants of our movements constricted and killed. Regular human feelings — that of exhaustion, parity, greatness, surrended to or loved ones, are soon infiltrated, imprisoned, bought and sold like property, abandoned and cherished as mere sentimentality

When chaos is imposed upon us, we as recipients, as victims of magical operations, must establish order and then counteract it by observation, taking advantage of what has been bestowed by the gods, a rare intervention for which we are grateful, and counteracting the onslaught of negative changes with a new scene of mediation.

Great mysteries are imprinted on the primordial planets that were illuminated by the Sun, great stellar paths that were left open to protect order. Great people who have paved the way, initiated and accepted by the deities, archpriests and archpriestesses who harmoniously and resiliently watch over them to protect and initiate us.

> — „You have created a monster" — she said. — „How can you be a truly compassionate monster?" — he asked with a smile — „In the eyes of most of us, you are a monster," she said. — „So what makes me a monster? Is it knowledge? Experience, perhaps perception, or something else?" — He asked. — „You do not think like us" — she said again — „Let me explain... is it the limit of perception that captivates you, or perhaps a fear of it that you have not recognized? What looks like a monster to one person may seem like something divine or demonic to another. On the other hand, what seems to be a monster in the eyes of others is closer to the cosmos and the vastness of the unknown void. It is closer than what all your astronomers are able to elicit from the human mind. For they too are bound to their world — you all seem to believe that the cosmos is close to you, yet you are only its insignificant part. When a person is torn out of his known territory, he is either driven mad or has to adapt in a laborious process. Whatever the outcome, you may call him a monster, but if you realize the awe of the cosmos, you will see that the human worlds are even more cruel, irrational, ignorant and contradictory than the monster they see in us. They always refuse to see this detail in themselves. How is it that monsters are always forced into the role of non-humans? At the same time, you all try to usurp the right to know the cosmos by arrogantly claiming to take advantage of absolute truths that never belonged to any of us. In doing so, it is the insane who have crossed the threshold of terror into the unknown. The strangeness of the world, the nature of the cosmos is reflected in us better than in all sane people. The sane are bound to their beliefs, live in their castles in the air, are comfortable and are not impressed by the unknown. Where is the tragedy if not in those who are willing to cross the boundless and timeless void in the vain hope that they can become part of the infinite? Where is the work to refine that spirit into a star equal to the cosmos, to step into it and dissolve all fears into nothingness?" — he answered.

"Terrible, chaotic forces lurk behind the façade of the normal world. These forces are kept at bay by maintenance of social order. The reign of order is insufficient, however, because order itself becomes overbearing and deadly, if allowed unregulated or permanent expression"
·—Peterson, B. Jordan, Maps of Meaning: The Architecture of Belief (Routledge: 1999)

When we go beyond the human form, we inevitably become something inhuman that does not remain within human limits. During such excursions we can understand how weak the human mind is when it encounters certain experiences. Indeed, to a non-human observer, everything may appear as a continuous manifestation of energy, life, or form in phenomena that seem terrifying to us, or in reality make us mere planktonic prey. A human observer would tremble with horror to see a part of him reflected in the original expression of life, in forms beyond the comprehension of human experience, driving him mad. It is enough to see how many madmen fell back into larval states of mind hidden in archaic parts of their brains. What if the pre-human shadow dreamers let us in on something even more eerie? In order to understand the madness, one must stop putting oneself into a normal, rather narrow consciousness, unable to hold the extended reference, and thus unable to evolutionarily adapt to entirely different mental settings.

A loosening of the carefully conditioned, socialised and trained consciousness must take place in order to experience craziness. A complete destruction of these fortresses in trance and ecstasy, when all these carefully crafted cognitive taboos are suspended and obliterated, is required to participate in real delirium, as an acolytic focus of these forces. At the same time, we must refuse to be separated from the experience of transformations and mutations, excavating the innermost psycho-organic archaic parts of our wholeness through a psychonautical operation on a living mind, if we do not want to succumb to them as part of the nightmare, we will be their terrorised victims. By experiencing this madness, by joining in the banquet of our fears, by participating in the ouroboric incest of the primordial, we detach ourselves from ourselves and become the inspired, flourishing mass of the Elderstroems. In a new way of experiencing ourselves and reality, the perception of forms appears as a void beyond aesthetics, dislike and preference. At the same time, what lies beyond form gains a new essence and finds a common language with the unrecognised, strange element of the human being. In meditation we can cleanse the lenses of perception, removing the dust from the original consciousness of pure mind. In trance, we can destroy all patterns of conditioned perceptual scripts and replace them with new ones that are drastically different from the recognised world.

All forms of cognitive-organic sentimentality are cast aside because they are merely limits of experience. When we catalyse these flows through the human psychic apparatus, beyond the senses but still neutrally observing, we can have experiences that come close to the dissolution of the psyche, the unity of the whole of enlightenment is replaced by the unity of the one in archaization, regression, the pursuit of the rabbit hole. It is a time when our body becomes a focal point, a portal to the depth of the older origins that manifest as if re-entering the world through experience, temporarily building portals in our minds. It is a unified feeling, the fear of „otherness." Flooded by strange non-human realities, they cease to threaten us and become a breath of new perspective that carries us and makes us „dance" into the obsession of hypersensualism. They populate experience with a variety of chaotic forms and move away from the human essences of the tree of life in favour of the waves of being in experience and its expression, which becomes a constant manifestation through existence. It is largely incomprehensible from the perspective of the species, but leads to a temporary de-anthropocentrization in a different framework after the trance states that seek their humanity in a refreshing way. Under the influence of psychomorphosis, a strangeness beyond capacity and biological processing threshold can occur, a noetic strangeness. The ecstasy of an accelerated Eros-Thanatos sensory complex culminates in derangement, and aergasm, a combination of ecstasy and agony of heightened transformation, is recognised as an emotional pattern far removed from, yet post-spectively reduced to, the human mind. It lies below and beyond the human species, for it precedes the human world. It requires participation, but a participation that is detached from our mental self-image, for attachment to such a state produces terror as the body image decays and is destabilised. In the state of conditioned rejection of these experiences, the shell of a limited mind breaks, dissolving acquired patterns and releasing new forms of energy, whether the obsession of disturbance or the creativity of understanding. Perhaps an exemplary story of the centuries — long suppression of chthonic currents once controlled by ritual was the St. Vitus dance craze in the Middle Ages. Similar currents took groups of people under their influence and put them into trance states, often dancing until they dropped dead from exhaustion, and channelled them into art, consciously like a magician, like Austin Osmane Spare, and the Black Eagle focus, unconsciously like Howard Philips Lovecraft, who was a focus point but turned it into a vision of horror, H.R. Giger, who was another focus point of trans-plutonian currents and worlds of Ursa Major and turned it into a humanoid spectacle, or Zdzisław Beksiński, another focus point who shares the source with Chambers and the „Yellow King" stories of Hyades and Carcossa.

Those who have experienced such phenomena, perhaps from a regression into psychic safe spaces, may endow their perceptions with an aesthetic of beauty over more familiar forms. To maintain continuity of the senses, the internal censorship of no-go areas creates a cognitively conservative haven. In retrospect, this form of experience can help one realise that the world of sensuality ends with a condensed spasm or seizure of the senses, and that the path to refinement can be found elsewhere.

The crossing of the senses, moon thirst of Leng

Realising the limitations of the human form, the mind needs a new form in which to harness experience. For lack of such a possibility, it demarcates the boundaries of madness and reason within the existing psychological structures. This separation facilitates the reception of new experiences from a different perspective, in an attempt to re-humanise, to find new values in humanity, and to negotiate a new way of being. Living in a temporary form among others and approaching the chaotic madness and the epiphany of the numinous, one is forced to wear the masks of normality around others, and with rare obsession in one's eyes, one must contain them or be contained. One understands that what lies beyond the human, the terra incognita inside, for this reason outside, is much more dangerous than the erroneous projections that maintain the image of reality. This experience brings to the fore the realisation that man is only a measure of himself, and without this point of reference, he freezes in terror or awe. Removed from the perspective of the world to which one has assigned meaning, one stands naked. From this perspective, life appears as a mechanistic orgy of bodies and delusions of those who hunger for them. Existence begins by applying phenomenal illusions to ma'atic depth, shifting perception from introjection/projection to reflection, action and contemplation. Imbuing with deeper essences is the only self-preserving gesture that is both desperate and has any meaning at all.

All abandoned in a flash of the birth of the universe. It is the formula of a mind that has witnessed divine chaos, destructive and empty, yet regenerated through co-dependent constellations of events as they interweave in the matrices of experience in creation. Transcending these limits of human experience, it wears the masks during transformations to the rhythm of life and the currents of forms and essences that have nothing in common with the human world. For neither human nor human-like dimensions can see through them. It is easy to retreat into the normal human drowsiness before the horror, and many help to forget such a dawn of consciousness, but after hundreds of years man will no longer exist. Humanity will not survive in a conservative sense. The transformation of form, matter and energy is a process that takes place without the participation of humanity and yet influences it to various states that individual or group consciousness allows. What is perceived as unnatural for man in his present state works against a harmonious development, which is in harmony with humanity and follows friendlier ways. Of course, only if we believe that such ways actually exist.

Song of my soul, my voice is dead;
Die thou, unsung, as tears unshed Shall dry and die in Lost Carcosa

> — Chambert, Rober W. Song of Cassilda in The Yellow King, Act I, Scene II (Harper and Brothers: New York, London: 1902), p. 3

The ecstasy of mutation in various forms, made possible by forces that renegotiate biological living matter, is experienced during psionic surgery on a living organism beyond the human senses but reflected in the senses. The evolutionary atavisms with a constant a-human supersensory paralysing spasm that takes us to the limits of sensory experience. When we focus on excavating the biological foundations of the animal psyche by dissecting our psyche into neural-conscious circuits, our being appears as a terror of the incest of forms. A dissected human being cannot recognise his wholeness and falls into chthonic undercurrents, into more dangerous forces of strange, diversifying, mutating life forms. It is as if a part of the process, detached from the whole, is worshipped for itself, emphasising the separation and giving importance to a part of the machine as a whole. The deep ecstasy of bioforms, the transformations and mutations, the procreations that are beyond human experience, confound the entire framework upon which man was built.

The combination of a powerful ecstasy with the awe of the transformation of the body reflects evolutionary forces that precede the entire history of humanity. These forces are embodied in the acolyte's consciousness as processes of reproduction, diversification, and mutation through countless life forms. In the drastic experience of the supersensory sexuality of the oceanic primordial lusts accelerated and catalysed by the deities, the harbingers of these currents ushering in this state are precisely the re-enactment or reverse-engineering of the womb-mind into the complex oceanic forces.

The dimensions of ecstasy are the limit of human senses and they are reoriented to something beyond the senses — the particle beyond the animal chthonic limits that destructively exploit all sensory-affective states. Remnants of organic larval memory or evolutionary memory, flowing through the primordial currents of the waves of life, locking themselves into their part for a while. All this reminds us that the greater can radiate through the lesser, but never the other way around. These forces operate in ancient currents, dreaming themselves into existence, taking newer and newer forms as bodies, and seeking portals to concentrate them in local areas. It may happen that vicarious human realities, acting on humans or from humans to a human, are blind to the existence of these powerful currents of the wyrd.

However, this does not preclude their exposure to their workings. If there is a limit to the refinement of the senses, and the limit is the ecstasy of the uncanny, then the other way is that of the refinement of the particles of the self on the tree of life. If we consider man as a portal through which focused currents can manifest, the medium of higher principles projects and sublimates ideas approaching the human realm according to its lineage. Man was not created to dismantle his own evolutionary archaic mind, it is a path of confusion and madness to detach from his nature, it is one of many paths that some choose to pursue and it is sometimes interesting to experience it first hand to know that this path was not intended for us, least of all do we want to dismantle ourselves in a self-destructive madness. They too may experience waves of life, but they do not dissect them into purely chtonic factors, they live, reproduce, die in a succession of lives with a quality different from that of the strange dimensions.

Adding an aesthetic sense of sophistication to the process that hovers between the values of beauty and the terror of the unknown, we must decide if the work is purposeful. It is always a matter of negating the human and merging with currents that move away from human expression and consume its essence. In the beyond there are no values, no convictions, no humanity, no aesthetics, but an expression of being that is usually a force of derangement, a psychic orgy. They all deny the human and embrace it at the cost of robbing it of its character and nature, so it is important to understand this.

> "Nature in turn enters madness, and there, in an instant, but for an instant only, restores her omnipotence (...) the night of storm, of thunder and lightning, is a sufficient sign that Nature is lacerating herself, that she has reached the extreme point of her dissension, and that she is revealing in this golden flash a sovereignty(...) of a mad heart that has attained, in its solitude, the limits of the world that wounds it, that turns it against itself and abolishes it at the moment > when to have mastered it so well gives it the right to identify itself with that world (...)"[1]

Another note about the Elder Gods and the unity of life

Ultimately, psychonautics in the domains of Wyrd or Rokkr is a way to explore psychic echogenetic atavisms that predate humanity through a psychic reversal of nervous system development — that could possibly end in larval states, probably insanity, and preferably a realignment of our entire way of thinking about the world; Exploration is done either by tapping into magical currents that emphasise the archaic parts of our brain, the instinctual, psychic, ecstatic base, or by connecting the mind to the deep wyrd itself and seeing what happens — also by negotiating with certain entities that have access to these dimensional levels. Each phenomenon refracts into multiple realms with which it resonates to varying degrees. Just as a prism refracts light, everything in this universe resonates, I believe, as an interconnected image with varying degrees of operational, effective range. The moon, for example, as a physical rock, is also a lens point for ancient dimensions, it is also a gateway, and the moonlight is a carrier of portals, the mansions to further domains, just as the sun, an aphysical star, is also deified as a god or the eye of hyperhuman realities beyond physical realities and is a gateway in which the life of fire simmers. The water particle is a physical fluid, but also has the same nature and imprint as the ocean — and is thus a portal leading first to the aquatic animals and then to ancient portals associated with the chaos related to the idea of water, just as the air element leads to the reification of the idea of space. Life bends in a similar way, all life forms that existed on this planet have their potential in the graveyard of forms and in the deep mauve of shadow. The collective emanations of the chaopsychic diversified formulations of life with the protogenetic matrices expressing the biological component are like a dismantling of the psychic phenomena and the physiological makeup, a disassembling, a fragmenting — so it is a process of bending the psychic state, the mental, physiological lenses into split streams that appear to a conscious observer as crazy psychomorphoses and forms and monstrosities that are not impressive as long as one knows that all forms are born from nothing and are the same as phenomena, the other component is the adaptation and the elimination of fear from these experiments.

Starting from the Sun, the highest interdomain resonances in the Solar System, the Great Eye of the higher worlds, each planetary arrival, resonating and appearing together with deep stellar worlds and voids, participated in the resonant influx of primordial life when it appeared on Earth, and later influenced it in an uncanny way; and with each new transmutation of life, which reproduced and possessed its own occult hidden apparatuses and aggregates, it imprinted itself on these primordial worlds. It is not certain what stellar worlds connect planetary systems, but they are embedded in a larger fabric of interstellar resonances, and depending on the depth of vision or penetration of consciousness, we can negotiate keys and entrances to the dark universe as well as complex photic tunnels. The human species came on the scene as an extremely recent evolution and then underwent transformations, mutations, etc. when various star worlds had access to the small planet and could participate in the process of genome adaptation on a tele-noetic (spaceless) scale. After the establishment of animism and totemism, the cults of the Great Mother, lunar, chthonic cults and solar cults, astralistic religions emerged. In the advanced religious development, people knew that the deities were alien to them, belonging to a higher race, just as they did not understand the strange natural phenomena, so they represented them as anthropomorphs, so that these strange forces could wear a „human mask" and thus became bionic representations (e.g. statues), focal points of the ancient deep. Indeed, some of these forces that wore these masks, and lesser aspects of their originality, became humans, the first generations of deities of the human species or young intelligences. The pantheons of humans and our spirits, assigned to particular orders, realities, and dimensions, were developed and triggered both from above, as messages to us, and from below, from humans to demigods who assisted in the evolutions;

After some experiences, if someone asks me what beauty is, it is the movement of formless events that dance to become a universe that falls from essence to form — the motif of finding oneself eternally that contains the theatre so that a universe can be that finds its meaning in a question that hovers voicelessly in its existence, asking for a solution. It is a moment of absence between the idea and its naming that is held — it ceases to be. It is a silent dance on the tip of the sword that cuts through the womb of chaos. Thus is born another world system that repeats the game, in a terrible, tortured cry that seeks to prevent the dispersion of the numinous. It experiences aeons of glory and days of doom, maintained in their splendid splendour and the return of sorrow, ineffective, with a never-ending curse of destinies. Even these, governed by the imperative of necessity, observe how the tearing away from perfection is forever associated with tears of separation. The forces that elevate not one but many noble souls tear them apart in agony and whisper with tearless gaze. Alas, they reflect regret beyond words, are forever humbled and humiliated, pitying all their manifestations, experiencing through all beings and pleading, „Never again…no more…"

Palin Hikousi: Dialogues

The Meeting

Fuomo: Now that we have gathered in this night hour and put our souls together, I would like to know about the concept that you, Holy Guardian Angel, have awakened in me. Like a seed ready to grow, I am ready to receive your wisdom. When it comes to the business of understanding, I do not want to be led astray, either for lack of wisdom, proportion, beauty and harmony, or for lack of humanity, direction and clarity. Let us think about the beneficent service of tranquility that connects the point and the center, spiraling and encompassing the whole. This sacred bond that dissolves in the symphony of threads that unceasingly wind around and separate from each other. They are like knots that become denser and denser, obvious and subtle, like harmonic strings that barely resemble the things they concern. When we look passionately at these mundane flashes of events and threads that we perceive. Moreover, arrange them according to our sense, our ethos, our substance, our education, our observation, our mixing, whenever possible. A perceived harmony of the world is one thing, relating it to life and taking that harmony into oneself and blossoming like a lotus flower is another. The reason I have called you, Peripsol, is that I wish to clarify and further explain all the things that concern me, so that I can quench my thirst for knowledge. I ask you, who know the movements of the stars and the divine observations, that you may enlighten me in all these things. Parmenides expressed on his divine nocturnal journey, mortals have only opinions about the gods. I want you to explain what contributes to the knowledge of the divine, even if it is through metaphors, because language is a finite and imperfect tool. So let this elevated opinion be most likely a right approach!

Peripsol: Verily, I speak only of ideas of which you are a hermetic interpreter, a hypophyte. Divine ideas that your mind, intellect and heart are capable of receiving by human standards. Instead of leaving a seal or imprint, I may just move the threads and tissues in your mind and feeling that you already possess. We can touch an ethos that can be raised to great nobility, divine, or great misery of a fallen company. Do not underestimate the storehouse of impressions, knowledge, senses and movements of imagination, inner vision, thought, reason, search for truth and beauty that you already possess. This is the treasury of your heart, mind and soul. You have a strong spirit that no one can rob you of, because it was forged through life and trials. And now – remember all the movements of your heroic life, if you do not want to be forgotten as a bitter miser!

Fuomo: I do not know whether my person is a sufficient interpreter and narrator both of you, Peripsol, and of the movements of the cosmos and its Symbolon and Sigillium. At least, I do not know if I am a skillful interpreter of myself. I do not know if I dare to interpret the ensouled stars, gods, angels and demons, the beasts of many worlds. I do not want to confuse them with my own movements of mind and heart. They are tainted with errors and biases that I try to attribute to the base and foolish corrupters of the mind and emotions and the petty projections of my point of view. It is a tremendously difficult task to uproot them, but I will persevere! Indeed, after so many years of dedication and commitment have fallen back into the blackness that I have necessarily mixed with your Mercurial teachings and messages, may I not dim the luminosity of this task. After all, it is the sphere of Mercury that is closest to the divine source from which you were born. So let me humbly and carefully approach these threads of my mortal mind to convey the brilliant perfection of the solar intellect as best I can. At the same time, I do not wish to confuse them with my own, for notwithstanding my faults and defects, my defilements and corruptions, I have been gifted as an Eleusinian mystic with the second sight of many worlds. When the veils of Hecate and Isis fell from my eyes by the grace of the goddesses, I witnessed beasts of day and night, myriads of worlds invisible to others, sorrowful dead who teach and instruct me like the closest friends and relatives. Whether my eyes are open to experience this sight or closed, I can see ethereal worlds. When I close my eyelids and gaze into our majestic star, into the great realm of phoenixes struggling in wild unison, I try to imagine that I am looking through divine gates, that there are the fields of spiritual gold, and that there shines Aion's magnificent, glorious, teletarchic divine fire. Nevertheless, what I see is a magnificent sun disk on great wings, entwined with sacred serpents and great fires resembling fiery wings, kissing me and wrapping their divine wings around me.

Peripsol: The sight returned to you, young dragon, is a revelation, but it is wrong to confuse it with the absolute truth. Phenomena are evident and worlds thrive, but if you confuse the appearances in autophany with the essences they are trying to convey to you, you will create mere conceptions. By acquiring endless concepts, you will worship a sign of an essence. Just like the people who see a hint of what you see and fall on their knees, thinking they have grasped the universe in their great delusion! They fall for abstracts which they project on the subject of their preference, their faith, their religion. Instead of seeing, they blind themselves to a greater way, instead of comprehending, they become slaves blinded in awe of things they have not even understood! The visions you see are a signpost, a sign, keep the hecatic and isiac-horic gift, but put the insight of revelation. Even a blind man senses the divine in a tear better than anything that meets the eye, if he does not see behind the blinds and veils of illusions and mirages. An insignificant sight which, when recognized for what it is, no longer bothers us.

Fuomo: But surely we have to rely on certainties, scientia, to build architectures of meanings, beliefs, sense in this whole spectacle! Otherwise, how should we live among other people? How should I relate to these visions, to this extended reality?

Peripsol: These are vehicles and autophanies, a form of self-manifestation of the whole for the particular vision, a stripped mask of divinity through which the intelligible soul of the world and of the powers belonging to it expresses itself. Without bringing the mind, the senses and the soul into mutual agreement, one moves in a dichotomy that produces an event in which the whole man affirms his personal subjective reality and projects it onto all that exists – quite erroneously. The divine activity expresses itself constantly in many faces, which are consistent with the associated essences, as long as it is sought in a way that is consistent with it. It does not contradict nature – for the observer it is present everywhere, for he or she has attuned to its revelation; for the profane it is nowhere to be found, for perception denies it. But without its permeation through everything, it would indeed be nowhere to be found, not even for the mystics whose minds have been initiated into a purified perception. The things you have mentioned are conducive or obstructive to realization. Barren beliefs bear no fruit, just as barren, repeated rituals without commitment, faith and sacralizing effect are mere gestures. A shaman without faith and without these empty gestures, but with a technique and a realization surpasses the barren believer of any faith who is entangled in the sound of his cathedral. Remember that a magician is merely a civilized shaman – the former is a masterful grammarian of the divinity of the world, the latter is like an idiotic scholar who intuits without understanding his works and in his obsessive and wild participation in the world performs miracles in an effective way. So remember that the civilized structure is like fine architecture to frozen music, but do not deny the drums and chants of a shaman. The wilderness is an expression of nature, through whose mastery your civilization became possible – who has primacy when civilization is ephemeral?

Fuomo: What is this whole of which you speak? Is it a composite, intertwined harmony of all souls and bodies striving for their psychedidactic refinement, individualized to varying degrees of perfection? Perhaps stout like a bow, but homogeneously clear, beautiful and of straight root like a tree or a thunderbolt and evident in its divinity? What a stark contrast to us, mortal men, who are seldom granted such perfection, and who meet the high spheres by reification, by inclusion of the metaphysics of ethos, of natures, of the character of the manifold heavens within. Our race nowadays seldom strives, in all the efforts of thought and feeling, in the proportion which lies within the co-dependent, co-dependent world, yet to look into metaphysical proportions of a sublime kind. Without striving for monoliths, but naturally incorporating these things into the dynamics of events and threads outside of us and within us. Is there a true way? I understand that nothing is lost in nature, and through a complex similia of different natures, inclinations, characters and aspirations of mortals, people bring them to worlds that echo with their inner grammar, inflection, inclination, logic and conviction.

Peripsol: The way of the realization is a way with many windings, the character sows destinies and determines the way. Inasmuch as the Sun is willed with the transcendent Divine and includes it along with infinite other animate worlds. To be like the Sun and the planetary spheres is to be human in a masterful combination of the greater squadrons that incline and ascend to the great quintessence. To follow it is to be a man of the way, to receive the radiance, to take it in, to live it out is to be a true man and woman. At first everything seems jumbled, chaotic movement, nature-like transformations. Then you slowly learn to climb the steps of divinity, to be godlike, to be divine, to discover the laws that govern the character and mysteries of nature, the planets and the stars. Then give yourself to the cohorts of spiritual intelligencers to combine their genius in an alchemical vial of your soul with a touch of your daimon! A lifelong task! Like the abysmal voids and the distant space and the stars, deep in their depth, idea and movement, still greater and more profound, the forces that act as eminences behind them. Proportion is a geometric order in which diversity expresses itself in perfection according to its nature, without losing its essence, but dissolving into equal and harmonious parts as a whole. This harmony of tension in interaction with the perfected proportion, against the disturbances and afflictions, this gigantomachy is a test in the formation of the character, nature, mind and soul. It resolves the opposites in a transcendent third interwoven between individuation, human nature and its divine refinements.

Fuomo: You free me from my ignorance! As for the gods, we may understand them as Proclus did, and our verified insight that they are like an ocean that sublimates its ideas into metamorphoses according to the ethos of forces and powers, merging their active idea with the subject of their intention in the world. In a way that it is written on a receiving impression that they transfer their idea and their essence just like you Peripsol right now, to me! So, can also a recognizing man in his actions contribute to the stream of the metamorphoses by presenting his ideas and magic actions, impressing the forces and contributing to the constantly changing world? Or he carries out the ideas of objective, passionate and unimpressive deities by simply climbing on their thrones and struggling like a catalyst of heaven? Thus the mutual impressions form the basis for the homoiosis Theio, which makes itself godlike, divine, perfected to Theion Ergon, the great work of the gods. For the world is alive and impressionable in many ways, receiving the signs of impressions and beings – impressed. Impression, then, is the concept of receiving and giving mutually intelligible signs, sigillia, essential movements that cause action and reaction on the part of the world and the world that performs its operations on us in an intricate network of keys, signs, both intellectual and affective.

Peripsol: The gods are not without individual qualities, but the higher you ascend, the greater the unison of their voice, because it is the law of the universe that expresses itself in its embodiment. This unison works continuously in the movement. To the extent that the simultaneous whirlwind of masks and forms arises and detaches itself from a whole to inspire and fulfill its mighty tasks, it is constantly and inseparably connected with the whole. Of a nature that transcends itself into its worlds, just as it individualizes itself in various currents that come from the En To Pan. They are like the concepts that evolve from the simplest ideas to the grandest universal ideas in a gradation determined by the comprehension of themselves. To a mortal the world is revealed, but he is a child of time with an abyss of the future before him and a gigantic past behind him. He discovers it at will; the world wants to be unveiled, but it needs an aspirant. A person who holds on to himself suffers damage because he absorbs the movements of the world with the wrong perception. When he liberates and detaches himself, no one can overpower him. Likewise, an idea that sings "I am I, I am the only reality" is more separated from the whole the more it grasps itself. It is still present in the whole, but is detached from it by a deception.

Fuomo: But what about the animal souls and the uncouth men, shall I suppose that – said before – in nature nothing is lost and thus a chain of being is preserved. For when we ask what justice is, should we egoistically assume equality, distributive justice, or something else? I see it in the circling galaxies – that is justice – the necessity of movement in laws. In terms of human affairs, I understand it in a primitive jurisprudence that two parties who have been disadvantaged or harmed by unfairness or injustice are restored to the position of subjective fairness by a law or a judge who can negotiate between their common sense, his wisdom, retribution to one party, fair punishment or restoration that is accepted and corrected. The best laws on earth were made by those who sought to understand cosmic harmony, and who sought to establish foundations for their people based on that roadmap, forming an institutional tradition. True power is based on justice, because it imitates the movement of the heavens and the laws of the deep, and tries to reconcile with natural law, while any false power or usurpation is based on injustice. Because of the emergence and change in the world of nature, that is, of human beings, reforms are necessary so as not to narrow the laws too much or set them too loosely so that they can be abused. Let me quote Ernst Junger: "All injustice appears as ugly because it contradicts everything down to the deepest of our atoms". There – justice as harmony is beauty. A very profound thought.

Peripsol: If the world is ensouled and divinity does not contradict nature, animals are also ensouled. Perhaps their souls act as a representative of their nature and inclination. We have watched you enter a zoo and, out of compassion for a captive lion and lioness, ensoul their souls with your magic! You have inspired an entire stable with your art, transforming the souls of horses into subtle Pegasus. When you work as a stable boy, will you ask questions that you can answer yourself to satisfy your egoism? Qui Leo iacet, qui Lea iacet, as the ancient Mithraic tomb says! As for justice, the concept of justice you spoke of is not the man-made idea of justice that rules the world. Imagine the chaos it would create for the stars if humans began to establish, reform and create new laws for the affairs of the cosmos. It would be torn apart by strife and disorder! But do not let this put you off, for quite honestly, a person who cries out to the starry heavens in great sorrow and pain causes much turmoil in the souls of many people, and as far as it is possible, he is wisely helped and assisted by a cohort of spiritual beings who are ready for such help. In a world of diversity, the law of conservation forbids omnipotence, and disproportionality in science and intellect leads to the idea of helpless suffering. By this I mean that some are helped and lack the attention to notice, others see and recognize, but hypertrophize the act; In the subject's relation to greatness, the act dissolves with the thread it may follow in terms of necessity and need. Do not ask the star to stop shining, but adopt its characteristics to be star-like in relation to what you are! This does not mean that we are just a pest, to quote Samuel Beckett, because the greatness of one's being can shine through and through like a star, or on the contrary, is the pettiness of a mortal worse or better than that of a grass in a meadow? Fools have their rights, do not behave like a fool when you are appreciated for your wisdom!

Love Lost

Fuomo: Your presence, Peripsol, reinforces my feeling and thinking in the movements of Providence. I am here to tell you that I am suffering from a terrible affliction that my memories conjure up. Is it the image of a loved one that we conjure up that is fading in our memory? Alive in a conceit through the memory of a deep ideal feeling. It is so pathetically beautiful and outshines reality that we reach for this terrible imagination like a drowning man for a knife. For these are movements of the soul, mind, heart, and spirit equal to Diotima's triad of Eros, Philia, and Agape. Even as the most loathsome of men, even if barely capable of unconditional love – this idea that elevates the remnants of our ancient nobility cast down into self-loathing. We raise our beloved in the intoxication of the stars. We lose her to treacherous fates and the avarice of envy of the jealous, the unloving, the vicious, the ugly, the malignant. Is it ever healing, the longing itself? We had to move it to the starry worlds. We had to perpetuate the remains of love in transcendent worlds. Dealing with a loss on earth in a titanic movement of worship of the subject of love. We place it in the robes of the Magna Mater as the sacred fetish of the universe. It is only a matter of preserving this golden thread between the movements of the stars in the Divine, even if it is in the distance. To let go of it! Letting go of them! This moment shines like a sacred face through the night vaults, immortalized in the gaze of the divine eye. We lose the essence, the image we loved. It constantly transforms into surrogates, constantly moves and falls into a metamorphic falseness. And all this with ever new likenesses that are only illusions! We scream inwardly, "Not this, not that, not their spirit, not any other!". Who has tasted of the springs of Cytherea, who inconsolably loses the living idea of an affect rediscovered in the aphrodisiac idea, is inwardly torn and howls! I must confess, it turns into miserable love-hate. In cold blade of my past cruelties they are truly poisonously refined to tear apart what ruined us! Is it true that it is not the mere sameness of base humanity, but the loss of the hallowed, blessed and sacred epithalamium that makes us long for the phantoms. They are never returned to us in flesh and blood! So deeply rooted in the thrones of our sorrows that here – longing, there – who knows what mirage we will find? A deadly trap indeed – an infinity of shadows and "as if" meetings, endlessly searching the shadows for chalices of long lost loves that haunt us. We no longer share this human thread that we experience only in moments. We cast it into the dust of our graves without repeating the moments we relive in the shadow of the titanic Eros. He is burned into our souls as a fearsome seal, at least in vanishing memories. We seek similar affairs, imitating the affections of others' eyes with resentment! What a curse, what a horror is this affliction that only takes between relief, happiness and suffering. It steals and robs and wraps us in its shadow, like the death robe of darkness itself!

Peripsol: From joy to suffering, from suffering to joy – this is the fate of a passionate, immoderate man. Love follows humanity and is preserved by moderation. It should be governed by wisdom, maturity and insight. Alone, without the support of sacrifice, it becomes war, cannibalism, perversion, slaughter, suicide! I have observed your travails, you have been gentlemanly in your support of them. Malicious intrigues took them away from you, and now you live as strangers to oblivion. Sew up your torn hearts, find no rest in longing and feelings! Do not chase the past in vain, but let your black pyramids crumble under the hammers of knowledge! In heavy power you will fall, be a wise fool of fate! Break, shatter the longing that you claim to steal the world from your embrace. Find your happiness as it should be. Let her star shine for all, not just for you! Her face immortalized devotion and pain, a mutual sacrifice at the altars of Kybele – in the distance. Rejoice in the rise of her spirit and find your wholeness again. For in harmonious wholeness lies holiness and continue to shape your destinies as far as you can! A spirit liberated for others, a great and noble thing. May it guide the others, for through this purification and rectification it is perfect in the spheres and joins the procession of the gods. The spirit of this girl you knew has found its perfection far from earthly affairs. She is no longer her agitated narcotic mind and body, do not look for her there! Her mortal self lives on like you, with her feelings and thoughts, her sufferings and joys. Leave it now, dance with all of us among the stars. You are already one of us, do not be blinded by past mirages and pastimes. Remember that those who have appropriated their love have always experienced the great suffering of loss. With imper-manence, forgetfulness or death – how could they gain anything back? So nothing brings more joy to the heart of the Mother of Stars than the kisses you place on her magnificent robe. With each kiss a rose blossoms and a spirit breaks free. Go now, self-deceiver, you have saved yourself from a terrible death!

Bad Habits

Fuomo: When a man freezes in a negative state, arrested in an excess of persistent, continuous harmful experiences, he develops mental habits that would not otherwise exist in his mind, and he soon finds himself trapped in, say, hatred or some harmful suffering that puts him at the mercy of those demons of the mind who play with their victim, riding him like a wild, wounded stallion, pulling the strings of the afflicted mind at will. For example, if he is naturally passionate, fierce, or choleric, feelings of resentment and bitterness over injustice may be discharged into rage under the blows of negative, unwanted experiences. Initially, if the experience is temporary, he may seem innocent and get angry like a child, clenching his fists, hitting someone, or shouting angry words in the air. Over time, if left unchecked, a simpleton's anger develops and frustrated, dismissive attitudes may result. Then, if his nature is noble, a holy anger may find expression, demanding compensation, correction and retribution. If this is further provoked, either murderous attitudes, sadistic tendencies develop, while the passions cool down, malice, spitefulness and a perverse cold virtuousness becomes a part of that person. Whether sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric or melancholic, in a mixture of time, circumstances and nature, each virtue and vice has a different expression and speaks a different language to the observer. Thus a saturnine nature, wounded in its pride and elevation, a humiliated nobility, is transformed from a wounded, cunning fox into a wicked, ugly, cruel wolf, driven to its last means of defense and loyal to all the wretched things it previously loathed and spat upon. He is no longer a companion of the star of Providence and the divine movements! Reverse all the terrible forms of cruelty, suffering and vices that befall such a person! In the end, a person who was initially noble, strong and innocent, collapses into irreversible damage and becomes the very same devil who pursued him. Every time this threshold of tolerance for good and evil – beyond good and evil, because without conscience, but with consequence or indignation and arrogance – is set higher, it is even more difficult to return to the original position from which one entered the scene. In the end, it is hardly possible without great effort to balance between the dualities and to find a middle way, which contains a self-created order, which is torn by both sides – only for the sake of reason! This order is an attempt of rehumanization for someone who has already become a beast – it is the ethos of a psychopath, the high morality of a sociopath, the virtue of a downed, beaten hyena – desperately clinging to the remnants of humanity! When stifled and silenced, vice often morphs into a refined indifference bordering on malice, a whispered absolute evil, an indifferent monster that cannot be captured by Manichean dichotomies. It makes its own rules – terrifying to man, equally attractive to the spineless, and unstable to its charismatic yet Mephistophelian persuasion. So how can Peripsol, my angel, cut away all these evils in one masterful cut, using the sword of Manjusri to separate the rotten flesh from the healthy bones? How to erase deep-rooted anguish and fill the wells of pain with tranquility and harmonious power, with perseverance in inner truth amidst a transparent, splendid composition, an arrangement that is repaired and put back on track, unlike a broken company?

Peripsol: Listen, Ysengrimus, make an effort to remember the golden ethos that once guided you. You are addicted to oblivion that cannot consolidate all the wisdom, resolutions and experiences you have accumulated, this is a curse of the Lethe. You are addicted to forgetting ceremonies and magical acts, meditation and studies, that is the curse of inhibitions. They are prone to endless debates and arguments about abstracts and conceptualizations, that is the curse of disputants. They indulge in gestures and empty words instead of meaningful, determined actions full of essential insight, this is the curse of undisciplined demotivation and laziness. You have given yourself over so much to idealized non-virtue that you have forgotten what you meant by the word virtues in the past, you have defined them so much that you lacked the breath to embody and follow those muses, you have given yourself over to the curse of ill-will. Appease the gods, perform devotional and apotropaic rituals and ask to continue your path, fortify your works like a citadel impenetrable to the darkeners and corrupters of greater ways, surrender yourself in due time and hour to the guidance and inspiration of the intelligencers and gods, call upon them and receive from them, perpetuate your golden works, never forsake them, for they fall into ruin and desolation unless you pay tribute and attention to them! Preserve your mind and will in divinity, guarding the gates of the senses and spirit always from the curses of the conjurers of illusions, apparitions, distortions and fraudulent acts against your intellect and thoughts. Strengthen your heart to damascus steel of compassion, precision and firmness, thus prepared and armed direct the unhindered, unpredictable movements of the mind to the high things you already know, as you guard your loved one, as you guard your body in sleep at night vigil, so strive to revere and protect in all sincerity the strong resolutions and vigilance over yourself as if you were your own child. I swear by my ethos and yours to guide you in what I can accomplish. But do not lightly defend yourself against the harmful things that torment and bite your mind, do not fight them savagely like an attacking viper, or you will reinforce the dualities that like a madman are caught more and more in a web of fatal swinging back and forth. Use your will and your intellect to bring them firmly into a unity and thus dissolve them and from there incline to the intersection of the human and the divine. Temperance and wisdom dissolve both, to each his own, according to need and antidote, what is poison to one is a remedy to another. Hold the scythe to sow, grow and reap, wield the whip to govern yourself and rule yourself with a higher nature, raise the Herculean club to remember it all, for heroes are those who recall all the threads of their lives in their entirety and, moreover, connect them in an epithalamium with the stars and the heavens, recalling their memories posthumously across all knowledge through all worlds against the flow of forgetfulness. In the end, point your caducian staff to the sky and may the ancient serpents be feathered and winged!

The Alchymical Mind

Fuomo: In a world of order and diversity, it is common that we perceive chaos in the complexity of this diversity, which is completely confused by it. Fragments of this world taken out of context harass our perception and our mind. Changing structures in dimensions of variable information and energy speeds, constantly branching contents. It seems to be a chaosmos rather than a cosmos. Let us imagine an experienced professor trying to explain his knowledge to a new student. Bombarding him with his expertise in a few short sentences, experiences and shortcuts will leave the student with the impression that the professor is crazy or at best incompetent! An expert knows how to express his knowledge in simple views that are convenient and useful to the layman and explain them in detail when necessary. The old adage of Cato the Elder in his rhetorical treatise is, "Seize the subject and the words will follow." I would add, "Seize the subject and the words will sufficiently explain it to both the layman and the expert." If there is no bond, no structure, no pseudo-logical continuity, our inner world collapses into disorder. By this I mean illogical subjects in the sense that there is no continuity between the subjects of perception and the archetype, the archetype and the concept, the concept and the Platonic idea. What is illogical is a mere perception, a cognitive bias without conventional (illusory) reality and without deep objective world. It is anti-logical or a-logical because it disturbs the grammar and content of the universe. I know about the great love of people for self-deception, which is never subjected to a painful process of verification. I know about the maintenance of the self-image in order to preserve the continuity of identity. Alas! People are merely cocoons of life, surrounded by a vast, vast territory of the unknown. They are secure only by what they know and have mastered, and perception provides them with this safety net. One might say that hominids' primal fear drives their safety constructs and makes them forget the extent of the unknown. Everyday common reference points displace terror and awe, exclaiming, "There is nothing else." This serves a function for social cohesion; only the pioneers are made to wonder. The limits of understanding are the limits of the world. The limit of experience is the limit of knowledge of what is possible. I myself am often a victim of this self-absorption. Coming to knowledge is much more difficult, counterintuitive, uncertain. Peripsol, how can you use philosophical tools to draw order from apparent chaos in a grand synthesis? My desire is to resolve the situations that often lead to confusion, madness, paranoia, despair and depression. How to defeat demotivation and madness? How to prevent the de-metallization of our thoughts, mind and soul and straighten the paths of understanding?

Peripsol: It is an inner composition that orders the world. It is the great inner silence that comprehends it. It is the insight that comprehends it. It is the great detachment that grasps it. It is the great spirit that embraces her. It is the great idea that delimits it, it is the inner truth that follows it. People may be confused when they encounter the vastness of the world, without tools to order it. They prefer to follow small paths that run toward single destinations, and are blind to everything else. This makes them effective on their own worldly path, but it does not make them philosophers or sages. In an indivisible whole, we merely connect categories of the world to our inner millieu through a series of perceptions. These categories form beliefs, sense and thought entities that are symbolically organized and declared true in various reified formulas, developed life themes, if you will. Some make their inner worlds into prisons, others into magnificent gardens. Rare individuals claim the whole world for themselves, like horsemen riding free and at full gallop. Some of these themes and loci (places) are mythopoetic, like the myths we live by. Some are formal, like our approach to practical things; some are scientific, like our approach to what we know. Some are artistic, like esthetic approaches. Some are oneiric, like our hidden and open dreams, some are more concrete, like the everyday and necessary things of life. The act of binding is the way we formulate this indivisible whole, similar to the formula of "Solve" and "Coagula" – binding and letting go! The art lies in the ability to find and measure the right proportion. Like a skilled architect selecting and combining possible systems from the unknown and the known. Then measure them against a set of coordinates so they are consistently predictable. It pays to work toward a specific goal and apply it with success. Before putting things into action, we need to draw up some plans. Finely drawn plans are contingent yet continuous. The finer an economy of mind and spirit is, the greater the dew we gather from its workings. Try to find a share that corresponds to what you already have: Knowledge, skills and resources. Share the indivisible whole in accordance with your inner laws. What is shared and what is indivisible should be connected by approximate similarities. As in sympathetic magic, may it be reunited by appearances. Do not confuse a perceived similarity with sympathy. True keys of mutual sympathy are the syntheses between a general idea and its emerging descendant. The sympathy of synthesis is found in the inductive-deductive feedback between a token, a type, and an archetype, not by a perceived similarity, but a true one. The search for this true connection is the appropriation of the alchymic laws. A logical and sounding subject is truly understood at the point of epithalamium. The former is done by imitating the powers of the revealed ideas of the universes, the latter by essential recognition. When we have found them, we proceed unthinkingly and apply them in the direction of work and harmony. The latter key is nothing but a concordant synthesis between a scaled portion and a greater portion. It achieves an effect by bridging them through interconnected symbols and intellects, making them into a metaphysical whole. In the final stage, they are integrated and interpreted into beauty, truth, freedom, justice, happiness, Eros, etc., i.e., all the ideas we can call civilized and human. In essence, we measure the universe through the means of men and women, anthropocentrically. Since we have limited instruments and lenses, the scales and signs point back at us. The world is not anthropocentric, although this is the best tool we have in terms of our being and perspective! Be careful here, because many have misunderstood this idea. They have blown it up and made a human, mortal animal the focus, keep your perspective. Every time you look at another's life, think about it – how their life expresses that measure and what it brings to the world. Binding and releasing a proportion as an inter-coordinated, consistent and harmonious model is a matter of potentiality, movement, tension of forces and working toward resolution. There may be as many proportions and as many divisions within the indivisible whole as there are categories, as many as lights and flashes illuminating the Platonic cave from without. Turn around to see them! Crawl out to experience them. Similarly, we take up the efforts of the intellect and treat the alchemical mind as the domain of the macrocosm. We move in a system of coordinates and search for relational proportions – it is a goal of the intellect to fill it with beautiful ideas, which are "Platonic ideas" in hypostasis. True forces translated, transposed and interpreted in the worlds of intellect and feeling. As if two trees would grow eternally, one with roots in the abyss, the other with roots in the heavenly vaults, and yet at the base it is the same root! Only by interpreting the meeting point can you make progress and move into high octaves in your lifetime and posthumously. Work through your contribution by rearranging the discovered and revealed ideas in the microcosm through intellection, gymnosophy and ceremonies. Offer your work to the world and the metaphysical forces – they appear as a distant echo of our worlds, just as we are but an echo of their power. Truly, in high theurgic Neoplatonism, the Iyns, the divine ideas, rush through the cosmos as magical seals and keys. Forces, powers, astralistic currents flowing through a universal expression in the manifold ethos of the deep laws. Resolute and a-deteministic in pursuit of unified will, ingenious vision, responsible freedom. They weave destiny, chance, luck, the subjects of destiny, inspired choice.

Vir Unus

Fuomo: History has produced many religions, many mystical ways, many magical traditions. They branched out, evolved, died out, flourished, expanded, declined, thrived in the logos of the world. Is understanding the way they extract views, traditions, stories, myths, techniques and symbols from the metaphysical identical to mastering a complicated mechanism of truth? Or is it understanding how a clock works without the ability to build one? Oh great Nalanda, Alexandria, Athens, Memphis, Thebes, Heliopolis, Babylon, where are your sacred arts? Was there a trivial aspiration? A superstructure of meaning, despite his wishful thinking? Is there something hidden in the Egyptian mysteries, or is it all just primitive striving. Perhaps there are hidden patterns that throw away all the debris of the centuries and pull out the golden method as if it were ripped out of context, a mystical tool? How did the created categories pack the cosmic and earthly universals into separate philosophical and religious schools? Universalism is biased and fanatical, relativity flattens, discernment is of great value. Is it that the world is based on a single, interpretable force that is always hidden from mortal eyes? Perhaps it is a multitude of different forces anchored in laws, some more or less erroneous or firmly and correctly trying to grasp? As if each one of them had a different scale. Coordinates shaped by culture that drew maps of the world. Some of these scales overlapped, others were more advantageous. Some captured the essence of an insight, depicting true phenomena in their own way. Were others completely regressive or even completely without foundation? I postulate the following interpretation: To transfer the observable sky to the earth is the task of a magician. His discoveries and experiences, his knowledge and his hypothetical interpretations, the point where the imagination meets the true representations, is his sense, his religion, his faith. What he operationally incorporates into himself is his art and craft. The way we form, mix and blend all the natures, mystic directions and sacred worlds in the still of our self is our alchemy. In what proportions they flourish within us, whether they overwhelm or strengthen us, is the definition of the Vir Unus, the perfected man, the perfected woman, "Ecce Homo!" We do not thrive in a vacuum, and every good map needs some signposts.

Peripsol: We do not live in the void and every good map requires some deviant signs. Every good map makes you a guide in the vastness of possibilities with the ability of experience, action and execution knowledge. If you do not know the magical and mystical ways, you will consider them a mere excursion into human fantasies and not a living experience that contributes to salvation. You can discard and ignore them as you go about your life. You can dismiss these paths as peak experiences, psychosomatic twitches of feigned meaning, and compensation for a primal fear interpreted through fantasy. The Pythagorean choices and paths are in stark contrast to the popular references to reality, not many follow them. But if you decide to follow the path, you should first be a cartographer of mythopoeia, myth, memetics, and the history of ideas. Amateurish approaches lead to confusion, chaos, and frustration. It is like letting a mad monkey into a library to produce miraculous effects. When we have some intellectual humility and are aware of the extent of our own ignorance, any knowledge or skill seems at first an unreachable mountain. Knowledge and structure equip us with maps and order. Be on your guard, charlatans like to serve up seductive material with their speeches and books to prove the veracity of their nonsense, but if you have a shred of sense, you can easily dismiss them. Most occult writings are gibberish anyway; academics rarely use their style for such ventures. Charlatans are also scarecrows for the skeptics, the rationalists and realists, they completely refute our high art in the eyes of the latter. It is a lonely path. Do not try to find understanding outside yourself, but exchange ideas with responsible, autonomous and independent individuals who see value in it. Avoid self-important, sectarian groupings; they are useless and do no good. The ability of discernment enables you to filter out valuable material from garbage, to find truly valuable substance, to filter out useful patterns from any source, or to discard garbage. The question of utility matters: is a pattern useful given my workshop and tools, is it applicable to my art, can I turn this knowledge into a tool? How do my art, my tools, my performance interact with subtle worlds? What kind of person am I? At every step along the magical path, point your finger at yourself and question yourself. Otherwise, you will lose your balance and condemn yourself to stupidity, delusion, or become an insufferable, arrogant bully. Every gnosis is personal and can be false until it can be tested and repeated by someone else. It can be true if it is not repeatable, as well as random events, but do not try to convince someone of miracles if you have conjured one, unless you want to compromise your art and become a laughing stock. Psychagogy is not about persuasion, but about personal, responsible, individual performance. Your audience – if any – are the spirits, demons, dead, gods, weirdos from many worlds, this is your theater, this is your scene. You must convince the other world of your influence, not the mortal one. If you lose that focus, you will succumb to idiocy.

Fuomo: My angel, explain to me why I think you are an angel and not my imagination, an inner voice or a delusion, a hallucination, a self-made inspiration? Why do I consider my human body to be a temporary, transient, living form in which my dust will rest in its grave after my earthly destiny is completed. Why this body of a newborn, into which I was thrown with the morning Eosian light, born of a mortal woman? Journeying through transmigration and metempsychosis, a solar dragon in spirit, a mortal man in form. How is it that my spirit, which crawled from the transcendent aions through the sun to earth, is so helpless and powerless in human form? Why do I possess only what the human senses and mind have to offer, except for the thread that connects me to heaven through the law of memory? Laurel wreaths at my temples, perhaps another beast of the sun god? To pay imperial honors to a beggar and unfortunate. Qualities I tried and failed to internalize. My being and constitution were shattered and defiled by enemies, virtues bestowed upon me by greater divine beings were corroded. Once my relatives in China wore sacred cloths. They were dragon scholars and rulers, sons of heaven. They were great in Akkad, Babylon, Assyria, wore the Ophite insignia of Egypt, Persia, the wreaths of the Hellenes and Rome. To be finally ruined by the enemies of the donors of immortality, to be called the enemy of some strange Levantine faiths! Follower of that crucified devil and of a tribal god who had neither divine lineage nor inheritance, a liar whom any noble scoundrel would disparage in every way. Being a victim of centuries-old lies in the modern era of delusion. To be a plaything of power hungry deluded swine dreaming their way to heaven. To be a victim of politics and religion. After destroying heroes, masters, mistresses, mysteries and initiations, they proceeded to sabotage human souls. They forbid the spirits to ascend and promise lies instead! How is it that I was so resistant to the lies and slanders that the earth has accumulated against our serpent kin? How is it that I do not fall into the error of a blind religion, nor do I let the chains lead me into the error of complacency. An apophatic certainty with restraint, confidence and cooperation in freedom, nobility, beauty, love, truth, harmony! These ideas are dissolved in their excellence by the sentient intellect. They transform the animal mind into a divine animal and write the divine in itself? Bent only in exile, ennobled under the banners of dragons. Is it easy to call your magnificent anatomy an apparition? Do I imagine your wings, your presence and essence, your intelligence? Do I sense your independence, your self-determined responsibility in a larger order embedded in a sacred symbol. Is it not a boast to give you a secret name? What reason leads me to do this, if not to reflect on your existence, to experience your rapture and your idea? Obviously, your terror, awe, glory and beauty are reflected in my eyes. I reflect your existence as far as I am able, as a mortal, as far as my mind and feeling allow. More – I do not know what is more! Unless I acquire your living expression and perspective, disincarnate again as a young god. True, malicious natures would like to dispossess you, my friend, because you remain unconquered. My spirit is invincible and always stronger, hunted by enemies on earth who strengthen my will and command! I would rather learn your wisdom and make myself like the liberated gods! Is it wrong to rise above this mortal scene? Is it arrogant to wish to become once more as splendid as the immortals? Why crawl in the mud of the earth in endless cycles of pain, suffering and bitterness? Why kneel in the lies of the slaves' mud? Is it wrong to return to the gods as God, as the ancients believed in their epiphanies and apocalypses, in their epithomizing, heroizing? Why, after having explored the abysses of one's own failure and the extent of a great but failed life, should one seek undertakings with meaning and purpose?

Peripsol: A psychomagic setting operates within a mental continuum of the world soul. The mutual relation of magnitude and force between the individual and the sphere of work is the effectiveness of change. In every organism there are already occult qualities which, if properly used, trained and expanded, make possible the unimaginable. Depending on chance and skill, the exponent is proportional to the mastered potential associated with the finite possible. These abilities dovetail with the deep world in varying degrees, extents, influences and reaches. In human terms, these laws are organic rather than mechanical, which is why they are so difficult to master. Qualities and noetic formations are higher level languages. Formations of superstructures of ideas, beliefs, techniques are catalysts of the above scenery. I hope your questions have been answered. If the great order of the universe is the breadth of Hermetic teaching, what you perceive as unknown appears as chaos. Remember that these are chaotic and destructive forces for human beings, and that another order of Hermeticism is suitable for your purposes. The more you can tear out of this chaos, the more order you should master and create from it. In fact, this still lies in the great vision of ornamentation. That, promoted by magical, cognitive, emotional, deeply felt resolutions, attitudes. Moreover, by decisions, operations that chance and the fate of the lady allow. What may happen between the individual, his will and imagination and the world? Are there some true, sacred ways? Or is every honest, true way sacred, but sees the multiple currents of forces and powers? When an individual matures in the transformation of the symbols, logos, established images and beliefs around him, his psychic attitude and occult organs reach the goal. Seize your own powers, your nature, focus on it, the successes will follow. The stories and myths you tell yourself may be true or false, but as long as they take you from one place to another, they are of great importance. This is a world of dreamlike illusions that are reified. This is a world of impermanence that shows permanence as attachment. This is a world of wholeness where clinging to oneself blinds the goal. If we find a way, we should do away with the reified, pseudo-permanent and detach ourselves from introspection. When we consider illusions as property, including abstracts and conceptualizations, they enslave us and lead us astray.

Fuomo: Is that what eludes us when we become oblivious or threatened, intimidated, terrorized by things greater than our mortal being. We ourselves have become evasive and have forgotten our art.

Peripsol: There a tear has captured a longing, in the breath on the waves of the stars… So you are remembered.

On Objective Divine

Fuomo: I have suffered well for years. I can not remember all the subjective nightmares that have appeared objectively in the reality of my mind. I have seen things that would make others tremble. My mind, my character, my being, my feelings were brutally destroyed. My soul was obliterated in obsidian black. All the cruelties that happened to me would not make anyone end their life. Statistically, I should survive a month, but I survived a handful of years and am still alive. Throughout the years my memory has served me well and nourished me, oh, I salute you, great Mnemosyne! But the horrors of the past are but a semblance, for they are but images. They no longer evoke the physical and mental anguish, the fears, the dread, and the obsessive madness that they once did. They do not evoke the slightest emotion in my jaded mind. If they pursued me with all their might, how would I behave in this endless hell? I have adapted myself to defiance in order to climb with dignity a new threshold to a human being. That is, to an extent possible for a nightmare. I am aware that there are others who share a similar story, scarred for life, but they do not speak the grotesque, horrific scenery. Unmentioned, unseen and unlived by others. Struggle for survival among the inexperienced – a safe haven of ignorance, of non-exposure. Those who are not forced to survive move in ignorance among the shadows and demons. Rarely do they even awaken their interest. Those who live their lives in harmony with what they can, with what they know. I do not ascribe any special importance to myself, Peripsol, apart from a collection of unfortunate interacting causes and effects. I know my purpose and origin, I know many threads of fortune, misfortune, intrigue and deeds, but I know nothing of much more. I was protected by gods and goddesses, by the friendship of spirits that I could not hurt in my anger and madness. Caught by my deluded tirades and rage – somehow they witnessed my quarrel, my life, my destinies.

Peripsol: The divine, Fuomo, is not subjective at all. It is objective in all cases, it lives through everyone and by everyone. So, for example, when you imagine that you are conjuring up an aspect of Hekate – do you think of her as a person like you? Or for a mask of the Divine that exists in many places at once and is thus capable of multiple places? Of course, you communicate with her as if she were a person, according to your own form. However, if you want it to be revealed and penetrate deeper, you might be overwhelmed by the power it represents. The human faces of the Divine, the awe and terror without her magnificent mascara, would frighten you. This is not to say that all beauty is an existential nightmare. It only means that both beauty and terror can surpass your human form in a gigantic way. The divine intervenes simultaneously in all aspects of space and time. The noetic-noetic phenomenon is time-bound and timeless – it knows. What is called samskaras in Hinduism is the conditioned emergence of a co-dependent network of traces and deposits of life. This is not limited to human life, but to all life, and beyond that to interdependent forces in hypostasis and substasis. As such, they are illusory, internally empty. Keep them as property and it becomes a form of slavery. All true individuation, then, is not blind individualism. Individuation is the character of all instances of your life that show a mask to a world. These traits either remain or fade away, acting as an individual blemish in the stream and flow of lightning-like events. In truth, you are one of the infinite masks of totality. There are generations of spiritual realms bound by time and space or the phenomena. There are generations that are spaceless, but are subject to time and passing. There are liberated worlds that are both spaceless and timeless, highly divine and profound. We cannot perceive from the perspective of other beings, but those who do belong to worlds that can know instantaneously. Yet, we merely share the common reference points of others – thereby we can know approximately. It is not right to assume that all people think, act or want to think as we do. However, it is not an unworthy endeavor to use human intellect and feeling to try to get an approximate idea of what they might be like .

Fuomo: Are you saying that the possibilities of my inner millieu have been recognized? That the facts, the chances, the luck, the destinies, and the changes in destiny have been recognized as objective? That my decisions, my judgments, my pain, my hatred, my words, my thoughts, my attitudes, my war were not in vain? That I recognized obstacles and adversaries as objective and not a whim of my imagination? That these deities, to whatever extent, acknowledge my life? That my life, as the sum of all these rapid and difficult movements, was not worthless? That the tiniest thoughts, the unsaid, unthought, and unsensed things were understood? That not only what could be, but what is, was understood by intellectual eyes?

Peripsol: Indeed, not only that, there was also a certain potentiality recognized. You can form to the extent that matter allows. It is similar to human beings. They can form them if they are willing, to the extent that their nature, ethos, inclination, tolerance and nerves allow. They have received these seals in order to commit themselves and participate in the cosmic expression. Remember that an unpolished mind is thrown away by sublimating only the best of it. But we need substance to work with, and you are not such an uncouth fellow after all. With a new vehicle for your spirit, a heart that is now rotten and old, it has been immortalized three times in gold. An impulse of existence that was an absolute affirmation of life! Do you remember and realize the weight of these words? They were not left behind. In the equality of compassion – a harmonizing law – tried to penetrate and call the world. Our worlds are governed by completely different things, laws and orders. The call from the other world to this world is a call of the glorious deities, an arrow of Artemis, a lightning bolt of Zeus to the worlds below. Those who labor blindly against themselves seldom call to the greater worlds. Moreover, they seldom see those flashes of inspiration in their souls.

Fuomo: Forgive my question. How did it come about that after years of strife, battles and wars, I finally became a villain? I am a thoroughly terrible person. Yet powerful caducene hearts appear, intelligent spirits of the planets help in my upbringing? How did a foolish youth reward me with laurel wreaths that seemed unjust to many of my opponents? How could I not make my friends disappear by dirty words, which were actually wise?

Peripsol: For the same reason you inquired about before. Your, as you put it, opponents see from their subjective state. The gods see and know more, beyond time, beyond appearances. Do not flatter yourself and take the wrong path, but remain steadfastly on the path. What appears ugly or repulsive for this or any other reason often also springs from an ancient nobility. This nobility that wrestles with things beyond the opponent's imagination is the most valuable.

Abnegation

Fuomo: I thought I had defeated myself within. I carry the skulls of destroyed attachments, animal instincts and delusions. They are like apotropaic amulets that I wear around my neck, I have emptied myself. And yet sometimes these skulls want to speak, to put on flesh, they bite into me and try to ensnare me with illusions. Through denial, I have not submitted, but sacrificed. Did I not completely banish and defeat them, or is it the law of life that they return to test us? In oppression, I did not hesitate, but became wise and overconfident. I did not obey by force, but became independent and free. Through pain I did not move, but became detached and steadfast. Thus formed, my will is now my greatest enemy, for it takes the figures of faulty images and applies them to a destructive impulse. For it takes nostalgic pain and applies it to old scars and tries to tear them into open wounds. For it takes the skulls and makes a trophy of them instead of being warned. Formed in strife and war, I would wish to be like silence and so overcome myself every day. So act through silence. Like a dreamer who enters a new scene and whose mind pauses beyond the moving events of the dream. In this dream, the emptiness and hollowness wears a mask of me, the dreamer and the dreamed. May no mind pull the strings while my mind is immobilized by the onslaught of my unbuckled parts. May I be completely at peace – in the peace I would like to dwell.

Peripsol: Self-exiled, not working within an order, like Icarus you wish to extinguish yourself in the flames of the sun. A flight too high for a mortal soul like yours, worlds that exist will come crashing down on you, for you are still moving! If there are threads to pull, then you have not extinguished them! You are still acting, even if you say so! You create in a house of the master builder and foolishly shout: "Let the demiurgic master builder build no more!". To develop this inner harmony is a great task, and I do not want to distract you, but where is your deed to begin the rounding? Are you asking for the non-affirmation of life? Thanatarchy in some form? To join the unspeakable waters of the Titans. To move in the howling winds of Tartarus, what kind of arrogant demand is that? This is not your dream, this is the horror of a petty human mind creating an abyss into which you can fall. Your descent into Tartarus served a purpose. You were assigned to an order of the spheres. It was not to seek annihilation in the void, need I remind you? Be reasonable, use your mind instead of malicious depression, and you will see the aionic light! There are many suffering people, but not many who are endowed with knowledge and imagination like you. Do you see what happens with your bombastic claims? You conjure up for yourself greater illnesses, greater heights and depths than are appropriate for a human being. Just because you know something, you turn learning back into stupidity and ignorance! Withdraw and think about what destinies are consistent with a man. Your bold assessment does not correspond to the order of things! Those who look into the black dream are horrified. Only those who empty themselves may enter it. Whirling images that torment and delight catch the unquenched fire of seizing oneself by the chain! They catch and ensnare! Beware of the double face of every sign! Return rather to the immortal streams! Yes, why do you rebel against yourself. Have your torments eaten up your mind? Even then you should be reasonable in spite of your broken mind. Overcome the broken, worn-out old head. Gather all that you were, like a seal, a representation. Become hollow, shoot the arrow of your soul to the stars!

Fuomo: No more complaining, life is a short spectacle to suffer.

On Intelligencer's Octaves

Fuomo: Now, dear Peripsol, I want to talk to you about things that are of the utmost importance. When men discovered fire and brought it into the caves, they acted without the light of reason. How different people are when the values they live by are relative! They are completely constructed by other people and considered to be of higher value than others. Should we consider a change in the composition of our mind or a certain formula that has brought our mind closer to the intellect of Providence? Should we say that in this way providence and prudence were discovered? That people lived in their light without having any idea of their formulation? We know that cosmography, theology and philosophy were all influenced by a mythopoetic impulse of men. These disciplines were created entirely by them. However, both philosophy and theology were invoked like maps. Should we say that men are chartists of the world in the horizontal? That they are chartists of the world of the cosmic and the divine in the vertical? As soon as we crawled out of our caves, we met the animal depth, we tore ourselves away from Mother Nature. We encountered the awe and terror of the world where all things lived and had their spirit, and then we forgot? The ape-man became man when he considered himself separate from nature. He fell away from divinity when he considered himself separated from the world soul.

Peripsol: Agreed. He transferred the great laws of the universe to low octaves of harmonies that man could understand, and began to interpret and fathom the signs and symbols. By creating sigils, he created a key, an interface to the gates of wonder. How far away was his understanding! For it was only when men ascended to higher levels that they were able to order the songs of the universe. The harmonies of the cosmos are reflected in the figures. To interpret them and translate them into expressions and thoughts. All metaphors, analogies, allegories and the like brought them closer and further away. Every law of the universe, every deep resonance of these forces can be understood as living ideas in expression and unfolding. When people catch a glimpse of these forces in their mind, their feeling, their emotion, they turn to them. According to their abilities and possibilities, they try to name, symbolize and interpret them. The world answers them with knowledge and deception, with gnosis and revelation, with epiphanies and concealments.

Fuomo: According to this law, all these movements of instinct, intuition, reason and intellect are interconnected and intermingle. They are like a musical performance, note signs are the thoughts that express a sign! For example, we can say that when I pronounce the word harmony or cosmos, it means that the ancients recognized a certain proportion by similarity. Be it a repetition of the rising and setting of the sun as an order, since time immemorial. The concept of repetition, of sequence, of time, of change, of order, appears. It was there before, intuitive, described by methods that later developed into science. Apart from etymology or ancient meanings of words, we should look for a thought, a suggestion of the former. Certain thought patterns reflecting a discovery when a human bound idea was born under great efforts? Can we say that there are ideas of mankind and living ideas of the cosmos. The former are a creative interpretation of the latter, which corresponds to the changeable man. The ideas that were born and therefore are described in different degrees? Man is a finite being, he creates finite concepts and therefore he cannot adhere to the pure objective truth, but only point to it. So how can he invent concepts of purity, like the Platonic bodies? And yet he is unable to describe or define them in an identically perfect way?

Peripsol: The infinity of worlds exists before, as do the laws that adorn the cosmos and other things that man has discovered. They are all older than the human race. Thus, a child of infinity bridges his finiteness by recognizing the laws of time. How brave is the race that blazes trails beyond itself, that devises worlds impossible to itself! Hence also their curse and their elevation. Like the great Plato and others, they did not first imagine the excellent ideas, but met them at the interface between man and the abyss. All metaphysics and mysteries are based on this. The degree between the discovery and approach to the pure ideas and the conception of their content is the degree between imagination and concept. Imagination is a point where the things that can be imagined coincide with the sacred things. They are seen by seers and understood by true philosophers. Great things, wondrous things, felt by some but impossible to put into words. Flourishing worlds of powers, forces and ideas. To close oneself to this current and to consider it mere speculation — the tragedy of the human race. Does this not do violence to imagination and participation?

Fuomo: Is there a metaphysical ethics? Let me invoke some if they are of value. Virtues that are worthy of the Magoi, and vices that are their opposites. For you see, without knowing the latter as the source of suffering, mischief and disorder, we cannot know the former. Tradition creates the foundations for people, the taboo and the sacred. The ethos and the morality. So they form the backbone of a social logos. We agreed that an order ensures the limits of eudaimonia, happiness and its pursuit. Order guarantees harmony and its proportional distribution ensures the longevity of an order. Justice sustains it and wisdom reforms it. An order becomes fatal only when it is dominated by vices. We agreed that order is preferable to chaos. In the former we can act unthreatened by the poisons of disorder. Our boundaries are secured against that which reasonably opposes our form. We are protected against unnecessary suffering and poisons. Against that which ruins and destroys what has been agreed upon and resolved as reasonable, as beneficial to our species. Inviolability of our freedoms, protection of our minds, bodies and souls from violence and slavery. Protection of our senses and minds from derangement and delirium, from possession. Distinguishing between ideological, political and religious possessions that pollute the mind. When I speak of freedom, dark are the days when freedom is a freedom from, a negative freedom. Bright are the days when it is freedom to act, to be free, to participate in the feast of the gods. Is it true that only in freedom of choice, of will, of decision, of attitude can one truly and honestly alchemically ennoble one's spirit into a godlike self? Or is it fate that directs destinies against one's will, elevating one and degrading another? Is free will a potential that grows out of slavery? Is it actually a harmony that arises from the tension of possibilities, choices, opportunities, judgments, and evaluations? How unfree, then, is a will dominated by conditioned responses? What possibilities, choices, chances, judgments are mere repetitions of others like automata. Judged by reason — people think alike in greatness. Even in pettiness they may think alike. The first impulse of a real, mature, autonomous critical thinking. It is found in unison and comradeship when it finds a match. The latter finds similarity in repetition, in the common denominator, following the most heinous things they revere.

Peripsol: Fate, Lady Ananke, does not plan destinies and fates. It is a higher power that no one can change. All in the world obey her voluntarily or involuntarily. She stands at the side of the divine Iynx Astrolabe of the unchanging ways. Hekate, the guardian of the cosmic waterways and seals, lets her pass. Messages from the transcendent worlds, delivered by Hermanubis. Living symbols are ancient lock picks for great mysteries. But listen to me: to be free, one must consciously obey fate, to discover it as a matter of chance. Fate and destiny determine life, fate determines beyond the grave. It may be that fate and destiny are at odds with the destiny of life. But it may also be that they are not in harmony with destiny. Ananke rules over moires and fortunae. There are laws, as you said, called Ma'at by the Egyptians and R'ta by the Hindis. These are profound, objective laws hidden in codes. Where do they come from? The self-evident, self-generated self-identity created these laws. It is an intelligent realm, not according to the standards of human beings. By the identity of the transcendent laws that exist in the universe, they have always been there. Oroboros eats his own dragon's tail, Ereb is a generation of these laws. The lemma between otherness and sameness seems to put things in discord. But all these points, the discord, are another center to look at the whole. If something eternally pure and unmixed seems beautiful even to many philosophers, then the laws of the universe are coherent. The universe is a terrible emptiness, which is perceived with a cold, mechanical look. To a sharp and beautiful mind, it is full of beauty of divine proportions. I am a mask of this divinity, and so are you. If you long for beauty, you will find it, Eros Peri an Kalon.

Fuomo: Therefore, I should know the composition, as a proper measure of character, nature and inclination. It does not grow hypertrophically beyond Spartan necessities. It does not die in austerity and unnecessary stiffness. To know this, you must know your nature, or in other words, know yourself. Observe your sufferings and joys, your habits and inclinations. Observe how you react in different circumstances and environments under certain dispositions. Knowing that you must live and experience, feel deeply and think widely. To compare and weigh all these things of one's mind and compare them with what one wants to become. This is the definition of a courageous individuation in motion, under the guidance of intelligentsia found by the intellect. To be in tune with one's nature in terms of divinity, inclination and the like, and to straighten out what is crooked. To promote that which one believes to be right and good. Reason thus trained finds inner balance and harmony through logic, critical thinking, observation and synthesis. This is a concordant pattern of one's being that resembles an equally armed triangle, this Isidic Triad of Justice. Perhaps a wheel that expands and contracts according to one's abilities, needs and necessities. Composition, reason and harmony in the natural environment are not developed as a magnificent object. They are not a finished, perfected wheel; they require binding and releasing, dissolving and coagulating. It requires work. A good education is capable of producing good habits. When a child is raised to be a free, strong tree, a parent observes what the child needs. He sometimes forbids certain developments, sometimes he encourages them. He never fetters the child with strictness or allows liberties that spoil the child. If we did not have such dispositions, we would have to recognize our bad habits and educate ourselves. In this way we correct what our parents have spoiled by indifference or omission. Proportion and harmony lead to inner happiness and are accompanied by spontaneous wisdom. To any disproportion or dispute, it rightly responds with a weighted response and reaction. The pillar of importance is the search for truth, but this central search should not be without the ethos of training in virtues. Every ancient school of the Mysteries began with the education of initiates in ethics, virtues, and paidean morality. They were absorbed primarily by reason. Without it, all good loot and fruits spoil and rot. The initiate becomes a monster at worst, and a corrupt, weak human being at best. How can you give a child a sword and let him decide whether to kill another child he has beaten out of stupidity? How can you ask an unethical person to use the art of high magic when all he cares about is greed for gold, vain fame, or temporary gains in a transient world? Gods and intelligencers want to teach people who strive for excellence. People who strive for it first and foremost, who resonate with the higher worlds. Who want to overcome themselves and master themselves. Selflessness is the sacrifice of that part of being that opens the higher worlds to operate in. How should something that does not reach for the illusions of a mask work through something that considers itself the most precious possession? Selflessness banishes selfish purposes and goals to nothingness. It behaves as natural to the world, it lets it shine through, it is unthinkable for selfish beings obsessed with themselves to think of selflessness of themselves towards others. Opponents intend to invade the void with their own selves in order to expand their delusions. One should ward off such influences by freeing oneself daily from arbitrariness and capriciousness. By repelling the will that is inconsistent with the greater will of the Self, the True Will that underlies the expression of one's temporary existence. A dyadic partner, through an act of separation, ennobles himself into an Angeli Bonum, the Daimonion that spreads its wings above and below. He is conversational through an act of Tajjali and guides us if we choose to listen. There are dangers and adversaries, but the dyadic partner of our refined intellect, heart and spirit hovers over us and converses with those from the heavenly families. They bring us messages, inspirations, ideas from the spheres and stars and protect us from the influence of malicious enemies. From wisdom and happiness comes laughter, an expression of joy that drives all evil into nothingness. This laughter is understanding, for it knows the sorrows of the world and expresses its joy benevolently. Through understanding, it is a way to recognize certain laws in proportion and harmony. It is the knowledge of what is proper for a human being. From this springs mercy as a descendant of understanding, for without mercy there is no justice. There is no mercy without compassion. It springs from a deep understanding of common and individual human destiny. Do not be oppressed by things you perceive as evil, or compassion will turn into anger. Mercy can turn to ruthlessness, justice to sheer lynching cruelty. From these greater pillars grow humanity and friendship. Comitas, a kind of community and a sense of belonging and caring. It is about recognizing the greater whole and seeing this in every instance of another living being. Agape, the idea of cosmic unity is perceived by the few and transmitted to the rest. This tribal bond that keeps the community alive. The absence of falseness — therefore genuineness is an impulse that, after tearing off the masks, represents a unique being in its births; Genii and Juno. The unfolded genius of men and women, in which they find the breath of freedom and nobility. There, unspoiled, untainted, disciplined in greatness, they can lead or pursue their lives. All according to the nature of their geniuses. Everything is received with good humor, it promotes a great serenity. Nothing in excess, everything in moderation — good justice forms the basis for laws. As the Romans believed, the best laws are drawn from the observation of excesses and the moderation of things. This establishes the behavior and tradition we carry within us. To govern us and promote thriving. Ethos and principles are based on behavior. Sisters of reason, observing laws and changes among people, they find their balance according to time and age. Strength is born in an individual who knows right from wrong. Knowing what is good and evil is natural for a reasonable person. This is not based on relative morality, but on insightful general foresight. Integrity is based on these virtues, and self-control brings these virtues under the rule of a mature person. He can sincerely avoid transgressing the established limits. With proper training, discipline develops into a habit, but it must not stagnate! It should develop by thinking and practicing good deeds, thoughts, actions and speeches under the ethical command of the rhetor. Now to the anatomy of vice. The greatest vice is attachment to the self, a compound of illusions, as the Buddhists call it. Like illusions that gain weight, they begin to confuse our reality with exaggerated ideas and other dreams that we long for. They cause us to be selfish and to value meaningless things. There are many attachments that are perceived as right and wrong, personal truth and untruth, views and beliefs. Attachments to objects and people, to abstracts and concepts, they are interwoven with aversion to opposites in a world of dualities. It is the promotion of hatred and compulsive love that turns happiness into suffering and leads to suffering. Likes and dislikes that are causes of antagonism. Desires that cause suffering, and pleasures that are destructive and blind in excess. Things that further lead to aversion, contempt and disgust, anger and rage, hatred. Ignorance is caused by lack of knowledge, but also by forgetfulness, lack of direction, instruction, training, education. It is primarily a lack of discernment, principles and ethical training. Ignorance is closely related to aversion and fear, which promote separation and hatred. It leads to conflicting interests that stand in the way of cooperation. Pride is a form of attachment to abstracts, physical and mental qualities that are impermanent and result from a lack of humility. False pride does not recognize the impermanence of such things; it develops into arrogance. When attachment to concepts and achievements is overly perceived as valuable, it becomes inflated to immeasurable proportions. Certainly, what is of value testifies to the standards of society and its health. The values we recognize are the proud appearances we make with them — they testify to the purpose of our lives. Another vice that arises from the conceptualization of abstract, obstinacy, pride and ignorance is envy. In other words, it is a feeling of inequality over abstract values. It is a competition of illusions about the acquisition or lack of acquisition of such resources. The Buddhist antidote to abandoning attachment was to recognize the impermanence of things, impermanence. The antidote was to try to exchange one's self for that of others, to work for others, and to overcome one's selfishness. To defeat ignorance, one applies learning, meditation and contemplation. One educates oneself in various disciplines. By absorbing what one learns, one commits oneself to both practicing it in society and nourishing the good within. To defeat aversion, loving kindness toward the other is necessary. We can find our opponents anywhere. Those with a strong mind, properly trained, are trained in such virtues. It does not mean not being assertive, but being assertive, confident, balanced. It means to be inwardly steely and cheerful in one's disposition. A superior person possesses a sincere sense of equality with the other. To defeat false pride, one can practice apophasia, humility in intellectual inquiry and patience in trying to understand the other. It is the ability to examine oneself and review one's life and day through memories. To conquer envy, give up complacency, practice giving and receiving. An exchange of courtesies and everyday kindness. By maintaining a maternal and paternal spirit towards others, we keep a committed distance. To defeat excessive conceptualization, which becomes the root of other vices, practice cognition and recognize the illusory nature of concepts. Knowledge of causality, including our inner psychic causality and the causality of others, helps trace everything back to its root. It enables us to catch vices and defilements by the throat and expel them from our lives. It is a constant weeding. It is difficult to get rid of bad habits that become dependent on others. You have to train virtues and expel vices by tackling them simultaneously with different methods and techniques you use in life. Variations of these vices are excessive passions. They lead to self-destruction, arrogance, and perfidy, which come from seeing suffering as natural and cynically drawing others to our side. Insensitivity is synonymous with ignorance and passive stupidity. Weakness that submits to suffering. Stupidity that is a blind spot between deception and ignorance. Instability that is a consequence of anger, delusion and ignorance. Disproportionality in indiscipline, which affects inner harmony and leads to chaos. Confusion, which can lead to obsession. Unrighteousness, which is based on disagreement, hatred, ignorance and delusion, and develops into cruelty and blindness. Ignorance that plunges into confusion. Despair, resulting from isolation and terror, seeking relief from suffering. It develops into indifference and cold aversion to inhuman feelings and revenge. It can develop into cruelty and bestiality, into an antagonism that arises from aversion and can produce domination. It then tries to impose itself on others in order to realize its own vision.

Peripsol: Well said, but are not you also a victim of many vices that you pretend to understand?

Fuomo: Yes, and I honestly correct myself as a free man should. Otherwise, what would I be worth to heaven. If there were no strife, no gigantomania, no steel would be hardened to cut the delusions with Manjusri's sword! How great were the past masters and mistresses that they endowed us with means to fight ourselves first, not the world! How great is our fall that we have forgotten the methods, the training and the purpose!

On Chaldean Mysteries

Fuomo: I would like to present some thoughts of Julian the Theurgist. He was a soldier in the army of Marcus Aurelius. The soul of an archangel, for whom his father had prayed, was reborn on earth as a master magician.

Peripsol: I smile at your effort, because these pages have not been touched with understanding and faith for a long time.

Fuomo: It was written that the world is understandable. It can be known through the flowering of the intellect, which discovers its place in the divine worlds through effort and practice. It can be affected by the rites of the Theion Ergon, that is, by acting upon and receiving from the gods. In the sacred language, Gnosis Arretos, it is revealed in the most secret of contemplations as the language of the mind, ideas and feelings. With Gnosis Arretos we communicate with the gods and the Iynges. The latter, magical words and beings, connect the logoi of the world through an intricate web of messages of intellect, idea, imagination, splendor and glory. It is said that it cannot be "perceived as a particular thing," which means divinity. The flame of the spirit, however, is empty of all stains and poisons, and thus rises pure on the flame of the stars to the highest. When it unfolds, it reaches the greatest of all the unwritten, unsaid and inconceivable revelations of the world. Oh, it opens with the lotus flower of the world, as a receptive vehicle of the Divine. One's reason cannot convey all these wonders. The intellect, having touched the heights, brings forth an unshakable, lion-like, hyperionic power. Nourished by hope, it makes itself steely and longs again for that beauty, the rapture. It longs for things that cannot be expressed other than through joy, beauty and magnificence. This intelligible is outside the mind, so it is independent of us, but by being in it, we can discover it within us and think about it. It is said that it requires extreme concentration with the seal of the triad in Henosis, a philosopher's stone. Here the Divine touches the man and the woman and unites beyond all duality into a transcendent whole. That this concentration of purity of mind and intention should be natural. Like love, it is not brought about by force, but subtly unfolds in a well-intentioned harmony. It arises from the innermost yearnings of the spiritual heart and soul. This seal arms us with a heavy body of light that envelops us like armor and whose heaviness is that of an airy, golden space, unlike lead that falls. The intellectual membrane between power, intellect and fire is thus that of the sacred universal gates. Hecate is known to guard her waterways and seals. The One that radiates the Triad lies beyond. Many masks of the One are contained within it, and many spiritual powers and forces penetrate this world. To find oneself, one gathers them as friends and thus returns to the One. By directing the soul to wholeness, to absence, to otherness and sameness. By aligning them with the timeless and time, with the spaceless and space. Thus equipped, they strive to return, finding their minds and hearts at home within and without. "The monad expands duality". All duality is transcended as they transcendently merge the dualities. In the merging, they release their energy into their rightful realms. So the vessel is the third. Through a higher fusion, they lose the characteristics of duality, for they become one. "Every god and goddess is good", because the laws of the universe would not see it otherwise. The resonant qualities of the gods correspond to the closeness to the One that encompasses everything and the transcendent intellect that is glorious and good. "Every mind perceives this God as a paternal abyss" — say the gods. Thus, it is a transcendent greatness that is nevertheless loved and praised by gods and goddesses. It is also known as the womb of the mother. Thus we can call it the womb of Mater Magna, or as the Gnostics called Bythos the Abyss Intelligible. Sige, the Idea and the Silence, which is the feminine aspect of those deep forces that the gods can understand and that mortals try to approach. Love is understood as a binding force, that which holds world systems together throughout the universe. The necessary virtues proposed by Julian the Theurge are virtue, truth and love. She is the fire-bearing hope that nourishes and sustains the works. Then Rhea, the generative sources of everything, and the known spheres of the planets formed by the intellect. Then Aion, Hyperion, the higher invisible sun, whose apparent and visible star is Helios. He can pick flowers from the vastness of Pater Bythos. The theologians of that time called the sun "fire, corridor of fire" and above it "solar worlds and the totality of light". The Iynges are of independent thought and are seen as messengers between the worlds. It is said that "each world has an indomitable spiritual support". The gods also taught about connecting links, which are called unifiers of the world systems. There are others who existed before the intelligent-intellectual worlds, but they are not much talked about. Could they have been deprived of the light of consciousness? Are they like Rokkr, Jotuns or Tartarus Titans, preceding these orders and therefore not spoken about? My mortal mind touched these waters of chaos and retreated. I walked toward the starry nights that signify the golden fields of Yaaru. "Wings of fire, ether and matter" — the teletarchs of these worlds form their domains. In them hypercosmic deities, archons, archangels and angels from all world systems thrive. A gigantic number of beings populate them. As for the chthonic and telluric daimons, they are called "many-blooded tribes." Their natures are mixed and run in different courses. In their encounters with humans, they can be unpredictable. As Master Iamblichus later wrote, one should not be inspired by these children of the deep. Even if they are respected, it is better to stay away from them. The letter Chi (X) in the heart of the soul brings it into a hermetic solar flatness. The ethers strengthen and regenerate the bodies of the men and women who devote themselves to their tasks. Their skin and joints, bones and muscles, nerves and blood, brain and all these things are nourished. They are healed to preserve them in what they do. Destiny is compared to nature, that is, to the transitory. By prolonging destiny, one does not despise nature, but lives by spiritual phenomena. One separates oneself from the mortal worlds. But "the procession of stars was not brought for the sake of man," "O man, cunning creation of impudent nature." Just as "the Fatherly Spirit has sown symbols as ineffable beauties throughout the universe," so they all call out. So do not be forgetful and call upon the forces for liberation. "Silence, initiate" — says the oracle — "Ascending souls through the southern gate sing hymns to paean". They shine like angels, living forces. The circle of the solar world serves the ethereal, deep depth. The true sun measures everything together with the time, the time outside the time. Thus, the solar circle of time is interwoven with the star circles, the galactic circles and so on, as the Egyptians taught.

Peripsol: That is your human understanding, now take it to heart, ways are many, but the glorious light of truth must be sought to straighten them out. Along with the hope that keeps the movement unceasing. Even Abraham, when chastised by his father, had to admit that the throne of the Magoi is in Chaldea. That is — Babylon.

Thanatos

Fuomo: Peripsol, my angel. I turn to you today because I have received a gift from Horus the Elder. Plutarch wrote that this high deity, one with the Ennead, symbolizes the world to come in its future form. With his mighty hawk's eye, he sees the time beyond. I have seen both Eidola, the shadows of chthonic affairs in their multiform forms. I have seen many worlds invisible to the eyes of other mortals, these colorful beauties and these pure lights as they appear. I dare not know many things about these worlds, but in my imperfect aspiration I have begun to interpret the laws through a metaphysical eye. In this way I connected them with experiences as a medium, as a living vehicle for these worlds and spirits. In the light of these revelations, I began to interpret ancient mysteries. Well, I started as a dejected, desperate mortal, too weak and full of destructive passions. I had not the slightest idea why or how I saw these powerful worlds. In great turmoil and madness, I was treated like a madman until I came to rest in great insight. I learned to expand my world to include these insights. I freed myself from the shackles of civilization to learn to perceive anew. Let me speak first about the eidola, which the Egyptians called Khaibit, Shu or Shut, and which I divided into many other worlds. To the eidola the Eleusinian masters consecrated melikraton, honey with milk and baked cakes. The skia of the dead the necromancers bound by offering the blood of various animals to animate the veins of their dead souls and make them speak. Sometimes they also sacrificed their own blood or that of their enemies to free the skia from the underworld. They open and consecrate Plutonia, the "gates of hell", to call and question them. To fulfill the will of the spirits, necromancers and famous witches of Thessalia. Without condemning the ethos of the latter, I am not prejudiced, because I too have committed such acts. However, my goal is only to offer gifts to alleviate suffering, not to bind. Like the great priests of Anubis, who consulted their wise dead by the means of persuasion. According to the Egyptian way of thinking, these shadows were intelligent. Unlike the ideas of the qabbalistic Qlipoth, which deprive them of reality. They could actually communicate and respond in special circumstances. Whether they were a vital part of a mortal's higher being that passed into the realm of death, or just a shadow. Shadows on the surface escaped the most horrible of fates, that of being devoured or tormented in the waters of the Styx. Indeed, I have found that there are Eidola that resemble humans and roam above the surface. Some live in houses in packs of the dead. Some travel from place to place and are quite capable of emanating through a living human. Some travel from place to place in the bodies of the living. There are rare people who work through shadows and consider themselves superiors. They are often deceived by the lack of sight. There are also those shadows that come from nature or the animal world, and those that belong to the elements. Fire shadows, their black bodies are of fiery sharpness. Water, chthonic telluric cold strange oceanic black. Air spouts, moving nimbly through space. There, various flyers, black-winged vipers and angels of different species and hierarchies. Various shadows of Earth, those of the worlds of Gaia, nature demons roaming the land, all pitch black. I also discovered that they can mix in mutations, so to speak – multiply by inclination. So when I close my eyes, I see different forms of animal, human and other origins. Often they are in various stages of decay, black and white. When I open my eyes, I see them in pitch black forms of humanoid and various, somewhat animal, hybrid other types. As for the dead, they live on various foods. Like the white ladies who inhabit some old castles, they can retain their form. Recently deceased etheric bodies look exactly as they were at the moment of death. Afterwards, they turn white-greenish and then fall into pitch-black shadows, after which they appear still. The behavior of Skia, Eidola or a substance called Khaibit by the Egyptians is also different. It is difficult to understand them from a living perspective. Inclinations, nature, substance, foods and moods of the dead. Note that the dead are no longer alive when you deal with them. They are no longer fully human beings, often much more, sometimes much less. Sometimes you can have the impression, like the Dionysian dictum, that "the dead rule the living." Some shadows are animated by higher spirits, so that they work in the world of the living, warning them of the future or being oracles. But what is death if not a transition and a rebirth into the other worlds, a rebirth on new ways. The wholeness of a living being is complex, even more so that of a human being. They consist not only of body and soul, but of different components and functionalities of many souls. Their destinies, their development and their causes vary from life to life, from death to death, from harmony and disharmony of the whole. If we assume that there is a prototypical "whole man, whole woman", then a deviation from this wholeness means a fragmentation of harmony. The prototype of Vir Unus is an instrument for clarification.

Peripsol: You are exposed to Thanatos, but do not dwell on the shadows, many a sorcerer has found himself in a desolate state. Do not reject or disregard them, but recognize them as such and walk the path of life. It is not up to you to discover these worlds, but they should serve as a stimulus for your spiritual development. You can help your companions posthumously with greater leverage. For what good would you be to them as a guide if you simply became one of their friends? As an epoptei, a modern seer, be like the ancient Sicilian Palin Hikousi, who returned from darkness to light to mediate between worlds.

Fuomo: Excellently said, my angel. I would live in desolation if I did not have the companion of the worlds of the elements of light. They present the greatness of infinity, the great winged suns, multicolored and entwined with serpents. Great aionic wings above, taking no mortal form. The Bait-like winged serpents of Egypt, phoenixes of the sun. Spirits of the planetary spheres, appearing as silver winged caducous orbs in the night sky. They dwarf the visible stars. They take the form of powerful rulers and mistresses, humanoid or golden-robed beauties of the ancient muses. Beautiful sylphs, gnomes, Vul-

cans (salamanders) and nereid water spirits. Innumerable realms of the elements than those mentioned by Master Paracelsus. They are rich in all forms of spirit families, their freedom, their organization, their order and their nature. Also the animal souls, oh living joys! Friend of the animals, sometimes I am a human totem for their aliveness, sometimes they are my totems as friends and spirit guides! I can define their nature only when they enter my body and my spirit. Then they are expressed to the extent that my own nature, substance and inclination allows, never beyond. Beyond my understanding I can see nothing, and if it is foolish, I may have only a foolish perspective. But I am charmed by these worlds, and I charm them, rarely with the intention of doing harm, mostly with commitment. The families and genealogies of the spirit tribes are complex and varied. Each has its own history in the world that is being created together. In the search for understanding, one may feel lost at first. Let us observe the whole forest of phenomena without naming every tree in the forest, what a futile task! I am concerned that people destroy many a beautiful creature without regard for these worlds. Some who imitate our behavior become even worse! Similarly, those who are inspired by malicious or combustible and unstable beings can also corrupt mortals!

Peripsol: Do not worry. You are the wisdom of the spirits who act in accordance with their nature within the substance of their worlds. You should find your way as a human being in your world. To be a two-headed doctor, you must master the ways of human beings. Find out what greatness you can take from your own world, and the worlds of spirits will treat you as they please. One day you will join them. Now focus on how you can overcome, how you can surpass your own self, how you can know yourself, how you can lead yourself. How to never separate yourself from your guides and protectors. The Horusian view should not overshadow any other world. You are wise enough not to think of it as entertainment and not to puff yourself up into a deluded mortal. Take it as an indication of a higher way, your society a many, many are your friends. Also many opponents, for mortals with such gifts are not often well seen. You should appeal to the friendship of these worlds, appeal to those who can prepare you, remain loyal to your friends!

Synergetic Hypophets

Fuomo: Peripsol, as Plato says, "The divine tends to geometrize." Am I to understand this to mean that the transcendent realm is that of pure geometry? That it is also found, with various degrees of entropy, in many phenomena? For example, in sound and color, in the senses, in the intellect. That if we extend it to the Pythagorean realms of number between sound, color, wave and the like, there is a manifold geometry? Is it that it is found everywhere in various proportions, which are henceforth extracted from it? That even if it is manifold, it follows in greater complexity certain laws of geometrical order? Shall I also assert that the difference between the levels of organization in this ordered geometrization gives the appearance of disorder or chaos? Indeed, by creating the mere illusion of chaos. Is it the freedom to disorder and chaos within a greater whole that is ordered to a consummate degree? Am I to assume that the mixture of otherness and sameness spreads disproportionality through a degree of limma? Thus diversity and chaos arise, as if unity met as sameness and chaos met as otherness? Shall I assume, like Hesiod, that chaos came first and order was imposed by the One, like Plato who, like the Neoplatonists, counted the stars as deities? That demiurgic toil is the sustenance of order? Moreover, should I understand that the revolutions of the spheres, the planets and the stars are somehow mirrored everywhere? That the essence of cosmic change is captured in animals and humans, in animate and inanimate matter? That these revolutions are responsible for endowing humans and animals with different functional souls? Yes, millions of years of evolution, the history of species is a fact. But is it all part of the endowment we have received through these constellations of events and forces? That the world soul is not simply a false concept? That the paradigm of the perfection of the cosmos, discredited by science, abolished it? Perhaps this perfection was sought in the symmetry of the spheres, rather than being related to itself by what is real? Assuming we believe in different functional souls, do they receive different bioastrological cuts and polishes in their ethos? Are the changes in the course of their metamorphosis and transition a real process? And do they change like the body itself, which undergoes such phylogenetic and ontogenetic change?

Peripsol: From the five- to seven-string lyre to modern instruments, each composition is a key to other worlds. The synergy is to arrange them within the world of soul melodies. Think of how your totality resonates with different worlds, with otherness and sameness. Even now, if you listen to the unheard, you will hear the wonderful music of the spheres if you are receptive to it. All order and divination through a system of true correspondences is an attempt to bring both the simplicity and complexity of the world into an orderly, visible whole. It is merely a substasis of the continuous, as are all actions which draw the Divine into the generative worlds of the phenomenal earth. As for music, have you noticed how it changes the smallest moods, how your mind, heart and souls tune in? How the resonance of your skull and nervous system causes a change? If you are captivated by sensitive people, you can tune into certain realms with certain music. Music is the ergon of the expression of the world soul, if we consider melody to be energy. With each new melody, each new rhythm, each new instrument in unison or discord, a sphere of Pythagorean attunements is created. Sounds can be keys to open gates, not only to changes in mood, emotion, thought. They also make us more susceptible to influences from different spheres, dimensions, entities and worlds. Magically empathetic, armed music can be an interface to connect with different worlds. Simultaneous involvement of fellow beings truly captures a true heart in ascension and bundles many worlds into one stream. Echoes of it are but a shadow of genius. Every idea, thought form, state of mind, consciousness, soul and feeling can be translated into color and music. They can just as easily be transformed into another idea, as you will find in the arts and sciences that are genuine. Therein lies both the danger and the liberation. It is enough to observe a mad, possessed man to see the disorder of his mind, the direction of his thoughts and feelings. Even the music, the language and the idea he would produce with his total expression would be confused. Such madness can be hidden in sane people. They too can be mad in deep delusion about themselves and the world, they too can cause great evil. How unanimous, well-dosed, humane, well-mannered, sensible, intelligent and subtle these people are! What great things they are capable of in every field they pursue! The purest kind of endeavor would be that of transposing the Divine into an octave intelligible and clear to man. After that, it would be a great task to translate and interpret it into known disciplines. It always happens that hypophetic people are rare and that they rarely deal with the world. When they do, they are geniuses, they leave their mark on history. Look for their creations and learn!

Fuomo: Can this ever be achieved?

Peripsol: It can be pursued in many tasks, but it is like the search for truth, not one has grasped it! some of you seek it, some of you are close to it, others linger in the deserts, desolate. Others move between oases and the sound of waterfowl, blinded, and find nothing in these places. To find and to be found, to know and to be known.

Fuomo: People study the smallest detail of categories that are distracted and separated from the whole. I think their progress depends on this fact. I am desolate, separated from the world to reweave my own fabric. I am but a collector of discoveries, seeking relief in the stars and giving my spirit a home. Whether movement, stillness, illusion or truth, I no longer fear any of it. Yet I am overwhelmed by the stagnant indecision of the reach. I can not get involved with others because I know about the dangers, am I a coward?

Peripsol: You are not asked to be. For some it is important to complete oneself in solitude, for others it is important to commit oneself. Follow the promises of destiny. It is not a reproach if you receive blessings and bear burdens that are suitable for you. We know of your ambitions, which do not bode well. They are benevolent, but they will bring you shame in the long run. Take care and continue in this way.

Mixing of Natures

Fuomo: Peripsol, it troubles me that in some traditions the life of many living things is misrepresented or missing altogether. As if we would assume that the living force could only be attributed to humans. Many others, animate and inanimate things can represent life under different circumstances. Should we take the first as an exclusive point of view and the second as an inclusive point of view? Can we decide how they differ in their properties? It is not difficult for me to believe that animals have souls, which might well be assumed if we admit that humans do. This speculation has probably led to the creation of totems and to the fact that people worship not only their deceased ancestors, but also the animalistic spirit guides. Should we now distinguish them from the souls of plants, herbs and trees and other realms, further from those of minerals and the like? If the universe is ensouled, and the ancients believed that the stars are ensouled gods, then this soul is to be understood throughout the world. Moreover, all living things are ensouled by a certain force, or a knot of many threads of different forces. The metaphysical generation embodies itself in the generative evolution, so that the consistency and indivisibility is preserved in an understandable way. Unus Mundus. May I assume that it is the intelligence of the mind that thinks about a subject that gives it a perception of itself? Perhaps with a touch of its character and thus a certain amount of illusory reason? Staring at a stone does not give it humanity, but a human being can think about its "stoniness." A rather childish view. Let us do justice to Julian the Emperor, who wrote in his Hymn to Helios that myths are for teething children. Stories, myths, and folktales convey narratives of forces and powers that spring from human ingenuity and imagination. They are never meant to be precise or true; they are an underpinning of metaphysical indeterminacy. An analogy can be found in the difference between theoria, doxa and praxis, gnosis. A similar analogy can be made between fantasy and superficiality and imagination and notion. The point is not to postulate a "one-sided truth" and a "successful hermetic path." There is no such thing. Nevertheless, some operational patterns of philosophical objects work better to achieve their goals.

Peripsol: If you believe that a stone possesses your intelligence, this is a foolish view. If you project your intelligence onto the stone to perspectivise the substance of the stone, it becomes known to you. The more hidden qualities the matter and substance reveal to you, the more you will find the soul of that stone. Proceed in this way also with other worlds and think about them. Because what you think about gives information about the subject of your contemplation, action and reaction. It is not without significance for the subject of your work.

Fuomo: So am I to assume that the old doctrine of similia similibus, empathy between objects, is true? Or that of Analogia Entis, the analogy of beings in their matching proportions in a naive view? Or is it an uneven and complex distribution of substances as in chemistry? If we apply a chemical way of looking at the occult laws, the nature and the substances of the beings and their souls, where do we arrive? They are composed in different ways. Does their combination achieve an alchemical view of being that reveals their substance?

Peripsol: If you imagine a tree in a regular way, it does not show you its true qualities. If you rest under a tree, it does not show you its true properties. If you eat some edible parts of the plant or tree, it will have effects on you, as in the Viridian occult sciences. But if you become the tree and merge with its soul, you will have inexpressible sensations. You can define it to a certain degree, the rest remains mute in human languages. Likewise, you cannot be a tree completely, but your own substance, soul, nature and inclinations become tree-like. There are different intensities of pure experience. At night you may feel silent and profound, gathering strength and growing. Like a forest, you may think deeply, slowly and strongly about things concerning the forest. But does the forest think as deeply and profoundly as you do? Or is it a metaphor for a deeper, ineffable feeling that you can understand from the perspective of a tree. And when you become a tree, you lose the perspective of a human being and cannot take it. What distinguishes a human being from a tree is not only the ability to think, but also the ability to participate in the essence of a sacred tree in its own way, and with intention. This seems obvious, but it is of great importance in this context. It does not mean that a stone into which the roots of a tree grow does not participate in the essence and substance of a tree. In the same way, the tree does not share in the nature and substance of the mountainous stone. But how great are the differences if we add a human being, a fox, a bear, a wild boar or a flock of birds.

Fuomo: I think I understand. It may be that by mixing natures, completely different beings are created. I was thinking about a story when I worked as a stable boy. A mare turned her gaze intently on me and immediately I felt a foal inside my body, located where the female human uterus is. In the next few days, with my second sight, I noticed a blue and gold figure. Half horse, half human, a proud young centaur strode through the stables. As if myths were coming to life. Based on this teaching, I may assume that not only do species of the same kind mix to produce offspring, like the human male and female. But also that crossed species of the aetheric worlds mix. I once met a Neptunian etheric mermaid with whom I intermingled, and she gave me a child in that watery abyss. It thrives joyfully in her spiritual worlds, to what extent and according to what laws? for surely something must regulate even such promiscuous relationships?

Peripsol: The flourishing mass of life in all living worlds would represent to the average human perception something of awe, terror, horror, joy, beauty and grotesqueness.

Fuomo: Are these worlds great in life but invisible? That would not put an end to reproduction, and that would lead to various human diseases, mental and physical, if these wonders were unbound in their reproduction. They would mix too much with the sleeping, blinded people.

Peripsol: If there is a limit, who set it? Nature and the invisible nature of philosophers and seers regulates itself in accordance with what it deems agreeable. So it has been since primeval times of life, even in the invisible worlds. In the bestiaries of myths there are different natures, but each world has its own composition, its closeness and its distance to human beings. Among the natural philosophers, one of the most prominent was Paracelsus, he also tried to understand. As he interacted with the worlds he saw and with which he interacted. The great Sosipatra, the first among the Neoplatonic magicians and theurgists, was also gifted with the Second Sight.

Fuomo: I wonder what she would say about these invisible worlds if I had more refinement and approached her immortal mind, but I dare not.

Peripsol: Do not be ashamed, the most vulgar spirits have been transformed into divine ones through such apprenticeships.

Tonalities of Intellect and Elysia

Fuomo: In the past, when I was a little boy, I experienced many feelings that were as natural as they were lived through. Then I thought it was shameful to feel, and as a man I gave myself over to superficial experience. Later, when madness hunted me down, I burned with a flame of passions until they burned out completely and were struck down with an iron bar. When we are tested by fierce passions, we either destroy ourselves, mortify ourselves, or learn to control and restrain our minds and bodies. When we break under misfortunes and fall into iniquity, we can either grit our teeth strongly, overcome them fiercely, or fall into despair. This terrible henchman, empty callousness, this killer of life, indifference, this sterner than all mankind, by whose weapons we stiffen and become cruel. This reaper of evil. Between these two, the alchemy of my mind and my feeling, I was torn into great misery. There was a small blooming white rose that slowly rose to the intellect. This rose of pure ideas and forces, which was transferred to man from above, provoked many constellations and networks of experience. What the hypostasis of intellect is for reason, the philosophical sun is. What the hypostasis of feeling is to emotion is the Elysia (Gr. beautiful or creative, divinely inspired). Both participate in the passionate, animated living ideas. In my life I have felt raw humanity, deep detachment, the delirium of ecstasy and the joy of mutation. I participated in focused playfulness, engaged thoughtfulness, hammer-hard concentration, lusty strength. I felt noble heavy awe, disciplined restraint, rapt longing, weeping compassion, purposeful strength. I was overwhelmed with satisfying callousness, contented determination, hedonistic synthesis, shallowness of spirit, trickster wisdom, humorous spectacle. I felt loving heavy maturity, withdrawn nihilism, committed determination, resigned hope, cunning playfulness. I also experienced deflated persistence, chaotic obsession, coquettish pixism, foolish malice, cruel retribution, unrestrained violence. I felt light calm, undirected melancholy, helpless broken-heartedness, demotivated emptiness, empty longing, pure destruction, cold indifference. I shared in analytical hatred, logical annihilation, measured benevolence, furious revenge, poetic rapture, angry justice. I understood strained perversion, light-handed folly, liberating mercy, sublime awe, glorious conquest, mortifying cynicism, paralyzing defenselessness. I also shared in debilitating mildness, philistine satiety, imperious charisma. I will end my enumeration here, although many more conditions could be described. I cannot dismiss all these thoughts, emotions and feelings as mere biopsychological states. Some of them belong to instinctual, feeling, intuitive threads. Others belong to the rational, deep-thinking, intellectual, soulful aspects of the whole. How do the strands of the forces of pure ideas, which are felt only when seriously withdrawn, connect in this way, as if the masks were removed from our naked soul and spirit? As if the currents of living feeling flow ineffably through our veins and the wholeness of our being? So how to explain these forces, astralistic rays, corrupted powers and living powers, energies, when we know that they are not near us? We open ourselves to them as if we were filled with the true living forces of the cosmos, focusing them through us and modulating them? There is a difference between the biochemically generated functions of the emotional-instinctual animal and the interpretation of uncanny forces and entities by our cognitive-emotional apparatus. The soul interprets the impulses of the forces in the most comprehensible way for the thinking, living mind. Therefore these sensations are always reduced and are often confused with self-generated ones. Elysia are something completely different!

Peripsol: These forces and living ideas and feelings of which you speak also fill the cosmos. The way a person receives impressions and seals from them is a gigantomachy from which deeply feeling people flee and pursue them. They want to free themselves from them, or they consciously seek their experience. The Buddhist who wants to put an end to suffering, the mystic who wants to receive love. Everything is in motion. The Hindis think that these movements are not without character, are thrown as seeds into the world and the cosmos, and blossom and decay as Shakti. The one who is touched by great compassion and recognizes the image of the world cries and weeps and laments. The other with a strong heart gives in and considers what can be done. Still another wraps his sorrow in poetry, another invests his bliss in magnificent revelations, according to the dew of sorrow and the honey of joy he has gathered from the world. The real people, uninfluenced by these games, are always empty. They are like the banks of the rivers of the world, they are like springs from which others gather. When they are full again, they separate from these streams. The joyful madman or a sorrowful madman. The first one dances, shouts and screams, babbles like a child, the second one cries, suffers. Look at this picture and compare it with the stiffness of the well composed people, notice the difference in intensity. Look at it from a broader perspective, this world is flooded with all forms of misery and joy. The madman – ah – in delirium he expresses these storms of nature. The wild baccantes tearing up an animal, a tiger feasting on a Hindi saint, the Dionision party leaving Alexandria, packs of French werewolf raiders attacking villages and the troops of medieval madness, dances of St. Vitus in convulsions and maniacal, pain-filled laughter, the ships of the insane sailing from port to port. Are you proud that you have returned to sanity? That you have turned sanity from madness into order? See how it falls, how it breaks! I understand your need for it, but for the sake of Providence, do not build fortresses to shut yourself off from the world. Immerse yourself in it, feel the worries that keep you from dancing, from shouting, from singing! You sublimate them into an art by regulating the flows of these forces. Your pettiness in austerity is both pathetic and beautiful, for you kill the inner impulse but form a wonderful statue. Decide – what are you chiseling, a stone, a man, or a god? Or maybe smash this monument for yourself. Otherwise, like a narcissist, you will worship the work of your life as stone and not as life! The art of a Pygmalion that escapes you! Destroy your art, work in the streams of life! Create anew, or skip the demiurgic work!

Intelligencers of Planets and Stars

Fuomo: Yesterday, when Mars was above the horizon in the medium coeli, I was thinking about a theorem that says that physical astronomy is similar to the study of shadows. In this case, philosophical astronomy would be the study of essences. In astronomical terms, I know the hot surface of this planet, its orbit, the time it orbits the sun, and other characteristics that are consistent with the orbits of other planets in the solar system. I also know that there are hidden worlds that I have come to know through true experiences in sightings and working with them. Like the earth, they are inhabited by various spirits in their own order of worlds of both ascended mortals and gods throughout history and time, though not limited to these classes. Those of the ancient powers and those of the future orders yet to come. I greeted a Neriacian messenger, saluted in deliberate silence, requested an audience, and a sent spirit floated gloriously from the direction of Mars. He entered Earth's orbit and atmosphere, his orange light shining, and watched me for a while, perhaps trying to figure out my intentions. Another took my body, a female spirit from Venus, while

I was on the night bus returning from the library. I felt swarmed with warm, soft, feminine, luxurious energy from every fellow on the bus. Am I correct in thinking that when a connection is made by intention, the movement of a thought can summon spirits and greet them? That they come of their own volition and that there are countless of these spirits? Am I correct in assuming that within the general nature of a particular planet there are many individual spirits? That they belong to its sphere of influence, some of human origin, some sinister, some divine? Should I rely on the ancient tales of the nature of planetary spheres and stellar vaults? Should I still rediscover their mystical properties and test each of them for myself?

Peripsol: You assume that what you see and experience is such and such. But beyond the surface of your experiences there are deeper revelations. Do not be distracted by an insightful understanding of philosophy, which reveals occult insights in proportion. As long as it brings you closer to the Divine through the work of the intellect, so much the better! Otherwise, you will get lost in saturation with everything you see, hear and experience and settle for purposeless phantoms. When a child gets a toy, he plays with it for a while and then puts it aside, thinking that he has mastered it. But as an observant parent, you see that the toy is the child's play object. See the philosophy of play and think about it. The deeper meaning of the game that the child is engaging in with sincerity. In this way, your understanding is anything but vulgar, and you maintain a parental eye that sees much more than the child and his toy. With a twinkle in your eye, you see the child's future. You see his potential, the sorrow and happiness he will experience, the depths and shallows he will experience. You recognize all the hidden unknowns that are visible to a keen eye even in the child's innocent play. Otherwise, Fuomo, full of impressions and overwhelmed by them, would you fall on your knees before a small spirit that you see or that would influence you? Stand tall, worship like a strong sage!

Fuomo: Ha! That makes me cheerful! With upright arms I draw orbs and spheres around my body, sealed with sacred seals, circling, gyrating like a dervish. Thus I throw masterful games of metaphysical chess and glass bead games at the Aethyrs! I worship the starry sky, I worship the whole, En.lil mit-it-ha-ri-im: on the square field of Enlil I bow in great humility before the Mother of Stars, Kybele-Neith, smile at the smallest spirits of nature and do not retreat before the giants of the shadows. If the world would collapse, I would stand proudly and reverently and bundle all divine movements through me like a monument!

Peripsol: Beautiful pride, compared to the Akkadian king you are only a beggar, remember the story of the mocked? Do not exceed your measure of pleasure or you will be tarred and feathered, but even Akkadian kings like a good joke sometimes! You will do better in silence and with concentrated strength than with youthful recklessness. Be bold in your words, be bold in your audacity and your commitment to participate in cosmic expression if you will or can.

Al-Qabisi's worlds

Fuomo: I would like to present Al-Qabisi's (d. 967) understanding of planetary natures and combine it with the scanty knowledge of secret passages and stellar tunnels that result from the revolutions of natures and the movements of the heavenly bodies. They are like open gates to many worlds, domains, both of the solar system and the star worlds. For it seems that the natures tend to intermingle, and even the lunar cycles are influenced to varying degrees by the planets that color them. Similarly, I assume that there are not only seven spheres of the solar system, but fourteen according to ancient tradition. There are seven higher octaves and seven lower octaves, to which are added Uranus, Neptune, and Pluto before the Oort Belt. I dare not give a full account of Al-Qabisi's knowledge, as I am not an avid astrologer. However, in accordance with the development of astronomical science and astrological studies, one must read with an attentive eye and weigh with one's experience what truth might be contained therein. Moreover, we must see what we can omit, what we can consider and accept, and what we can reject in the light of modern knowledge and our occult acumen. For the sake of the task, only the characteristics of the planets in the eyes and experiences of people shall be described.

It does not capture the totality of planetary natures, nor the properties of their intermingling. It does not capture the revolutions of their natures. It merely describes what people, myself included, discovered when they looked into the movements of each planetary nature. As for the sun, our Lord, Helios represents nature, honesty, justice, spirit, science, intellect and perfection. Helios distributes his rays equally to all others, resourceful of muses. The Moon, in accordance with the nature of the other planets, has many hecatic arms. It deals with initiation, purification of the soul, sanctity, blissful coldness with splendid peace and rest, as judged by the spirits and souls living there. The qualities concentrate differently depending on the rising, full and waning moon, here the triple hounds of Hecate, here the triple hares of Artemis. Saturn is considered malefic and is an age of the ancient wise sage. I have wondered if this aspect is not only associated with the lower octaves of this planet and it is in fact useful in the higher octave in most unpredictable ways. Thus it acts as a wise teacher, cutting off superficial matters and attachments for every age of man, when one matures decidedly according to his age, for the right of a child to play is something different from that of a senator to do his business according to his age, duties and responsibilities. It has a cold and dry character and indicates melancholy. Therefore, various people at a young age who are marked by pain and suffering, or sensitive people who tend to become melancholic when they are hurt, also show saturnine traits through the law of learning, causality, and drawing on life experiences that have solidified and constitute their attitude toward the world and their way of thinking. Profound thoughts and much silence, a solitary path, but loyal to friends and those things deemed worthy enough to pursue, as well as the beliefs one holds and the deities and powers to which one is loyal. In human beings, it shows power and firmness, earthly causes, estates, supervision of activities, intelligence, boldness, toil, arrogance, and causes of death. A Saturn nature that has been injured or whose patience is broken because of its inclination, nature, life experiences, or birth, tends to do vile and evil things, cruelty and malice. Therefore, she must strive for things of ethos and intellect, and strive to defeat what is symbolic of heavy lead, and turn lead into gold, through constant alchemical efforts that contain calamity, overcome it, and refine the substance of calamity into something better, nobler, and stronger with strength and intellect. With great bravery she settles into these traits of the fatherly sage and a refined priestess-seer. Great dangers occur when nature turns bad, including vicious murders. Great good occurs when nature overcomes, great wisdom, benevolence and power. Jupiter is considered benefic and indicates youth to middle age. Al-Qabisi writes that it points to the spiritual soul, life, trustworthiness, jurisprudence, patience, truth, forbearance, fine and outstanding affairs, tolerance and potency, joy of life, the sphere is noble, royal, dignified and refined. Science, intellect and vision thrive in this sphere. Mars rules the age between youth and adolescence. It represents tyranny, bloodshed, the command of armies, haste, inconstancy, shamelessness, travel, and in younger years, stupidity. It also represents perseverance, collusion and deceit, vanity, arrogance, stubbornness, hardness, ingratitude, sharpness and quickness in all matters, easy drawing of swords in various affairs. As for

Venus, she has a calm disposition towards all, generosity, kindness, passionate love, coquettish behavior, temples and places of worship, all forms of fine arts. Of temperaments, joking, excitement, having fun, friendship, sociability, desire for entertainment and sexual intercourse. Greed, kindness and desire are his lot. Kindness, embellishments, various sexualities. As for Mercury, he deals with divinity, messages, knowledge of divine things, he indicates youth and the time of growing up. He rules public speech, rhetoric, the activities of the arts and science in relation to the divine and the philosophical Sun.

Peripsol: Even if you were to study the nature of the planets and draw upon narratives from the past, you would not be able to grasp each of them as your language allows. Nor would you respond to the changes in the solar system perfectly. Depending on how you see them, they may actually see you, although natures are actually at work and the task of creating a map of their tendencies is a good undertaking. The number of threads and portals between these planets, and thus the intermingling of their natures as received on Earth, is manifold. Embedded in a stellar environment and the spheres of the archons of new and old generations, of this and other world systems, we come to a rather formidable but quite noble task. Not to cast doubt on your work, you approach Providence by imagining that you are a small luminous body that others influence above you and that orbits around you. You are embarking on an upward movement toward the starry sky as harmonies synchronize despite the opposition of all these forces and inclinations. If you look inward, you will find spiritual alchemical gold growing between Nigredo and Albedo through various stages as you ascend the Mithraic ladder. As you look outward, you will see spheres and their movements, and as you move your intellect through the sun into the glorious fire of infinity, you will find yourself in the fields of gold that you refine within, burning all imperfections into nothingness. The insights appear according to necessity, preparation, search and need.

Thanatheurgist

Fuomo: When I recall all the cases of death that I have experienced in my life, I have found that our civilization is well protected from any deprivation. If I remember all the forms of death that I have seen with the Second sight, it seems that our world is ruled by countless tribes of the dead. Am I a modern epopteion? Peripsol, when I refer to death, would I call families of spirits and celestials dead just because they have no body? They are not alive in our sense, but they are more alive than I am, it seems. Just like you, Peripsol, they are full of life but do not possess an animal, generative body as I do. Should we limit the knowledge of the dead only to those who are separated from life yet exist in death? Something other than those who have lived but continue to live in death and the afterlife? According to the ancient doctrine of bios, thanatos, bios, resumed as life into death into life, taking into account the transmigration of souls, metempsychoses, birth and rebirth in bodies that nature bears, as well as ethereal? As a victim of my grief and exhaustion, I have twice attempted suicide, consecrating and commending myself to the gods. I survived. Later, I read the Egyptian papyri from Berlin a conversation "A man who was tired of life". In this papyrus, the soul of the Egyptian advises him to overcome and live, because aggression against himself would lead to an anomaly in which consciousness would be exterminated. Since then I have not taken my own life, perhaps forewarned, perhaps defiant in the face of what I have survived so far, and struggle for survival is a powerful motivator. Later, how to distinguish the shadows that are cacodaimonic in origin from the shadows of the dead? Like the auric souls of the dead, as well as their aethyr bodies. I have seen many kinds and genera of the dead among their manifold tribes. They differ from each other, some of them are divided by species and kind. So, each element of the pitch-black soul radiates a storehouse of the qualities and tendencies with which it was associated in life? How to distinguish an essence from its lack, a shell from the fullness of its essence?

Peripsol: Nothing is lost in nature. The living people mistakenly assume that primary empiricism is enough. They believe that the body, the mind and the feelings are immediately cut off into the forgotten non-existence with the death of the brain. For not only one soul, but many functional souls, each with a different substance, can remain posthumously in different states, as if radiating in beta-decay or preserved. Their own aliveness is expressed, either integrated as a unity and cooperating. Or, at worst, separated like broken mirrors and unconsciously relating to each other as they fade. Although they can be seen as separate compositions and blends, this is merely a delineation. Most of them have their basis in life, so they are biopsychic. Some may originate from past lives or be entirely ethereal. When they originate from different substances, they become pneumatogeneric and thus pneumatic. When the biopsychism meets pneumogenesis, something splendid may be born.

Fuomo: So when a shell of the mind is caught in suffering and the heart is caught in sorrow, do we identify with these living – or non-living – but suffering shells? Do we deal with them as some necromancers do, assuming useful but lifeless shells of the dead that can be used for personal purposes? Or do we exploit what lives and feels? If shadows and skia of the dead respond intelligently to gestures, and the Egyptian priesthoods of Anubis invoked deceased priests with respect, what are the ethics? People consulted them with great respect to learn secrets and consult them in the affairs of the living. Often the shadows of the dead knew more about many things than the living. They were not bound by space and often had better prophetic insight into time.

Peripsol: I am not going to get into necromancy issues with you, but when you see suffering, how do you deal with it? When an animal suffers and you are moved, you have found your answer. Not to torment the shadows. If the priesthoods of Eleusis relieved the suffering of skia, eidola, and shadows of the deceased through offerings of melicraton and incense, what is your answer? If they turned to psychopomps and deities to appease the ever-growing army of the dead, what is your answer? Do you remember Du Fu, the Chinese poet who mentioned the lake of Koko Nor? Warriors wondered and spirits wailed unburied with their apparitions seen by travelers. Hindis and Buddhists made offerings to the dead to free them from the misty white hells of misery and thirst. How can you imagine that mistreating these dead would do any good?

Fuomo: You are right about that. But then we would have to assume that the world is constantly growing by an innumerable army of the dead. At least since the times when the rites that made their passage possible were banned, destroyed, censored or forgotten. A rather grim affair that would show that the world is populated more by the dead than by the living, and the earth is truly a living graveyard! I see manifestations of the dead by the living as the veils thin, but it is hard to believe... the horror, the horror.

Peripsol: Hush, not a word, the task of the Palin Hikousi, those who travel from light to darkness and from darkness to light, is also to bring hope and to uplift these manifold spirits and skia or to dissolve and extinguish them. There is hope for the unfortunate.

Fuomo: I remember an eidolon that dissolved in the wind, a great shadow of a suffering man. It turned into all the colors of the rainbow before finally dissolving into thin air.

Peripsol: He broke the chains. For his shadow was nothing but the captured light of the soul that wrapped itself tightly around him.

Fuomo: As you wish, I will remain silent on this subject. Let me move on to the divine mysteries. For if I understand correctly, the gift of immortality comes down from heaven. Its substance is the image of a refined divinity, which develops through the simultaneous occupation with life. The balance and harmony must be developed within. From a coarse and uncouth material, the God-body cannot be sublimated, but from these fragments of reverence and surpassing delight. It is of understanding and mercy, of longing and grandeur, of all nobility and strength of character. They defy unjust and shameful things, protest and rebel against ignorance and malice that obscure knowledge and worthy things. Even if for a moment of our life we correct such high feelings by countless alchemical movements of our mind, emotions, intellect and feelings, this can lead to madness, obsession, great austerity and the most withdrawn thoughts that nevertheless soar to heaven like Egyptian falcons. Not all of them can be enumerated and named, although there are many names of the god-body Ptahil, manifold deities and divinities. Many splendidly enlightened sons and daughters who feel these Caducean instances as an equilateral cross on our bodies. Sealed on the solar plexus, where the belt of immortality crosses, on the left side of Jupiter and the right side of Saturn. There golden spheres circle, around the head a halo, as if crowning an Acephalus. Here the gods ennoble every moment they deem worthy. They combine the moments in the most beautiful proportions and construct a godly body for the mortal spirit to inhabit after it has been posthumously translated. From a mortal man — into an angel or a demigod, a deity. Here all the impurities and gross things of the earth are left to the snares of Arachne and burned to nothing. Thus intellect and severity are placed on the right, while mercy and benevolence on the left. Intellectual undertakings, crowning many a marvelous thing with laurel wreaths and a solar wreath surrounding the head for a while. They preserve all these instances of life as if they accumulate to a splendor worthy of a new god. It seems that the heavens need constant companions in the work and expression of the cosmic order. When they discover a substance to work on, they toil until that substance is transformed into gold. The participation of the strong-willed artifex and princepsa is a necessary call to receive. In my opinion, the work of Homoiosis Theion, Theion Ergon and Theurgy is based on this. All the sacred paths that connect mortals to the divine seal, a focal point of all the other powers of a mortal, where the will, if not obscured, resides with the immortal name above it. Thus death is conquered, and genius flourishes!

Peripsol: Your teaching is incomplete and often erroneous, but as you know, I must not reveal to you what you cannot intuit yourself. Treasures are revealed, but the interpretations of these sights, sensations and experiences are truly only yours. You and I are one, although we are separate. You cannot grasp my perfection, but only a mere trace that your mortal mind is capable of. So, you diligent writer, good luck and solve your mystery!

Virtues of Rome

Fuomo: I was guided and protected by many ancient thoughts that gave me relief. They saved me from paralyzing states of lackluster insignificance. I am indebted to books written by masters of their time. Those silver insights that seem timeless insofar as humanity can still relate to them, that are not consigned to oblivion. For a book is a representative face of the author. Yet an author cannot be reduced to his books. Sometimes a book surpasses the author and is more magnificent than the author himself! Sometimes it is the other way around – then we are dealing either with an outstanding man or woman or with a mediocre book at best!

Peripsol: When you learn to walk the paths of the masters and mistresses, you take your own guideposts along the way. After you have matured and harnessed the earlier path, you begin to pioneer in your own way. You begin to pave the way for your heirs. Enriched by your own mental caligraphy, thought syntax, cognitive style, and arsenal of ideas to further inspire them. You build on your ideas, and hopefully others, to contribute to this blossoming.

Fuomo: This is my will, my holy daimon. It is my will to inspire others to do great and magnificent things. It is to convey supernatural experiences in an esthetic form for the knowledgeable and acceptable for the hesitant. It is also to distract the ignorant and rude so that they do not tear the blood from my veins. To protect it from spitters, contestants and contemptous who would not understand or endure a day of my past heroic attitudes. Now that the dust has settled and the detractors have retreated, I will continue to write as best I can. Allow me, then, to expose the Via Romana, whose acquaintance has led me to remain defiant and has saved me a great deal of trouble. In this conversation I would like to ask you, O Peripsol, what you think about the particular values and virtues that the Romans held in such high esteem. In my delirium of madness, I was first saved by the meditations of the Stoic Beast of God, Auriol Thrion, Marcus Aurelius. His powerful House of Ausel was greatly honored by one of the greatest emperors of Rome. I remember the great boon these memoirs and reflections granted to my weary, still living soul. They ordered my mind possessed by madness and calmed my insanity, while I turned my spiritual inner eye to the mighty stars in thanksgiving for this work. I must admit without boast or vain pride that years later the Saturnine Emperor visited me in spirit. Together we stood there, with laurel wreaths on our heads and a toga of brilliant golden-silver light wrapped around my body. I was accompanied by his dignified, noble soul, which dominated my mind and body with its eyes in the highest splendor. The same soulful eyes that used to oversee armies, carry out reforms, and govern the far-reaching provinces of Rome. Soulful eyes that appreciated philosophy and his beloved people and now visit a dedicated, humble son of the earth. A star with a fatherly look and soothing compassion, a wonder of temperate and perfectly self-controlled character. Moreover, of unshakable nature, marked by virtue and excellence.

Peripsol: To do justice, one of his loyal soldiers visited you the very next day.

Fuomo: As he welcomed my body and spirit with his soul, we ate a hearty meal, tough, war-steeled, even rough in a soldierly way. If the emperor's spirit visited me, it was the justice of one of his soldiers. I found him as shrewd as a wild boar, inasmuch as my mind and feeling interpreted correctly. Continuing my adventurous stories, I find myself compelled to speak of the virtues to which Roman citizens aspired.

Peripsol: Please explain how you understand the Via Romana, because you seem to be convinced of the ideals that are presented here.

Fuomo: Let me first state the virtue of auctoritas, which is formed of mercurial quicksilver into a light feather of steel that adorns laurels. It is the crown of maturity in which the experiences of one's life find a strong resolution. It matures with time, insight, wisdom and discernment, reason, and finds itself in a paternal and maternal way of looking at a society. It is directed outward to the invisible worlds. It is the inner power of conviction based on trust in the past years. An inner force of conviction that what is relied upon, whether attitudes, beliefs, or methods of interacting with the world, has proven to be sharp and strong. Things that endure despite all assaults by idiots (gr. unwise) or other forces of ignorance, darkness and vileness. Against them they are strong as fortresses and open their gates only to those from whom one has learned in the discernment of their wisdom and knowledge and to whom one has imparted their knowledge, according to will and need. For a sage it is the strength of his inner truth, for a senator it is a social position gained through merit and service, for a scholar it is the fruit of his works and his reputation. For only the disgraced lose the sense of authority and fall, but charismatic authority is the true auctoritas, the commanding power that rises from the depths of one's geniuses, that flame of motives, deeds and actions that can be humbled but never extinguished unless silenced when necessary or weakened by age and illness.

Peripsol: A curious exposition, but of what use is this true or perceived auctoritas of which you speak without other virtues? Obviously it cannot do without other virtues, otherwise it will collapse and soon fall apart like a temple without colonnades?

Fuomo: I see, Peripsol, that sometimes your voice speaks the truth of Providence, sometimes it is curious, sometimes it is somewhat malicious, sometimes it is helpful. I know my mind speaks many voices, but I rely on my senses to detect any form of mischief in the metamorphoses and transmigration as we continue this conversation. When my sun angel leaves for a while, I will talk to you, Buer, about the ethos and moral philosophy of antiquity, and with all due respect to the Goes and spirits of Greece and others let us talk.

Buer: For a mortal much younger than our ancient daimonic races, a familiar infernal knight has been sent to converse with an old friend who surpasses the plans.

Fuomo: So greet your crowns and princes and other relatives, I will not trouble you further.

Ombo, the knight: Lord, let us talk to each other.

Fuomo: Comitas was the virtue that led people to take with humor anything that was instructive, benevolent or of deadly wit and was received with respect by both sides, or that led to swords being drawn when the wrong words were spoken in the wrong places and between parties that tended to anger those present. The seventh book of the Saturnalia of Macrobius repeats what Eustathius tells us about bad treatment: "Besides vituperations – Greek psogos – and calumnies – diabole – there are two Greek terms – loidoria and skomma – perhaps directly insulting accusations, whereas I would almost say that skomma is an oblique kind of teasing, since it is often obscured by a deceptive or urbane facade, so that it sounds like one thing, although it is heard as another." Remember, then, the friendly way in which it is better to joke with courtesy and frankness, which in fact leads to clementia, mercy, inner peace and harmonious balance, it is the forgiveness that finds no fault, the

'Amor Vincit Omnia' of the great Virgil. It is mercy in judgment, in dealing with an enemy after we have triumphed over him, and in personal action when we have to deal with troublesome people, closely connected with silence and looking the other way at all sorts of little transgressions that lowly people often smuggle into everyday life in the belief that they will cunningly escape the attention of more experienced foxes. Then we must not fail to mention dignitas, a sense of self-worth based not on faulty or wrong undertakings, but on genuine pride that should not be confused with bombastic gushing. Is a lion proud? Their pride cannot be hurt because it is based on the fundamentals of their being, in superiority they shine, in exile they nourish it in secret. The ability to withdraw pride in humility means that there is no false pride. However, dignity or the sum of one's accomplishments and a code followed by a person growing into his backbone are not the same as honor – the latter can be destroyed and ruined by a single scoundrel, we can be slandered at the hands of a group of such bastards and lose our good reputation. Dignity emanates from honor, but if the latter has no name, dignity remains. Dignity can be slandered and ridiculed, but when it is upright, it shines; when it is bent by humiliating circumstances, it returns to itself when the situations are over, as if there were no loss to bear. It is closely related to firmitas, determination, strength of will and an indomitable spirit, the ability to stay the course to the end, to follow the given waypoint, that is, the goal with motivation. Firmitas is also a way of dealing with enemies, because if the cause is good and invites attack and violence, standing still and biting through obstacles is a commendable endeavor. It is not to be confused with stubbornness, which persists in sick, unwise attitudes. What is stubborn can be changed, but when we are dealing with stubborn baseness that attacks our steadfastness, then it is time to draw swords and get rid of such idiots, or change company if we may.

Ombo: Do I need to say that you are stubborn in your undertakings, do you feel enlightened by your talks, do you know the beginning and the end? Although it is a beautiful enlightenment that fits perfectly in today's times, there must be a wide audience for whom you write?

Fuomo: Despite your wise mockery, you living spirit, I perform a Faustian work that pretends to be redemptive in a Promethean way. I am aware that I am a little man who studies his books, who guards the lost treasures of his intellect, who I am, no more, no more. The gardens I tend are mine, but let others walk in them if they wish. Speaking of gardens: frugalitas, thrift, frugality, simplicity, without being excessively poor, which uses one's possessions according to their usefulness and necessity for one's life. For according to wealth one applies one's means. If one is rich, one is generous like a philanthropist who seeks nothing but to contribute to the good, or one spends too much like some who have acquired a new fortune that is a thorn in the side of the poor, because one spends in one place what the other bleeds in the sweat of his brow in the life of his family. Yes, if we are gifted with modest means, we also carry ourselves in a balanced way with proper means to proper needs. Then gravitas, a Saturnian quality of responsibility and precision, is a serious commitment that does not shirk duties, a dedicated attitude that works for good goals and efforts.

Ombo: And how will you judge whether a goal or effort is good when hell is paved with such great intentions and deeds?

Fuomo: Let us rely here on the letters of Iamblich that even the greatest natures that turn to evil become corrupt and terrible, and even the greatest undertakings can end in disaster if the roots are not right.

Ombo: When I look at this world, it seems that small people who are convinced that their undertakings are monoliths of human achievement are building a house of cards.

Fuomo: The weaknesses of this house of cards become even more apparent when it collapses, because when bloated enterprises, false plans are hidden and grow, time eventually destroys them. People of character see and observe, when they see that they cannot change anything, they bet on the rapid change of times in the future, even if they say goodbye to life for a long time, maybe what they create will flourish later or perish with time like the times they tried to avoid, but this is a matter of fate and chance. This virtue, Honestas, is a picture of sincerity towards the world, without guile or hidden motives that one does not need to hide, because the things that he cares for and that make up his life speak for each other and are united, homogeneous, transparent natures, strong and open to the gods – Veritas! why should they put up with any vile machinations? In this humanitas, humanity, sublimity of thought and action, education and culture as in the Hellenes, science also contributes to the open dealings with people and the gods, because if you meet a vile person, be the judge, it is better to hide things and reveal them only to people who are guided by similar things. But we do not counteract our nature, we only reveal what is necessary, better to be silent than to lie, better to be reserved and strict than to display unworthy behavior in the midst of different societies and imitate their behavior – such a masquerade risks that we lose our own nature and replace it with that of the bad society! And now to the Industria, of which the noble bee is an example. Macrobius says that we should imitate the bees "that wander about, tasting the flowers, arranging what they have gathered, distributing it among the cells of the honeycomb, and by the peculiar quality of their own spirit transforming the different kinds of nectar into a single flavor." This is the meaning of Industria, which fits perfectly with human societies. Pietas is a deep sense of respect for order and tradition, both political (polis) and religious, it means sacrificing oneself for the good and promoting what is valuable. Here Servius Suplicius has recorded that "religious scruple" [religio] is the term that refers to something that keeps a certain sacredness away from us and apart, as if the term is derived from "leave behind" [relinquere], just as "reverence" [caerimonia] is derived from "having lack" [carere]; relegere [to verify/tell] or religare [to bind/restrain]. All these related terms serve to elevate things considered sacred, along with tradition, and to place the noblest virtues in proper relation to them, for when they become commonplace, all too tamed, they lose all their value. Thus the symbol becomes an object from which it can easily be torn and destroyed. Thus it was once said that he who subjugates the symbols of others is his own master. So defending your own symbols is a matter of preserving an identity or sacralizing what you hold sacred in order to respect it and protect it from theft or damage. So when an enemy tries to take advantage of you, you smash his symbols, when he advances, you seek protection under your seals. In tolerance, we respect each other's symbols, which are as diverse as cultures and civilizations, but when one goes against the other, the symbols, including language – a once sacred symbol system – become a tool of warfare.

Ombo: Paganus, the people of the cross have gone against you, so you detest them? Yet they too defend and attack with symbols they deem valuable.

Fuomo: True, but in their intolerance they turned against my symbols, and so I mixed their symbols with mud and depicted them as pigs digging in the mud. Was not it the same thing that the great Giordano Bruno did? With more discourse, more caution, more finesse, but with the same passion! This is a case of salubritas, of wholeness that should not be broken, a certain healthy impulse of mind, body and souls that protests against injustice that shocks the deepest of our atoms. Prudentia is a lady of reason, foresight and wisdom, she gives the rhythm and the dictum to follow. A simple person can be wise but unsophisticated, a person of generous character can be sophisticated but foolish, but do not dare to test the wisdom of a patient person or he will become your bloody enemy!

Ombo: How can you combine these virtues you speak of, I have observed you and you are flawed.

Fuomo: I am not striving for perfection or to be made a stone of virtue, but striving and acting in unison, if they are honest and understood with reason — that is how you perfect nature or make it whole, in other words — holy, sanctified like the symbols we have been talking about. Benjamin Franklin had a method of correcting himself and evaluating his progress, as a free and responsible man should do, in order to change what was less than right and to promote the good in his character. Such introspection with memories is indeed a great tool. I see that Peripsol has arrived. Ombo, I will not banish you, but politely ask you to return to your realm.

Ombo: Farewell!

Peripsol: I overheard your conversation from afar, the Buddhists realized that: One is chained to the golden chain of virtue, the other to the iron chain of vice, and yet it is better to be freed from a golden chain than to fall under the rule of the cold iron fetters of a slave.

Fuomo: Rightly, better to die nobly and with dignity, may Angeronia Volupia, restraint and persuasion, reward the silence of what has been endured, than to give in to vice, which as a vile poison not only poisons our minds and hearts, but often transmits the disease to others — it should be controlled and fought fiercely within.

Against the Tide

Fuomo: Peripsol, Sun Knight, two days ago I performed a meditation in the nocturnal hour of Venus, which is elevated at night and suitable for magical operations. I was working near the riverbank, away from people, with a hermit candle for the drowned and their shadows. I intended to perform a great operation, but in the simplicity of the moment I merely gave myself to monadic contemplation like a nightingale. I merged with the surroundings before the day and the hour of Saturn dawned, as my paternal planet cruelly taught me. I am calling you now to inquire humbly about a matter that has cornered me. I had reached a certain threshold of understanding beyond which I cannot go, but I am too ashamed to put it into words all by myself.

Peripsol: I, an idea that merges with the subject of your mind, know what the movements of your heart are. For the support of the gods is the objective intelligibility of all the worlds, united by a Providence that directs the destinies. The question and answer you are trying to solve is this. How can upright and virtuous life dispel all shadows because it is connected with the starry heavens and divine justice? Through its own laws that illuminate the worlds and send its logoi to many worlds.

Fuomo: Let me express what I am looking for. Because in order to make oneself invincible from the deeds of evil, it is enough to turn one's self-constitution into steel, without any doubt. By throwing off all the threads that cut the fragments of the bodies of virtue and throwing them to the vultures?

Peripsol: Simple and virtuous is a man who is steadfast and principled. A man with a backbone, who strives for harmony and balance, who works for good, who fights all crooked ways within. Who rises to defy them, without forgiving – always strong, always renewed he is like Phoenix! As Master Plato said, man is neither good nor evil, he contains both potentials. In mixed form, depending on the nature and share of the mortal. Nevertheless, the whole nature can be led by cultivation to a refinement and sublime, same-directed individuation of the ingenium. A genius composed of talents is embellished by a polished character. Beware of the fanatical zeal of faith, make yourself the fighter of your inner gigantomachy, not of others. Conquer yourself, may it be the most beautiful war, that you eradicate vice with discipline. Cut off the heads of delusion, cure the poisons of vileness, cling to the starry sky like fire to wood, like fire that drinks air insatiably. The greater the longing, the more splendid the flame that is the root of rapture. By seeing the starry sky within, you burn all obscurations and impurities to make the way clear and magnificent!

Fuomo: This is recognizing virtue, following its path. Even if an idiot among the cynics, even if a fool among the thrifty, even if a dejected among the victors of the earth. In the eyes of justice a sage among the muses, a master among the caduceus-winged, a hero among the gods! May this not be banished! But may I ask, whether we can derive this also by reason and understanding?

Peripsol: You reach out and absorb the ancient past, young Olympius. An order that is maintained is splendid, a forgotten order that is revived outshines the world that has forgotten. In fallen times it is not difficult to be a master, in times of splendor it is a gigantic task to be a superior person. In fallen times, everything base and corrupt emerges victorious. In golden times, only the vermin demands its bite, but is quickly chased away. Reason, if its foundation is sound and good, produces good offspring, otherwise it may produce evil designs. But is it then not reason but irrationality, is it mere cunning working against the whole? Perceive organically, with Argus eyes, and sift what is to sift to decide, you have the treasuries of the world before your Ayin eye.

Faces of Janus

Fuomo: In my most miserable hour I call upon you, Peripsol, who drive around the sun like a divine heliodrome. I call you, who exult in the fields of the glorious Deity Star, to inquire about the seed of a thought that has sprung from my mind. Be a bridge between inspiration, intuition, reason and the intelligent transcendent. I had the idea that two guardians form, shape and transform the human Genii and Juno. In every man and woman these two forces work in discord, in agreement, complementary or antagonistic. Balancing their movements, in peace and growth, or opposing and warring, causing great chaos and confusion in the soul.

Peripsol: The separation is clear to the mind, which has such dualities as its content. But should they not be merged by refinement in a genii of which you speak?

Fuomo: This is a purely instrumental thought, but it gains flesh by sifting and separating the Janus-faced masks of the polarity of natures, of character, for they are indeed diverse and multipolar. They can be brought to a certain integrity and wholeness by making them as scales on which the genii and the heart are dissolved. Apart from the split and the personas, multiple non-incarnate forces can influence or move these tense threads. It is our Agathos Daimon that seeks to shape our genii and elevate them to the rank of the divine, while the Kakodaimon pulls on our genii and shapes them into the opposite, enveloping them in the mysteries of chthonic and chaotic black fires. They mix, merge and bathe the genii, expressing themselves through our way of thinking and our values, giving them a simple or rich character. They endow them with a benevolent superiority or a malevolent domination. They assign an inclination to nature, an attitude to action, a direction to thought, a movement to perception, a perspective to experience, passions to life, an essence to content, and define all other aspects worth describing and naming. In mutual tension, they constantly produce new situations and solutions when applied in bilateral work.

Peripsol: Do you dare to tame both daimons and control them through the spirit of your genii like a charioteer? So that it can be shaped by something higher itself? Individually, by the will and acumen of your name, balanced with intellectual, spiritual, magical potency of influence on spirits, minds and souls from below? Do not get lost in this dual way of thinking, it is superficial. From a psychological split, you can breathe life into these two companions and form psychic servants into godforms to which you become subordinate. It is even worse when inferior entities inhabit your beliefs and those psychic formations and take command of you. Your genii in the world soul is the essence of contemplation, lift it even higher. If you wish, you can understand them in this simple way to design and construct a framework for inner work guided by these two factors. Do not give them an objective reality. However, may it not deprive you of the true geniuses of Agathos Daimones and Angeli Bonum, which are independent beings that you are trying to psychologize as aspects of your mind. Do not ignore these malignant tribes that manifest themselves in many ways as demons of space, mind and spirit, ready to invade your most sacred areas if you are thoughtless and lower your defenses or indulge in stupidity. In this way, they are both psychological and true entities from the perspective of the mind, but by creating a solipsistic projection, you get into a self-inflicted loop in which you cannot discover the external world in its semi-objectivity. By believing, you form all gods out of yourself and become subject to your projections. Through a strange nihilism that leads to a self-inflicted emptiness, you place yourself outside of phenomena. You create fear of devils like in the Middle Ages, when you cannot comprehend the moderation of perception. The gods are as they are. Perceive them and receive them without acting out your own projections. You contemplate everything within the One, following the Chaldean masters. Only the deepest focus and concentration, the single pointed blade, splits it by differentiation into unison. This monad is an indivisible continuity full of essential numinosity, this diversity a chain of being that participates in it. The Babylonian word "markasu" meant "the cosmic principle that unites all things", "the support, the force and the divine law that hold the universe together". When we contemplate mere emptiness, we contemplate the pull of emptiness and sooner or later we find a thanatarchic atheistic perception of the deadly emptiness of all phenomena, but without the enlightened support to penetrate this emptiness. The perception of positive emptiness requires a master, nihilism is a mere negation – the abyss between perceptions is different. When the abyss appears not radiant and complete, but icy cold and threatening, perception is blurred. The generative realm of pain, sensation, suffering is overpowering when confronted with the endless void. Here the cold of winter becomes the cold of cosmic hell, disembodied, alien and distant. The radiant view says that this cold of the generative realm becomes the bliss of calm abiding, it becomes the rose of the pneuma and the psyche. The difference between Hades and Eleusis. So it is with all the elements. The divine fire is not a hellish fire. A sacred stone is nevertheless a stone.

Fuomo: Could these forces be the two faces of Dao, working together in harmony or, when opposed, warring with each other in great diversity, opening and contracting, in a microcosmic and macrocosmic matter? Dao is one! If the Absolute is Dao, how can we look for analogies in the generative realms?

Peripsol: This is the question of the vertical topography of the intelligible associations on the horizontal levels of perception. From a timeless sphere all the world is complete, in generative worlds time progresses and phenomena change. Essentially, it is about the ability to derive such concepts and find the right way of seeing through a paradox of their holistic understanding. When we perceive the universe and the stars as a neural network, it inflates as a network as a concept to a network of stars, analogously, when we derive the concept of divine fire that stands above the stars, we try to find similarities in the spirits that inhabit this world. But these bridges are mere approximations that cannot find all the values and variables that can be translated in both directions, for all stages of the process. In fact, all the horizontal levels would have to be known in relation to vertical notions in order to be properly measured and associated, to bring them into a structure and to understand them adequately.

Fuomo: So I understand that I can make endless assumptions, but it is the grasping of a meditor that is non-transferable and ultimately effective in the completion of the work that should be pursued in the first place, not in any vain conceptualizations of this kind?

Peripsol: I will tell you an occult secret. At the point of the symposium of your daimons, the fruit given to the genii is the absolute movement of your spirit.

Fuomo: May I take dominion over both, thank you Angeli Bonum, agathodaimonic intelligence of the Sun.

Dragons' Sumerian Holy Tree of Life

Fuomo: Peripsol, dear Guardian of Solar Origins, we stand here in times of social unrest and political turmoil, yet it is important to recognize that on a planet of hominids who have barely evolved from a common mitochondrial lineage, there are many miracles, spiritual lineages, genealogies, families of unseen tribes on Earth. Both in the hidden spheres of the planets and in other world systems that I have known in the flesh and disincarnate, the broadly human, ape-like evolutions, characterized by encephalization and especially by symbolization and thought, utility and transformation, have approached and distanced themselves from hidden, occult worlds with their understanding of these processes. That even science is a mute, formalized echo of a hidden, objective truth, that every mystical, magical, spiritual school ever brought into being and taught on earth is a figment of a particular doctrine – again, in great obscurity, often failing to grasp the depth of that world, or in great depth, rarely approaching its insightful understanding. My question is simply this: how is it that, on the basis of mere conjecture, assumption, or unsubstantiated understanding, we often project with certainty our stomach, libido, and lesser psychic complexes onto the apophatic, intangible, elusive divine of the world? A human being who may have the possibility of becoming a minor deity through the law of analogy within the world, through complex occult transformations that are so easy to neglect and fail that I will not cite them here for lack of certainty for the realization of my own work until I succeed or, in sheer nakedness, admit my failure. I wish you good luck in the transfer of my pneuma into a god-body of aethyrian power, a dragon-winged star-born, which the gods, the planetary archons, and all the powers that endowed me with this immortality have prepared for me after I have laid aside the human flesh below in the snares of the tomb of Arachne. Thus apotheized, I acquire new tasks and duties according to time, Aion and the instructions of the cosmic will and those powers that embodied me as their dedicated, free servant and executor of their orders.

Peripsol: For every binding point within the generative area of a human animal there is a higher rectification, a prototype of the mutual becoming one, which the Egyptians called Ptahil. That the generative point of a fallus and the libidinous intertwining with the arousal becomes an aphrodisiac rectified into divine, higher, calm love, that the lungs and the sacred breath become by rectification an osiric breath that is like a cosmic wind and transmits Logos through Iynges with sacred words to the stars with his name. That there are the viscera and the stomach and the digestive system and the desire that becomes chastened to the passionless abiding in the fulfillment, the nullification of all generative needs. That the blood vessels and the heart that pump the blood are transformed into an immortal, sentient heart that is a commander of the Ba, the soul of all that has evolved from our most sacred movement of emotions. The nervous system and serpentine energies are gradually transformed into a spirit liberated by an individual and collective will, contributing to a cosmic expression. That eventually the form, muscles, skin, bones, marrow, etc. are stripped away and form a new vehicle that is transformed into a divine armor that houses all of this. That the crown of the head is the triumphant mediator of the wholeness of intellect, of intelligence, of grasping the laws of knowledge and depth, which correspond to the deep, infinite, transcendent world. The secret of the feminine must be discovered by a female queen-master, so I will not share with you any secret of Kybele-Hekate, may the star-ladies and bull-queens have their say if they wish.

Fuomo: Am I to understand that all animals and plants have some components of these refinements, and that a human being, through the secret of his self-reflection, has the ability to develop such advanced concepts, liberated by the creation of keys, lock picks, and great movements of which another form is incapable, and that the main function of all human liberation is therefore feeling and reflection, especially aided by spiritual and magical techniques that focus them?

Peripsol: Before you call a human being a coronation, think about it – in the midst of the holistic evolution of nature and generative realms focused by a demiurgic analogy in the Tao of phenomena, enveloped by shells or – if you will – veils, the human form is the only one, known in this world system, which has certain abilities, much underused nowadays, that allow it to correct and transcend, little one born from an oceanic womb, spread your wings from the telluric worlds to fly above! For only a human can call a world human, for a fox the world is entirely a fox, but dare to call a mortal human a hawk, when there are dragons looking down, and sparrows among men do not believe in eagles among them.

I am Us

Fuomo smoked a cigarette in front of the house. His holy guardian angel, an immortal demigod, descended, took his body and merged with his spirit for a while. Fuomo felt golden wings on his back and an all-pervading silence of divine power.

"It is you" — he thought — "It is me" — he thought in togetherness.

He concentrated fully on the monadic concentration and felt completely at ease in his divinity, uniting the powers of silence and concentration in a mortal shell. He looked at the full moon as two intertwined squares, one rotated at 45 degrees giving an octagon, slowly rotated, emanating from Luna.

-"I am now your mortal mask" -he thought. "Good evening Peripsol, Vesperian friend, let us speak to each other through an act of what the Sufis call Tajjali.

Peripsol: I am your illusion and you are mine, can you grasp this idea?

Fuomo: Above this demiurgic world there are thrice, twice and once transcended worlds, as stated by the Tetrad of Isis, Osiris and Horus, beyond which there is absolute nothingness, so taught the Chaldean masters, these timeless and spaceless realms consist of endless, fiery light, beyond which there is nothingness, the process of combustion is the path to Nirvana, endless light and Pari-Nirvana, the exhaustion of all colored, tainted energies in the world, am I to understand this to mean that in ascending I eliminate my entire being from the universe?

Peripsol: Each veil is a unity of composite aggregates of all your movements throughout the existence of your consciousness, in other words, the universal consciousness is invested in each subject of its contemplation, such subjects create co-dependent, co-emergent networks that stain themselves with new colored energies and separate themselves by the power of self-grasping, investing more energy in their own subjects, as in the masks of metempsychosis, transmigration, reincarnation in this and myriads of other worlds across the trichiliocosm. In other words, through an act of separation, they create their own microcosm in which they either play the illusion, perceive the illusion as true, or withdraw into other worlds.

Fuomo: So I understand that you are an accumulation of these composite aggregates, i.e. samskaras, inasmuch as I am a mask that wears infinity, but you are an angel, and I am a mortal who is embodied, heroized to you as a safe haven through time beyond time, contacting me in the now.

Peripsol: If the Logos of Atum were to withdraw completely, I would be a mere shell, a puppet or a play, like you, but you are a pneumatic, an owner of your spirit, do you think that the movements of the illusory egos would disappear?

Fuomo: They are like holograms of corrupted energies, the painter invests something in his painting, but the painting is his image, but not the painter

Peripsol: Right, if the painter stopped being and reached pari nirvana, would the painting still be there?

Fuomo: Exactly, but if the painter wants to continue painting?

Peripsol: Then he inhabits new paintings, but he ceases to be the same painter who is struggling in co-creation.

Fuomo: There is another question concerning my friend, whom I wanted to meet one day in the stars, I lost her on earth.

Peripsol: Yes?

Fuomo: We become mere illusions, divine illusions, but never...

Peripsol: I will comfort you, in divine robes, as long as she is present, you will meet again, something completely different, something glorious.

He smiled and disappeared.

Eons of Aions

Fuomo: After the wondrous representation of the planetary natures, dear Peripsol, outshining glory, armored divinity with a Mercurian helmet of solar intellect, I would like to ask how the intelligences and the natures of the planets come about?

Peripsol: As has already been stated, ideas are not something without life, and they are forces imbued with energies, from the simple monadic One to more diverse ones, shot off by the Artemisian arrow of dyadic binarity, whose angles and complexities evolve in ever-increasing variety. By being so, they absorb forces that emerge fused and focused a posteriori from a priori. These existing, i.e., a priori ideas, the world emerges co-dependently, ideas being understood as forces of essential realities that in their shadow form physical objective reality. Like the physical forces, which are recorded in laws and studied by physicists, the essential forces are studied by people who perform philosophy in a scientific-theological, metaphysical sense. So, as for the genealogy of the governors or archons of the planets and the nature of the stars in this particular world system that people inhabit today, they were formed by forces and ideas that also underwent evolution during the formation of the stars, planets and the like.

Fuomo: Do I need to understand that Mars of the Hesperian geological period, which ended about two billion years ago, is different from the forces and natures it emits today, if I focus on a specific example? I recall a book by Stanisław Lem and a film adaptation by Tarkovsky called "Solaris," in which the nature and natures of a planet take the astronauts completely by surprise as an alien species in a system other than the solar system and Earth. Assuming that such a journey is possible, a human would be placed in a different configuration of said forces and ideas, as you called them, Peripsol, but how does this relate to modern humans and their societies, animals, etc.?

Peripsol: Each planet brings a symposium of destinies and potentials, like a meeting of old friends — they all have an attitude to contribute, their deeds and motives centered on a community or a person sharing something. Human symposiums can be temporarily dissolved, but the planets always have their place on the Olympic summits of time. Let me explain this in the following way: The planets give out their 'ideas', that is, nature in various configurations acts symmetrically and proportionally on the life and living organisms that cluster around the star. Thus, the psyche, the souls, etc. change. They cause a certain network of co-dependent clusters of potentials, destinies, etc., arising together.

Fuomo: But how can the effects they cause be linked to the possibility of interpretation, and what actors are at work to promote such changes, and most importantly, how do they arise?

Peripsol: According to the law of concordance and similarity of natures, a lesser nature attracts the greater and is subject to the attraction of the former. An organism or life form that is aligned with certain properties of ideas-as-forces is therefore associated with the higher nature of a particular planet. Likewise, the nature of a planet can be transferred to the lives of people, their spheres of activity, their characters, their minds, and their souls. This can never be precise, because the more variables we try to extract, the less accurate our interpretation becomes. Therefore, people with a still nature or a predominantly Saturnian nature or a predominantly Mercurial nature or a predominantly solar nature, etc., are bound to the planet or star they resemble, even if they configure their soul and spirit that way, or they move away from the solar system to another world system, perhaps when their spirit frees itself from the influence of archontic domination. Most people, however, are bound to the earth and do not wander farther than the sublunary world, for to advance requires either fortunate circumstances or the Great Work, which was more popular in ancient times than it is today. Now, as for the intelligencers, they are those spirits assigned to the respective spheres of the earth, the sublunary or the supralunary worlds, in the order of the ages and eons, according to the cosmic time cycles and time circles as descriptions of a certain order resulting from the cosmic movements of the celestial spheres. Remember, then, that we are dealing with clockwork angels, messengers, i.e. genii, who are time-dependent and assigned to certain hours, days, months and years, as well as creatures of the spiritual worlds who are not time-dependent, i.e. appear everywhere and whenever they want. The former rejoice in their dependence and can rest when they do not fulfill their duties; the latter are free, but not of high rank. There are also those great forces which are bound neither to time nor to space, which transcend all this and yet appear continuously and simultaneously in our world, as if they were omnipresent. All the intelligencers are not inactive, they act continuously and consistently on the world according to their inclination;

Fuomo: Thus, from this diversity emerges the image of a perfect organization, which in its diversity displaces the seemingly clear view of a cosmos that is a cosmos and not a chaos, and yet it creates orders and complexities on so many different levels that we cannot complain that, for example, a malevolent spirit has attacked us on Earth, transported us to the Hades of the air element on Earth, although it is small, space-bound, for example, to an area, and time-dependent, while we complain that our spirit has therefore undergone a fatal negative change and we complain without even noticing that, for example, the Great Nature of the planet Jupiter has endowed us with a most noble and high destiny by its action?

Peripsol: You see it exactly, that is why perseverance, memory and persistence in work are of the utmost importance, while you must beware of excessive malice. In fact, it is you, only you, who are fighting for your magical abilities, your heart and your mind, unless you are a passive recipient of the fates of the world and allow yourself to be will-less? You can ask for help and assistance when things get darker, and equipped with this knowledge, I will leave you to your own devices, oh — one more thing — remember exactly what your last misstep was…

Fuomo: Quite irrational, I agree, my mind was deformed by that very malice.

Peripsol: Be on your guard, you are perfectly endowed with logical abilities, occasionally the sheer stupidity of vicious whims and attacks can supersede them. See the power of the enemies of your ascent into the spheres of Saturn and beyond into the stars — what have they got? They must destroy your reason, intellect, compassion and benevolence, understanding and wisdom to triumph. They cannot make you reasonable or wise, but they can ruin you into irrational stupidity, cruel malice, or careless folly. What you have built is already yours, it is your genii and star, these temporary privations are merely the frustration of our enemies trying to bite their way out of their delusion and ignorance.

Fuomo: I thank you for your comfort, I must continue my work, even if the spirit of my dragon becomes more and more disobedient, I will remain vigilant.

On Addressing the Gods

Fuomo: I beseech thee, Peripsol, to instruct me in the way of addressing the gods and goddesses of Providence, united by the greatness of the One. For I had read in Plutarch's Moralia that only circus animals kneel and all kinds of slaves and defeated barbarians. Kneeling is indeed a barbarian habit and should in no way interfere with a pagan invocation or prayer that legitimately prays and invokes with outstretched arms to heaven and the heavenly worlds, while a slave prefers to kneel and focus his attention on a corpse or its image or the false master of ceremonies who becomes the object of his worship rather than on the Divine Itself.

Peripsol: The forms and objects of prayer and invocation vary from culture to culture, but as for this strange tradition in the Levant, you are right. But listen to me, they are neither despised nor ignored, because everything that is said is heard by many. Nevertheless, it is rightly said that someone with the mentality of a slave cannot be a hero, not self-bred ignoramuses are lifted to heaven by the power of their own self-chaining. Their self-imposed chains and shackles do not allow that. As the great Avicenna once taught, 'One discovers oneself to blossom in the divine intellect through one's own intellect, as if one were enclosed in that miracle,' even Mohammad the Baphomet said that 'the ink of a sage and scholar is worth more than the blood of a martyr.'

Fuomo: Is it true, then, that laurel wreaths, which were a gift from the heavenly Muses and were bestowed upon some according to ancient traditions, were so hated by Christianity that they were rejected by the rulers of that religion, namely, Titus Flavius Clemens (150–214 ME) and Quintus Tertullianus (160–220 ME), were forbidden, nay, that they abhorred all that was noble and virtuous, to enslave with Levantine hamartology, learning and self-poisoning with sins, which a certain Pope Gregory (540–604 ME) invented and codified, carving out the Stoic virtues to his liking and inverting them in the most abominable manner, in order to torment the human idea of nobility with the vileness of his wretched ideas, and moreover, in condescension, assigned those with whom he disagreed to their most cruel and fantastic hell?

Peripsol: That is so, young historian, even nowadays the gifted, perceptive, inspired people are given wreaths by the muses and goddesses of antiquity, have you not felt any crowning your brows? Because in ancient times they were a most royal, imperial emblem. Heroes and warriors, artists, kings, emperors, great pontiffs and great men were awarded with them when they returned from battles, labored in the art of war, triumph, peace, art, science or divinity. Pliny the Elder (77 ME) reported on the early use of natural wreaths, which were often decorated with ribbons and precious stones, and sometimes they were made entirely of metal and precious stones. The crowns of statues of gods and goddesses were also equipped with such ceremonial artifacts. Tiaras and mitras were high crowns that were later transferred to popes, although they are no more than a pontiff, an administrator of belief systems who has no sanctity or solitude apart from his own flock. When Christians adopted and adapted the pagan tradition, they stripped this symbol of all it deserved and assigned it to their more mediocre personalities as a sign of triumph. As for Heaven, it listens to everything that is sincere and honest, and scoffs at the false and insincere deceptions. Why should non-Christian heavenly powers reject the tragedy of a mortal who has such and such belief systems, or why should a Yezidi and Zoroastrian winged God despise? And yet, in their delusion, people too often attribute their religious beliefs to our support and help, and thus turn disparagingly against all others. So be warned, be open-minded.

On Pratyekabuddhayana

Fuomo: Five of Cups, Mars in Sagittarius, I have been thinking about this card recently. I remembered how Siakyamuni was taught that some people are like lotuses that barely grow out of the mud of the lake, that some develop under the surface of the water and some bloom above the pond, sharing their beautiful vision and enlightened petals. It is the same with human beings. Some live in the mud in ignorance and have minds that reject the teachings, for why should they know better? Others barely touch the teachings and understand them to some degree, but never practice them. Some, having a particularly sharp mind and heart, practice and understand the teachings to a greater or lesser extent. Others, rare gems, fully grasp the meaning of the teachings and attain liberation through practice and learning. As I conversed with this card, a strong feeling of demotivation came over me. I saw a small, almost dried up pond in the middle of the swampy mud of the meadows, where all the lotus seeds were thrown, but none grew, there was almost no water unlike the lake I mentioned. Then I saw lotus flowers growing from the stars and shedding tears on our earth, this meadow. There was a barely alive lotus flower stuck in the mud. It evaporated a drop of water from itself, which rose as a tear to the stars. Peripsol, what does this mean?

Peripsol: This is the earth where the vast majority of humanity lives on the dry meadow, where the teachings have been lost, the air to breathe is gone and the water for development has almost dried up. The tears of the stars are those of our ancestors and of the great powers and forces above, the tear below was that of a child in India who has silently realized a deep truth, but which he cannot share with his friends, parents or teachers. It will continue with this inner truth in silence. You witnessed the birth of a Pratyeka Buddha, a spontaneous, numinous enlightenment that is a sign of troubled times.

Fuomo: Ah, I see, how will the child be then?

Peripsol: Like the times, maybe it distracts them with its inner truth, its realization, maybe it succumbs to them, maybe it thinks deeply about them and acts upon them. Remember that your spirit is from the stars, but you are a mortal here and now.

Fuomo: The way I grew up, what my senses and mind imparted to me, what inspiration and gifts I harnessed from the higher worlds. But as a mortal, I have succumbed to this base world many times, in my youth, as a teenager, as an adolescent, and even now. Only in maturity have I found some measure of reason and virtue, and I still consider these qualities beautiful and great, despite the decay of my spirit and the contamination by the poison of the black brotherhoods.

Peripsol: You have proven that you are a fighter. But how do you think the child will do in India, given these circumstances?

Fuomo: I know. It's sad. Can it be found?

Peripsol: No, the more hidden it is, the better, the less ignorant forces it attracts, the less attention it receives, the less likely the child will be contaminated by rot, by petty ambitions, dreams, attachments. May the devas protect and the boy develop.

Fuomo: I understand, may the child be protected. I will do my utmost to continue.

Peripsol: Farewell, Fuomo, my friend.

Fuomo: Farewell, my genii and Agathos daimon.

Divinities Revisited

Fuomo: Knowing what Master Plutarch wrote in 'De Iside et Osiride', that men have many ways of addressing the gods, but in fact worship the same powers, I disagree somewhat. That indeed they worship the same powers and gods that are really high, while they address local powers, which may be spirits of lower rank, in different ways and thus address something else.

Peripsol: But if the multiple is one and one contains many, they simply want to worship another aspect of a spirit that belongs in gradation and power to a greater power and idea. As Master Iamblichus wrote, "A spirit of lesser rank descends from a power, an idea, a deity of higher rank. The real question is one of proximity and gradation. For when you make offerings to your ancestors, you also pay tribute to the dead, Thanathos, the realms of Pluto, the chthonic cosmic underworlds. Likewise, when you make offerings to the divine Isis, do you worship the stars and their spirits and the entire Osirian body, as well as the stellar hypostases of the Aions and Teletarchs in the worlds that span this demiurgic universe? Now understand that every gesture has a deeper lineage and that accidents in gestures of worship are never accidents. Men make the Deity into their own image, but does this deprive the Deity of its own objectivity or profound essence? Thus, the ancients approached the subject deliberately, posing and weighing theses to arrive at an approximation of theology, and creating a corpus of mythology, legends, and narratives to better explain the unsaid. Theology, however, never replaces the direct practice of divinity or the living idea of catalyzing it through one's wholeness, for that is the only way to achieve divinity in the best sense. Man tends to reduce all experiences to his own thinking, and so an experience of divinity or, as psychology would have it, a peak experience, will often confirm his belief system, while the former does not allow for such projections of human thought. Therefore, any theology should be achieved through an experienced philosophy, free from religion, free from prejudice, like an experimenter, a cognoscenti, a scientist, an artist and a philosopher.

Fuomo: I understand that less perceptive minds in their naivety treat religions fundamentally, perceptive minds see them symbolically, masterful minds create a symbolic structure to communicate and practice divinity. So the starting point is the map of one's mind, its architecture of beliefs and meanings, while Abrahamic religions try to regulate these maps, with serious consequences for the expression of life and nature. They try to suppress the techniques of individual work and mystery to offer a crowd-regulating belief system in which even mystics, philosophers and magicians who appeared spontaneously for centuries were suppressed or had to join religion and practice their own revelations in great secrecy. But the most important historical function of religion, it seems, was to provide a social logos, a narrative, a myth by which people could live, even though metaphysically it often led nowhere, was a blind spot. Seen in this light, attempts to create monolithic religions have failed precisely because people's minds differ and their experiences vary, just as the realm of sacred and profane they seek out is only one aspect of the whole. From time to time, however, such giants as Plato emerge and attempt to consolidate metaphysical knowledge into a scientia sacrum et rerum, a rare and sacred science. They take these diverse theological philosophies and human experiences and try to create a grand new paradigm that is honest and true to convey in the simplest terms what cannot be said any other way, leaving much room for the development of further ideas, theologies, sciences and practices.

Peripsol: But is the monad of an intellectual an intelligible intellect or the world spirit of a shaman the participation in his world soul?

Fuomo: When man participates in these aspects, seeing is different, but the objective truth remains unconceived. Nevertheless, there must be something measurable, something deeper, something that is not just an effect of the observer.

Peripsol: The observer effect associated with solipsism is false. What you want is what you get is self-deception, what you see is what you get is subject to many interpretations and assumptions and is prone to falling into various traps set by illusionists. There is something deeper, veiled, veiled, an objective, deep reality that stands like a monolith and encompasses all perspectives, aspects, points of view, because they are possible in the mind. But they are also completely honest and true, and just because a person may establish a false view does not change it, and if the view is true, it does not change.

Fuomo: But that sounds despotic, and I am not a man who just reads a book.

Peripsol: True seeing is an effective work and it must be realized individually, it is where the microcosmic configuration, your wholeness enters into resonance with the macrocosmic environment and triggers a mutual relationship. This, my friend, is the meaning of the philosophical work.

Fuomo: In this sense, can you build an authentic school of thought, a structure on it, speculating that we have grasped several such triggers and triangulating them by logic, rhetoric, grammar in human terms? Because I understand approximation, but approximation does not lead to anything effective, it is what it is – an approximation.

Peripsol: That is exactly so and so. But see approximation not as approximation to truth, but as its proportional explication by the known and unknown variables and constant values. For truth, like divinity, is not totally alien to this world, but pervades it like the rays of the sun. As for the philosophical schools, theurgy, etc. Only the diamond philosophy is able to create a structure that is both true and effective, and it derives its power from the human approximation of proportions through the human measure towards the divine metaphysical laws, while the chaotic relativism in its virtualities within virtualities, cutting this connection, produces nonsense and hinders progress.

Consolation of Natures

Fuomo: For too long I have lived for ideas that have a bulky character and nature in them, but I see that with my attitude I contradict the great majority of humanity that chases after abstract things and not living things. When I feel the living idea of freedom, I know that I am free; when the living idea withdraws, I feel numb; when I feel the living idea of depth, I feel wise and perceptive; when the living idea of depth withdraws, I feel only a shadow of my purpose. Everything else is merely an emanation of those living ideas, my life and every action, speech and thought I pursue. The secret of authenticity and brilliance lies in the grace of the living ideas, and all my thoughts, my philosophy, their substance and proportion are but a sliver that my mind is able to understand, interpret, translate, transmit and spread. How is it that they want to transform me little by little into their image, Peripsol? How is it that those who live on surrogates of living ideas keep trying to teach me to believe in a lie, a psychologism, while their illusions are the true and only reality? Why do they try to teach me little by little how to be vain and that I must be very focused on contradicting them in order to preserve the qualities I have fought for so long?

Peripsol: Nature, as you know, hates emptiness, and the characteristics of other people and some invisible worlds that delight in vanity and the same petty motives and unvirtuous, shameful stupidities, like chasing after money even if they have enough, after fame as if it were a value in itself, after sex as if it were satiety, after power as if it were a feast, are like the pig. For a pig wants to eat, to reproduce, to spread, to drink, and before it realizes it, it is taken to the slaughterhouse. You once saw an old pig when it was working as a stable boy, did it change much?

Fuomo: Not at all, its life was spared, but as an animal it was satiated by itself because it became fat through repetition, as if it was a culmination of its life.

Peripsol: ...And so it perished later. Likewise, people do not like what contradicts their self-image, they would rather make you their image to better accept their own faults, because what is contrary to their habits and values is a thorn in their side. A thief wants to see a thief in everyone, a murderer a murderer, a cheat a cheat, likewise in inversions, a highly saintly idiot wants to see everyone as a sinner, a saint wants to belittle you, a falsely wise person wants to see others as afflicted with stupidity. So you see, when they see similarities, they find it justified, when they see contrasts and contradictions, they want to make themselves feel better, only when you reach something true, honest, something that is foreign to them, they want to push you into their pig muck to make you the same. Your main task is to resist these networks that are trying to bring down a giant.

Fuomo: How can I be a giant?

Peripsol: It is the size of your being, which is like a well in our eyes. Even if it is rusty and turns to great evils, it is indelibly great and valuable. Even as a beggar, you would hide a small god under your robes. That is why they try to make you a thief here, an apostate there, a murderer there, an idiot there, a reversal of your nobility there, and all this springs from reason mediated by a solar intellect. You see, there is another evil you want to know about, the evil of malicious, envious, stingy pettiness, small-mindedness, amateurish jealousy that tries to force your nature into these things to justify its existence. Because without such an action, this evil feels even more degraded, bitter and stupid.

Fuomo: How can you eliminate it?

Peripsol: The great Schiller, a romantic German poet, once wrote, 'Against human stupidity and folly even the gods struggle in vain,' how do you imagine you can reverse that? Beware of this nonsense, remember that a great nature without power and status brings about its downfall in times of decline. In the Golden Age, such a nature commands and all people fall into place of their own accord because the universal virtue, living ideas and nobility of the time absorb them like a riverbed absorbs a stream.

Fuomo: In all this I stand corrupted, almost like those pigs, I have barely survived all the vicious attacks on my mind, twisting it in all kinds of directions.

Peripsol: We know that, that will make you even stronger, do not give up and keep showing up, when your fight is over, you will have no strength left to fight against corruption, you may live as a miserable man, but everything will be remembered, written down and your heart will become immortal, with justice done, back to its crowns.

Affirmation and Despair

BD Spell 108 "Seth will project a lance of iron against him and will make him vomit up all that he has swallowed. Seth will place him before him and will say to him with magic power:"Get back at the sharp knife which is in my hand! I stand before you, navigating aright and seeing afar. Cover your face, for I ferry across; get back because of me, for I am the Male! Cover your head, cleanse the palm of your hand; I am hale and I remain hale, for I am the great magician, the son of Nut, and power against you has been granted to me. Who is that spirit who goes on his belly, his tail and his spine? See, I have gone against you, and your tail is in my hand, for I am one who exhibits strength. I have come that I may rescue the earth-gods for Re so that he may go to rest for me in the evening. I go round about the sky, but you are in the fetters, which were decreed for you in the Presence, and Re will go to rest alive in his horizon. I know those who govern the matter by reason of which Apep is repelled..."

— Egyptian Book of the Dead

Fuomo: Peripsol, I resist every horror and bestiality of mankind with a profound understanding and direct my own affairs toward the noble and great, being aware of what man is capable of, which is reprehensible to decent people, noting that the problems of bestiality are not unique to persons, who lack training in the basic factors of ethical education, but the civilizational circumstances of injustice that produce all forms of societal pathogens and individual tragedies. Monsters I have encountered in my travels, having almost become one myself. For the shadows, the dead souls of serial killers, sadistic murderers, psychopaths, cannibals and rapists bent on harming the living or desecrating the dead have visited me along with their victims, along with eerie compositions of carnal and uncarnal grotesque and gore, which I have seen in visions with closed and open eyes, trying to connect with my mind, and only through the power of protection and the composition of my psyche have I not submitted to these acts, which twisted my mind in the most horrible way. Those who witness the military-industrial killing and sadism, the economic-political psychopaths, the religious cannibals and the social trafficking in violence and every crude baseness, are usually unspoken in the ears and eyes of the decent ones who can live undisturbed while behind their backs a civilizational plunder is taking place. Here there is no relativity, no beyond of good and evil, this is an inhuman atrocity from every perspective! One needs to draw lines of right and wrong! Because who relativizes the evil, becomes inhuman, who deflates the good, is deprived of it. Those who are on the receiving end of evil understand just as those on the receiving end of good, if they do not act it spills over until it crushes them again, if they remain indifferent it soon reaches everyone! I myself have gone through many twisted, cruel experiments of the cacodaimonic side, the vengeful, spiteful, wrathful dead on my flesh and nervous system, soul and emotions, in many situations that were anything but an innocent game, but an orgy for sadists! How can this happen, how can I have a heart strong enough to witness all this and remain sane while others perish?

Peripsol: Knowing what people have in their minds and hearts is a greater burden for us, I assure you. You have only seen the tip of an iceberg, but do not confuse people with beasts. This disease that is boring into their minds and hearts is an effect of centuries. Protect your spiritual territory and your upright, noble upbringing, but be aware that for some this means nothing and no one, a vain babble and in bestiality, if you did not defend yourself and kill, you would be a victim of many provocations that you have wisely avoided under our wing. Now it is almost impossible to change a crippled human mind, a product of this century, unless they see a sliver of insight into their own condition. Without norms and roles, without ethos, individuation and true culture, without true justice and responsible freedom, such matters arise in an increasingly growing population of the earth. Consider — what chance do some have to escape the heinous fate of a beast? What can you accomplish with your meager resources? As time goes by, you hole up in your garden, Saturnine, and nurture the fruits of your writings, harbor a few friends, and watch the world perish from the corruption caused by the human generative, natural part that has been synthetically fused with modernity. Nature is not evil and never has been, but when it is mixed with corrupted ideas and a lack of ethos and morality derived from reason, where many are robbed of a universal humanity, these are the results.

Fuomo: What is to be done?

Peripsol: We do what we can. Your job is to survive and do what you can. So is every other person with brains and insight in their place. The question is not what can or cannot be undone, but how to achieve the best results in such a world to contain evil, not add more evil to evil, and plant the seeds for the possibility of further development. Retreat, make it difficult for the enemies to advance, and quietly prepare for the counteroffensive. You see the opposites, the clear view — go now.

On Prognostication

Fuomo: Recently I was asked to prophesy for a friend, and thinking I was competent enough to draw the yarrow stalks, I honestly did not want to look like a charlatan in my own eyes, so I explained it as a specific instruction, not a firm statement.

Peripsol: When you draw a divination from an indivisible whole, what is the first requirement, assuming you got everything right?

Fuomo: Of course, the act of interpretation, drawing from something capable of inspiring my intuition, a part of me that participates in the whole, be it the Divine or a being with greater knowledge of possible future events, or the eye of my wisdom.

Peripsol: And if so, what do you need to make a correct interpretation?

Fuomo: A deep and insightful knowledge of the connections between man, the world and heaven. Is this what distinguishes charlatans and soothsayers from the wise?

Peripsol: Perhaps. But if you are a master of causal knowledge, must you also predict the future?

Fuomo: That's how people have always helped themselves, by simply wanting to know the future but not mastering the causal knowledge of the world.

Peripsol: That is a human habit, they must feel they are in control. Do you remember Master Chuang Tzu describing another sage?

Fuomo: He threw yarrow stalks and used the Book of Changes. Then he pretends to be a fortune teller, but in reality he gives them advice from the treasury of his wisdom. But then what about prognostic astrology, for example?

Peripsol: The study of potentials and their nature is as delicate as it is profound; it is not the study of concrete events. Do you remember how fortune tellers and all kinds of astrologers were chased away when they gave wrong advice?

Fuomo: Ah yes, they often changed places [laughs].

Peripsol: Powers, intelligences, spirits and the nature of the planets you may intuit or rely on the work of past masters, but do you want to deprive yourself of chance, choice, will and fate by such trivial occasions as the prediction of your life, which could be a magically bound life description that intervenes in destinies while you do not know who could be the executor of such events, benevolent or malevolent, in the destinies of Lady Tyche? Was it not Ennius (Annals IX 313—314) who postulated before Boethius that Fortuna as a power displaces even kings? Nature and the virtue of men can overcome the obstacles that fate puts in their way. A true Stoic, turning inward, does not attach great importance to such things as those who demand answers from soothsayers. The Boethian enumerates what governs happiness: Wealth, public honours and personal prestige — all in his power and susceptible to his whims. Predicting fortune is akin to predicting what a wayward child wants next by interpreting his cosmogram. To demand a greater share from the soothsayers is like being a beggar trying to seduce a pretty girl.

Fuomo: Ah, goddess of fortune! So some prophecies and predictions can come true through the intervention of certain forces that fulfil them, even if the predictors or their recipients do not know about them? Some soothsayers can impose their stories on your life and destiny, some do so consciously, others quite bluntly, blindly and without thought.

Peripsol: More so? You seem unconvinced and miss the point. Why get upset about predictions when you can wisely classify the past, present and now and seek solutions directly from life, nature and the laws of providence? The gods, the world, the people! Events that appear on the waves of time from the perspective of time are just fluctuations, like raindrops appearing on a puddle.

Fuomo: I understood, it is a long way to observe and learn this world, these revelations of the people and the sky, so many variables, laws, coordinates, reference points, changes of various kinds, patterns, time flows.

Peripsol: There are prognostic sources, but they must not be used for fortune telling, they can be used as tools for your endeavour. The point is to better understand hidden laws. Occult laws are merely subtle causal relationships in the intelligible world that you perceive with the eye of wisdom.

Fuomo: I have to learn that too, thank you.

On Phenomenaless Perception

Fuomo: Deeply immersed in meditation, I closed my eyes. Suddenly I was struck by a realization in which I applied ten thousand phenomena to realize their emptiness. First, the topology of everything became whole and of a flavor, as if it were flattened and freed from the appearances of the waking mind that recognizes objects, shapes, colors and sounds. Then, in the motionlessness of my mind, all phenomena became infinitely still and finite, as if they were complete. When I opened my eyes, everything seemed like an illusion, and when the objects, shapes and colors settled in me, they seemed to be mere details, similar to a flag in the wind. Like a flag, it seemed to move, animated by a surge of a zephyr, and when the wind stopped, it too fell silent. From that point on, I felt that I could project anything I wanted onto this state, and as soon as I chose to project, as when working with emptiness, the state collapsed as if it were a non-dual, qualityless state. Similar to siddhis, which disappear when the mental conditions that support them are no longer present, similar to divinity, which, when a mortal closes himself to it, no longer impresses the mortal with the influence it exerts on the mind of a mystic, just as a magician, deprived of his logos, throws words into the air, as if in a vain theater, a mere performance. Nevertheless, my mind could project states onto itself, and the first commitment I felt was that of compassion, but was it conditioned by previous learning or did it arise naturally, as if it were necessary, I do not know. What is it, Peripsol, my guide, that made Zeno of Elea claim that the universe was completely undifferentiated and still, while others claimed it was full of change and movement?

Peripsol: Exactly this degree of perception: for an unmoved mind, the transcendent is empty and a continuity that is indivisible and uniform like itself, for a mind in motion that recognizes change and movement, it recognizes within this movement the phenomena around it as substantial and objectively true. What is the solution to this duality? What do you think about it?

Fuomo: In an a-phenomenal world, stillness is a point of reference; in a phenomenal world of movement, change and succession, continuity, sequentiality, beginnings and endings. Combining the two, we arrive at an a-dichotomous position of transcendence and engagement — here is found the path of the true men and the companions of heaven, the cosmic liberated. All action and inaction resulting from this fusion is to be understood in all transparency and honesty of the forces of the unmoved and the forces of change intertwined in karm(a)karma, both karma and akarma, the akarman entity, in my opinion, superior to the karman.

Peripsol: It leads to cessation, but if you work on the basis of cessation and act karmically, are you bound by karma?

Fuomo: Only to the extent that I attach and seize myself, that is really resolved in the bardo state.

Peripsol: So train and master what you have to master. The way for you is paved, the world is not chaos, there are laws given by different traditions. I will suggest that you are on a good path.

Fuomo: Thank you, Master Peripsol

On Politics

Fuomo: Knowing that it takes a mature, autonomous structure of ideals, values, and principles to arrive at a political stance, and that from there ideally there should be civilized conversation and exchange in a complex world, I would like to ask you, Peripsol, how is it possible for people to argue about borrowed propaganda that alienates even those who create it?

Peripsol: You are a metaphysical anarch who is, however, rightly concerned with political self-constitution, for just as there is a polis below, so the celestial spheres have a polis of the spheres and laws of the universe embedded within them. As you rightly pointed out, all political views should be derived from reason and thinking about what one represents with one's own essence, but rarely are people nowadays aware of what that means. They prefer to be guided by their emotions or by passing trends and passions, and are therefore easy to manipulate and deceive. Or they form a society of dyed-in-the-wool hardliners or fragmented, alienated groups that fight not over ideas and ideals but over defining them. These struggles for definition and the lack of a common denominator in aspirations and self-definition lead to a jumble of disordered views, and here a person classifies himself under left or right, here under extreme, there under flawed, lackadaisical, ignorant, and faithful. People, as you know from religion, can reconcile all forms of outrageous, illogical and contradictory beliefs, political and ideological beliefs included. You cannot raise someone to be a statesman; that is the maturation of his diligence, experience and character. In the same way, you cannot educate a hero or a seer, unless he becomes one in the course of his life. It is attachment, ignorance, and delusion in politics that make people so susceptible to propaganda from a variety of channels that they soon become apathetic or entangled in the shrapnel of ideas, rash, unreasoning, constantly bombarded by this or that camp of opinions. Ultimately, all political ideas boil down to a single question: "What would you like future generations to be like, what values, ideas, principles would you like them to represent?" And if so, would you like that future generation to be, to live as you imagined? Would you like them to be open-minded, noble-hearted, tolerant and strong, rejecting bondage, vice and corruption, would you like them to care about everything and everyone, or would you like to see them as elitist crooks who destroy everything in delusional castles? It is often forgotten that the battles fought today will be won or lost tomorrow, after you Fuomo will have left your mortal shell. We, a society of masters and mistresses, of divine beings, can rarely influence the minds of mortals as effectively as a living human being. This is because we are firmly rooted in freedom, limited only by the laws of the cosmos. How could we violate the freedoms of others to force them one way or another? We may at times lead to certain revelations and magnificence in which we participate, but to a stubborn person this means as much as nothing; to a blind person a vision is nothing more than an idea. So, through ideas and inspirations, we guide the blind, but what they make of it is their own.

Fuomo: I bow to you, my friend, and am close to tears that such an honor has been bestowed upon me, along with the burden of interpreting these ideas that others may not be able to do much with. It was not out of vanity, but out of the movement of my feeling that I wanted to speak these words: If people knew all these glorious and beautiful architectures of divinity and ideas, they would certainly appear to imitate these freedoms and beauty that were so close to our ancients, who rose to greatness under a leadership that tried in compassion to imitate these flourishing movements, but is it not because not everyone and not everyone is included in these henotic apocalypses that the world is as it is?

Peripsol: In the generative realms, in the variety of interpreters you have observed in the history of philosophy and metaphysics, from the ancient Sumerians and Egyptians to India and the Americas, from the northern tundra to the African natives and the aborigines, have you not seen how different the receiving pools of the human mind are? It is the receiving side that is divine, as you know, and none of them are wrong. What you are looking for is a certain derivation of political and civilizational orders that you have derived from metaphysical logic. This was also tried in ancient China, but did not last long, although it lasted for centuries. Do you consider yourself a new Confucius, a reformer?

Fuomo: Not at all, because the times are not receptive to such ideas, it would be undeserved and a bloodthirsty imposition. But how can one improve the times if one cannot pour reason, beautiful ideas and ethos into people's minds as if from a cornucopia? I could grit my teeth at this task, and yet – I am helpless.

Peripsol: Because you want to change others, is that appropriate?

Fuomo: My will is to create a common ground from which they can interpret and arrive...

Peripsol: They will not, because there are differences in thinking and values, and any attempt at consolidation is doomed from the start. But what you can do is to do yourself justice, if you can not shine outward, illuminate the inside and work outward whenever possible, is not that how our sky impresses?

Fuomo: I have to agree and resign myself to a quiet, deep sadness, but is there a chance for the return of those golden times that have seized the earth and cultures at different times, a renewal, a kind of solar covenant, nature covenant, transcendence covenant, with the equation between earth, people and heaven being the most appealing in execution?

Peripsol: We all hope so, but hope is what is, what is to come is yet to be seen.

On Care

Fuomo: Peripsol, I am going to engage you in a policy that people have recently conjured up that I somehow can not reconcile with history. Because some intellectuals who actively care about the world are called "left" and despised, while under the leadership of the "left" come out all forms of cheap kitsch. If I may represent the critical "left" of an Orwell and the critical "right" of a Junger, why do people despise the ideas that once helped them to unify. Was not it Emperor Trajan (53–117 CE) who instituted social welfare by law, and not unlike a prayer to Anuna in Amorite ancient Babylon (2000–1600 BC) written in cuneiform on clay: "Anoint the parched, feed the hungry, water the thirsty!" – This was the justice of the ancients, when there was justice in the land. Is it not the case that culture is more important than the springing of nations and the later nationalistic fragmentation that led to thinking that one nation was better than another? That in atomization people tend to dehumanize the other instead of uniting on common ground – I call it humanity, which even Confucius tried to define. Should I not follow the Hellenic-Orphic view that "I am a child of nature and of the starry heavens, but among the stars I am free and heavenly." That I consider myself a cosmopolitan, a child who once loved this world too much, like Giordano Bruno, and who had to be erased from this world, turning compassion into anger and affection into hatred? Tell me, Peripsol, why do they divide when they conquer nothing but hellish feelings of vices?

Peripsol: It is easier to split a unity based on lower things than to destroy the unity of stronger, nobler things. How much effort does it take to fuse atoms, how much to destroy them? You see, atomized groups are easy to direct, because they are all blinded, united peoples who see the untruth are dangerous for liars and abusers. Although you stand here, child of Mother Nature and the stars, there are people who draw boundaries and make you a commodity, a statistic, a profit, a group, be it a nation, an exiled pariah. Think about what you are first and foremost?

Fuomo: Well, a descendant of a human being who lived in a cave with my ancestral mother thousands of generations ago and descended from a genetic mutation of her ancestral mother. A person who has acquired such and such inclinations, habits, knowledge, skills, views, etc. through nature, education, language, culture, history. A person who strongly identifies with his Germanic and Thessalian blood-witch ancestry, a dead soul that took many bodies on Earth, a person who is related in spirit to the Dragon Gods. A person whose memories are linked to a particular area and who therefore cherishes many places that have shaped his life, be it the Arabian desert between Abu-Dhabi and Al-Ayin and Muscat in Oman, be it the Mongolian steppe near Kharkhorin, be it Taygetos mountain near Stoupa in the south of the Peloponnese, be it the mountains of the Balkan Peninsula, be it the Welsh Penglais forest in Ceredigion, be it the Irish meadow near Ballycateen, be it lake Huron where nearby I spat fire, be it the river Sola where my great-grandmother lived, be it Val Thorens in the Alps, and so many others I could remember if I wanted to be a true child of the world.

Peripsol: You can remember all that and derive your strength from surpassing experience, but people who are so deeply rooted in fear, who are so unfree, have to lock themselves in a little box where they can loathe everyone else and bare their fangs that can intimidate a child or other people full of fear. They feel threatened by the world and their cage, they are birds that refuse to sing, they feel betrayed by everything and everyone and want to feel superior just because of one thing – that proud feeling of being important, of doing something with themselves in a huge world that often belittles them. You have overcome that, why don't you write it down, if you build on your own strength, on your own merit, then you know you do not have to feel threatened or intimidated, your fear will be overcome by an honest attitude reinforced by a firm step. A step that guided by Horus you have made above the abyss towards the Graal.

On the World Soul

Fuomo: Is it not so, Peripsol, that there is a hidden unity in the world-soul, that no matter how we look at the sequence, the pattern, the statistical change, provided with information, knowledge, data, with which science deals, all this is comparable to strands that appear separate and living by themselves, but in reality are inseparable from the object of their study, namely – the world. Although research in the given scientific paradigms is supposed to be accumulative, Lady Scientia has its own say in this regard, because if we look at all these patterns with a critical eye, we see that harmonies emerge between them. It is as if the individual strands of research form an inseparable whole and the intricate topology of leaving, creating and mixing paradigms is a matrix of movement of information along established forms. Is there a crescendo, is there a finite critical point after which all human science collapses?

Peripsol: You brought up the doctrine of learned ignorance and applied it to science. For one thing, human perception is limited, as are its instruments. You would need to create an absolute scientific, informational black body, a notion borrowed from human physical astronomy, that would preserve absolute indifference to all phenomena, but at the same time gather an absolute measure of information through an absolute interface of input and output. What would be in the middle would not be easy for humans to interpret, but they could derive some sort of approximation. Human science ends where the unincarnated, uncaptured forces begin; it ends where transcendence begins. Just as it is easy for a religious person to discredit science, it is easy for a scientifically minded person to discredit all forms of religious belief. The notion for one is blind faith, for another reason, but it is the intellect that combines the two and is able to deduce divinity from the unspoken, subtle overlaps. Take, for example, the theology of arithmetic, in which the progression of numbers is only a means of explaining the harmonies between them, and when you come to a complete figure, namely the Pythagorean tetraktys, you must consider the whole. It is explained step by step in order to build a structure that is more cognitively understandable to people. But after explaining the strands, you have to look at the whole tetraktys in a single way, as if you were penetrating a symbol and leaving the by-products of research behind. Similarly, if one is able to study science, art and theology in this way, and build critical bridges. But when the life of wisdom animates them, even that of deities, they feel awe and wonder. This is the point where reason joins with intellect and emotion, for awe is a form of wonder and praise of the deities. Do you remember how, some years ago, as a gnostic, you looked at the stars among the houses and the dirt of the streets at night, and a silent comprehension of longing, sadness and awe touched your mind?

Fuomo: Indeed, nowadays, with a battered mind, it is so rare that I feel such great things again, and yet they haunt me with their generous glory. I was alone with loneliness, before me the cosmic space I longed to take one last step and become it, master it, and find solace in the eerie vastness of space. I remember one of the winged Jinges descending much later and taking my body with it. I felt as if I were floating in the space of the universe, without any matter around me, even though I was standing on a platform waiting for the commuter train. I felt its wings, as if I were one with this space, as if my soul and spirit could travel through the universe as a photon on the cosmic waves, as a wave and individual particle with absolute freedom.

Peripsol: To that degree, you were still a human being experiencing absolute space, but some gods and goddesses are spaceless beings, omnipresent and radiating themselves throughout the universe, recognising it, just as the monad permeates everything, so greater and lesser children of the whole fill the world with their divine presence.

Fuomo: Thank you, Peripsol.

On Passions

Fuomo: Hereby I invoke the Peripsol, terribly weakened, in the night of Saturn, the hour of the moon, for I wish to derive a simple thought. If liberated gods and goddesses are impassionate according to Iamblichus, how is it that the people who indulge in all forms of passions, who try to approach the deities, pretend to be of this kind?

Peripsol: My friend, the generative kingdoms, especially that of the animals, are dominated by the passions, but the animals keep within limits and do not transgress their passion patterns, for they grow according to nature and are decimated according to nature. Humans, as a self-reflective species, have a special factor of exceeding what they are given, and therefore tend to indulge in all forms of excess. This is because they like to accumulate abstract things, and instead of accumulating virtues, which all share in wisdom, they accumulate vices, according to the fixation of the modern age, and this vice is seen as natural and virtue as something foreign, although the former comes from laziness and indulging in animal excesses while seeing only the surface of things, and the latter from intellect and wisdom and seeing the depth of things. For those who hunt for goods will focus primarily on the accumulation of goods, and those who hunt for knowledge will focus primarily on the accumulation of knowledge. Rarely do they see that all these inventions were used primarily as tools, and as tools they became commodities for their own sake. Thus, the minds, emotions and passions of people are the main arena of the abusive forces that want to use and dominate them as puppets. So, the goal of the sage is to discover himself, to know himself, to calm his mind, emotions and passions in order to control them decisively and reasonably, as if he were the master of his own expression. The ethos is formed, and it follows that all the teachings, structural theology, high magic, techniques and achievements are completed, so to speak, by this knowledge. They follow primarily orderly principles that seek to reflect the higher worlds, as if a man were growing steadily from a sapling to a tree, reaching out with his branches to the starry worlds, and they respond by growing toward the human realms.

Fuomo: Yes, that is what I know, my friend, but it is more difficult to achieve than said, what are the means and methods?

Peripsol: In meditation you conjure up states and illusions to control them, in contemplation you think about all things and give them reason, insight and proportionality, in studies you learn and acquire new tools to rectify the substance you work with, guard your thoughts, speech and deeds as you guard the six gates, that is, the senses and the mind. Ask for help in invocations and incantations to permeate your growth and protect you from relapses into negative states that like to grow into your heart, favoured by less friendly forces, but also by passivity in gigantomachy or thoughtlessness.

Fuomo: This is not easy to achieve, because it goes against what most people live.

Peripsol: So it requires self-sacrifice and a Pythagorean decision to tread the path. As a Hindi master remarked, "People are all ears and eyes when they hear or see something that feeds their cherished views and confirms their selfish urges." So whatever confirms what they already know and hits the lowest common denominator will satisfy them. Do you think anyone would listen if I revealed these secrets to a crowd? Or can you imagine not being mocked, laughed at and called a 'good-for-nothing' while the crowd prefers to follow someone who is rich, famous or sexually attractive? But at the end of the day, this world is nothing but a spectacle, and we do not judge them either, they are simply pulled like puppets by the strings of their desires, lusts and temporary fame until, as the goddess says, "They sober up and return to me" — that's what Plutarch meant, that's what Apuleius meant, that's what the Coptic text meant about Isis, the "thunder of the perfect spirit", because great was her image in Egypt.

Fuomo: I am grateful for your enlightenment, dear Peripsol, may it be a wonderful year...

On Meta-Religion

Fuomo: Sitting in front of my desk, I have always wondered, oh Peripsol, how is it that meta-religion and politics and power are always so closely intertwined? Between all these belief systems and successive practices, how can one search for an approximation of truth? I am not a foolish practitioner, and I see it as a particular slice of objective reality, a way in which a man and a woman have packed their minds with particular stories, mythologies they live by, and principles they derive from them. I know they are not entirely relative, as there are more and less successful methods of achieving a goal. Nevertheless, a very successful Hindi yogin of the ancient past cannot be imitated by a Westerner hoping to achieve the same result, just as a Tibetan monk, no matter how versed in Arabic spiritual alchemy, will not have the iconographic mindset to arrange these symbols into a successful structure for a path, nor will a zealous Christian have training or techniques to practice the Dharmic art of magic, nor the high celestial magic of the Egyptians. How is it that we approach and fall, as in a kind of topology, and each age needs new masters and mistresses to gather everything and renew the heavenly dew of the ancients, preferably and forward, as Siakyamuni said,

"Through doubt, experience, practical exercise"? - A truly sane approach to spirituality.

Peripsol: As you said, these are merely belief systems, we are irreligious as divine beings, yet as mentioned in another dialog, some of us who are still attached to this world are bending over the petty affairs of mortals. Your question is, "Why do the deluded, airborne souls who think they are angels and are really just earthbound, who are intertwined with, for example, Christian belief systems, attack you you were devil incarnate?" Remember that you see and understand more and thus place yourself in opposition to them, while they, on the contrary, rage because they try to keep you imprisoned in their virtuality. Because of the limited spectrum of vision, because of their delusion that there is nothing but what they recognize and see, because you cannot understand beyond your own seeing, you cannot see beyond your own understanding, just as you have noticed the intelligencers and myriads of spirits that thrive in the spheres of the planets that revolve around the mighty sun, and the sun itself, which is made up of myriads of divine beings, but is also a monadic whole that is generated, and a generator, as in some Aztec beliefs, more so in Chaldean beliefs, that is generated by Aions and Teletarchs, and generates and consolidates the stellar system that you now call the "solar system." Of course, all the names we use are instrumental. You are a follower of your own way, so I am uttering sentences that are understandable to you so that you can better understand yourself and your world. Of course, this is much better than that of an ignorant man, but no better than that of a Roman pontiff of Jupiter and not even close to the depth of the knowledge of the Bodhisatvas of the East. Now suppose that nature hates emptiness and the deluded Christian souls chained to the earth wanted to make you their own, imprisoned in an inferior heaven full of illusions and protracted rebirths, but they too are part of a dazzling plan in which they are involved. For if they were in truth free and objective, they would not violate your will and attack you. They are based on their own deception and are used like puppets of their fanaticism to attack you, oh young Promethean fire, out of their ignorance and as part of an even more evil game of illusions. As for the metareligious perspective, the power lies in the domination of belief systems and command over souls, because the mind transfers the cognitive-emotive imprints to the passive souls and the passionate emotions to the passive heart, and thus a soul is ingrained with taints. To be in possessions of one's own soul and daimon is to be truly blessed. To shape them is a masterful craft. Religion and cults have always been regulated for the purpose of consolidating power, even more so in a secular age. However, as you can see in modern times, they are striking back with full force - here as fanatical fundamentalism, there as a complete chaos of conspiracies and a supermarket of not too well thought out irrational beliefs. This is a road to nowhere from a spiritual point of view, mastership requires hard work and some notion of proper ratio. If the universe is a cosmos or an ordered ornament, as you would agree with Plato, then there are profound laws to be observed within the framework of physics. This is even more true for a metaphysi-cian who seeks to reflect transmutations in his soul, heart, and mind by not merely absorbing knowledge like an armchair magician, but acting upon it, as in a ceremony, a prayer, an incantation, an invocation, an evocation, a rite, to draw forth certain forces. I hope I have made this clear to you. Go now and do not hold a grudge against these religious mongers, because hatred and aversion is a lesser form of attachment!

Fuomo: Thank you, Sun Master, you outshine my dead heart with your polite thoughts, Holy Guardian Angel.

On Aversion and Demotivation

Fuomo: Here I stand, Peripsol, dissatisfied with my astrolabe of measuring rods and intricate machinery of coordinates and nets that reach high into the starry sky, pointing up to metaphysics and down to science and natural philosophy, magnifying glasses and telescopes of perception, magic wands, with which I act, and goblets that fill my mind and heart with substance for the messages in interpretation, glass bead games of ideas that reflect the stars, and those masks of the gods that I still have the power to call ignited pneuma, and a blazing torch of brightness, that guides me through the city of the pyramids that I revisited a few years ago, when the cohorts of the shadow jackals gathered around me in dense darkness, when my tomb was guarded motionless like my body, when my brain was scraped out and my entrails preserved, when Horus granted me the sight of divine things and Seth Thanathurgic sagacity, when the gods showered me with gifts and protected me like a little god in their nursery, as if I looked through chthonic and celestial mirrors through ancient and modern times. Was not it Confucius who said that only those who master the ancient observations and wisdom and bridge to modernity deserve the name of a master and act in the realm of inner and outer greatness? And yet I stand alone, wasting my time on earth, looking at the past and loathing the present, which, out of helpless observation and impotent outcry, evokes my unshakable disgust, much like a historian who dreamed of a golden age and can no longer get beyond his dreams to pursue the deed. And as you know, Peripsol, when I was deprived of office and rank, I performed a deed in ceremony and gesture as best I could to ease the times and pursue my vision. Oh vanity! In what did it consist? To air bubbling in a cavern, echoing for a while all over the globe as my silenced, dirty voice, and then overtaken, drowned out, drowned in some subterranean chamber, repeated only in the mists of the howling underworld, whispered among the dead as a memory, a chatter among shadows never given flesh and blood. There have been times when I have tried to overcome this sickening feeling in order to do something useful – in vain! I was defeated by the petty affairs of life, by human laws, wisely taking care not to violate their order, perhaps that was a mistake? While being crushed by inhuman forces and those fools who turned against me out of ignorance, if I had had more reason and wisdom, strength and determination, I might have gritted my teeth and gritted through those plans, what is your opinion in this matter? An attitude perhaps, a turning point, a solution?

Peripsol: Do not bother about it anymore, your path is different now that you are getting older, which you must obey if you do not want to commit stupidity. The powers direct the times by their gravity, disharmonies and enemies play against them in the lesser worlds where they sow their mischief, giving the impression that their will is that of the greater times. They deceive those who believe that everything is in the hands of the true powers, but sooner or later these plans will be smashed by the judges of the powers, but one world will be sacrificed in this process - another, some dignitaries are quite indifferent to this, others have tried to warn. Since you have proven time and again what you are made of, the "what if" is disregarded, for it has not taken place in the present or in reality, it is void. Your reluctance and all these demons of the mind that haunt you are well known to you, so devote the rest of your efforts as you please, for in retreat your life begins to fade. It is true that you have fought well in your youth, for you consider it wasted, but be prepared for an age in which not only you are defeated, oppose it in mind and heart if you will, you must bypass the times to break the bonds and master the times, while others on earth continue to be slaves of the times and the transitions, thinking that they are advancing their own goals, trapped in their own phenomena. Let kings be kings if they want, let masters be masters if they want, go higher, leave everything behind. You cannot call children home when they want to play, nor can you teach a dolt to be wise when doltishness is all he knows, nor can you teach a blind man to see when his sight is organically damaged, unless it is taken from him by some uncanny magic that it is enough to remove a shell, a veil that blinds him, to give him back his sight. It is not possible to remove the addictions of an attached person if there is no germ of a will on his side, unless he wants to be attached to things that contradict his whole existence. Some find meaning in fulfilling their delusions and carrying out their projections throughout their lives. But although many fall under the wheel of fate that develops in this way, is not it better to free oneself from all this? Tyche, the lady of chance, gives hope among the destinies that develop from threads over which we often have no control – they are causal factors that develop over days, weeks, months and years, giving rise to many families, species and fruits, ultimately destinies that determine the directions through which fate flows. Everything in this world is transient, so are the new times of the slaves. If it is your retreat, check the moves of the opponents so that they do not grab you by the throat, do not let them get to you. Laugh, laugh in ecstasy at these fools! Let them play their games of politics, of society, of religion on this planet, abstracts they chase after, and rather enslave themselves with all this than think it a small game to get away from it. Do not be scowling or envious, even if life has its laws and it may be sometimes paralyzing and debilitating, in sorrow or in joy, it all passes! Find your comfort in the gods and stars, in philosophy and in the things you love. Let the things you love, that you had to sacrifice to find leverage, be freed from them to be free!

Fuomo: But for a living person, this mortification is a defeat worthy of a wretched monk!

Peripsol: You have not listened, stubborn Fuomo. Neither this nor that, detachment is not indifferent, point of view, point of work, point of liberation, point of view! Everything on time, beyond death! Wait for the time.

Fuomo: I stand on a pregnant tigress, crushing the lust and passion of the corpses under her paw, tearing the delusions of this field of Maya, as a red dragon belonging to the family of fire vajra, as a serpentine spiral arching over my spine and skull, feathered and rising rainbow-colored, and yet I still forget all the victories, surrendering to the melancholy defeat by enemies!

Peripsol: This sadness is brought about, because the unremembrance and ignorance reflected in your eyes are the only last feast they could have! Seen in this way, we should separate, because I in my nature toil for the circumference of the sun, the night is approaching!

On Generations and Dominions

Fuomo: Peripsol, my angel, I would like to inquire about the generations of dominions and principalities in the solar system, as mentioned by Iamblichus in his Hierarchies, in the historiography of the socio-political and psycho-sexual forces configured in the orders created by human hands and catalyzed on the face of the Earth. This is quite a grandiose task to map the meta-physical history of the Earth and the constellations of unleashed energies in its focus and calibration that were associated with the expressive forces given to each era that humanity received, processed, co-opted or co-created.

Peripsol: Your memories were clearly erased. But that is the nature of this enterprise you indulge in. Thus do all your coworkers engage in the writing of magical diaries or, as in your case, pithy philosophies, for we know that particular kinds of occult knowledge are susceptible to deception of the beholder, inspired deception by malevolent powers, and thwarting into unmemory and ignorance by the enemies of human freedom who abhor such spiritual sports. May Mnemosyne preserve your memory, may Voluspa Angerona preserve your silence so that you may weigh your words wisely, may Peitho preserve your eloquence and restraint, and may Hanankeia endow you with the necessary mastery to say beautiful things that are well thought out and delivered in the most intelligible manner. As you know, the first goddess mentioned in writing on the cuneiform tablets was Ishtar-Ili, the planet Venus. We cannot deduce anything from this, at least not in relation to your question, since these are merely human historical surveys. Considering the interplay of non-human forces of solar, planetary, and trans-solar origin in the co-emergence of life since the formation of Earth's magnetosphere in the solar sector three and a half billion years ago, we must assume that many forms passed on to the chthonic graveyards, dormant or perished, and some were corrected and assumed the status of avant-garde deities of the species in multiple metamorphoses and intermixtures. This taking into account the breeding both on evolutionary and subtle levels that differentiated life with the limitation set by nature and its multiform, multi-faceted, multi-aspect, flourishing masses of being that left their mark on the spheres of the planets and were indeed influenced by their nature and these in turn by the solar and transplutonic waves and occult rays within the septadic fortress of this system. You have certainly seen the deity of the bees, or rather the sublimation and rectification of the collective into a front face of the species, which manifested itself in your presence as a great insectoid queen, similar to the Mantis Goddess and the Toad Gods, Some, who see the chthonic graveyards of their dark side, confuse them with demons, not knowing that the humanoid shadow daimonions are nothing else than the nature that wraps itself in xenomorphic, alteromorphic or human masks, and therefore, depending on what it has learned from humanity, dishes out as a whip and punishment or – on the contrary – as a reward. Thus, the half-animal, half-divine man is entirely responsible for his gigantomachy, half responsible for his nature, which can become deformed and made bestial by malignity, or ennobled and splendid and well-bred, and entirely responsible for his own self-forging, when he discovers that he can form himself in harmony with his genii and intellect, which is that point between the pure reason that a human man can develop and the providence of the transcendent laws. The ancient Plutarch wrote that malignant demons, when they exceed the measure, return to nature and to their throne, are hunted, extinguished and punished, just as mankind today abuses nature and sooner or later can be extinguished by a more powerful force, passing to its own graveyards of forms and rectifications of spirits. With this logic, think of the first monkeys of your race, who animated the energies of nature around them as shamans with the souls of animals, nocturnal and daily, deadly, poisonous or friendly and wise, depending on their nature and character, as well as on the inclination of the shaman. Imagine the complexity of the bio-psychological, pneumatic and sexual hidden forces of life and man, what can happen when these forces deeply mix? Could it be that people become gods who are worshipped by those below? That would require that mankind was the first and only generation of living beings, and that is not so, entirely! Elder races, briefly mentioned by Iamblichus in De Mysteriis Aegyptiaca, lived before your existence, and beings millions of millions of years older than you still live in rectified form, though not fleshly, disincarnate throughout the universe. Considering all the possible hominid classes that anthropology has drawn upon, do you not assume that there was a single man who made himself in his own image, as some religions claim? Rather, it was a series of mutations carried out by an intelligence and the evolutionary laws of nature. You witnessed protein sequencing experiments on the mental level when you were invited to participate in biomancing or engineering and your own spine, brain and body were altered several times in vivo, in a non-intrusive way, by strange, uncanny forces that are not human, yet superbly intelligent, they are more like a dolphin in the water than a human on land, if we need an analogy. But do you think that these highly intelligent forces never wear human masks to observe this species through incarnation or rebirth and get to know their herds better? In this way, communication is established between the Elder Gods and humans, as guardians and custodians, become links between the monkey and the deity, between humans and the spheres and stars. Before you believe that life is built into some star systems by design, I acknowledge that all systems that give rise to life evolve a blueprint that is governed by the same laws. Nevertheless, the differentiation in evolution and the succession of this blueprint is as varied as that on Earth through all the primordial epochs, and the life forms they produce, although limited by carrier systems and nature, can be completely inhuman, so that it is not necessary for them to develop hominid life forms. Now, as to your foolish question, let me remind you that you lose your memory far too often, and this works to the detriment of the whole, for working memory is an operational tool of a magician, you should refocus and if it is of no use, then reorganize in silent concentration, you have been abused by deceivers for their own whim, they seem to have forgotten that they are animal herds in the eyes of their benefactors. Therefore, as long as you reroute intellect and spirit, historicity is not important. Your approach your personal religion, science is extremely useful to you, for it is a map with which to navigate the narratives of human belief systems and their larvified ideas about themselves. Refer to the sources you have received and continue to engage, for it is quite necessary.

Fuomo: This would be unthinkable, unbearable, humiliating and degrading for most proud human herds.

Peripsol: If you talk the way you do and act the way you do, there is nothing more to say. Otherwise it would be highly ineffective, and you do have a sense of humor, don't you?

Fuomo: (laughs)

Peripsol: So do the gods, so play the game and preserve your memories. You have vowed to commit yourself.

Truth or Honesty

Fuomo: I recently encountered a man who called me a "liar" for contradicting his "truth", following the example of a Japanese prince described in Dogen's Shobogenzo: "What is true for one is a lie for another and vice versa". How should I approach this subject if I want to be honest?

Peripsol: In the Nag Hammadi scriptures, it is mentioned in the "Revelation of Adam" that the truth is vaulted on the highest mountain, guarded by angels and unknowable to any mortal for all eternity. Do you also believe that man with his senses, his mind, his biological cocoon called Homo sapiens sapiens and his entire mental apparatus is able to claim that the objective truth is tiny in the infinity of objective worlds? Your race interprets reality according to its belief systems, inclinations, tunnel realities of semiotic-linguistic fetishes through which it sees the world. If two people agree to call an object you call 'a tree', that is a culturally, historically, linguistically, etymologically negotiated abstract that is true in that the object you decide to call you see in a different spectrum that enters the eye than – for example – a bird. This is the concept of apophatic uncertainty that teaches scientific humility. However, this truth is conventional and not objective. Does it make all human attempts to approach the physical and metaphysical properties of the world come to naught? Not really, for much like analogy, allegory, and integumentum, the layered philosophical contents, they seem to find orders of greater magnitude in their proportion, relationship, law, and substance on a synchronous scale of lesser orders that emerge as transient signs that are subjectively of phenomenological types that are permanent. Was Plato the ultimate reference for the objective world? Certainly not, but he was a powerful master who approximated certain laws of which a man was capable to derive a grand scheme of things within a consistent system. He primarily used an ordering principle for previously invented systems and blended them into a single-tasting honey. Is modern science also a theory of everything? Absolutely not. Even if it were to derive a theory of everything, it would go back to its basics and exclude everything that your race does not know. Imagine if you could conjure up an ideal measuring instrument for the world that would say anything and everything about it and give you understandable results and descriptions. You would still be totally absorbed in who you are as a human being, in your cognitive, emotional, intellectual and spiritual limitations, and how you would interpret it would be a projection of your understanding.

Fuomo: Therefore, those who claim truth, all who call themselves truth, are dangerous. What is the difference between the Yeshua of the Hebrews and the gurus of today who proclaim the same thing?

Peripsol: You see, one is historically embedded and it is easy to dismiss the others as "false prophets" in the eyes of believers, but remember that the Hebrew was called a "liar and false prophet" in his time and era, only to be a salvator for christians in later centuries. There is a qualitative difference here. Rather, listen to the philosophers of antiquity who, like Iamblichus, claimed that all theology, philosophy and science was a creation of man, but did that make him any less a master, meta-physicist, miracle worker and theurgist? He was deeply immersed in what he was doing as a holy pagan man, yet possessed enough humility to admit that "he did not know," yet he pursued it and acted, wrote, and ascended to the starry robes.

Fuomo: Ah yes, Peripsol, I am of rash character today, a bit annoyed, please do not take it too seriously – as an aside, sometimes I feel that Earth is a feast for hypersensualists from which, once outgrown, one would prefer to leave altogether this planetary hell that was not always as it is today. The Hellenes, who believed in metempsychosis, knew that our earthly sojourn was a "temporary thing," that is, their spirits were "not of here," but wrapped themselves in organisms that evolved over time. Oh, I am a child of Mother Nature and the starry heavens, but my race is celestial, claiming truth in the Orphic Tablets.

Peripsol: You see the earth as you are, your experiences were not to be appreciated, but you are right, there is a notion of fall here, the things they chase, the half asleep souls, the constant evaluation for unworthy things, the capture of the mind by the mass hypnosis of as if egregores. It seems that it has been turned upside down, where people affirm their stay on Earth like a prison, a circus of abstracts, chases, flesh and senses, and so their minds, emotions and souls have been completely separated from the aforementioned realisation and wedged forever in this prison. So, arrange yourself and defeat this rashness of mind, because something is trying to provoke you!

Swine and Principles

> Eat, drink, and sport; the rest of lifes not worth a fillip, quoth the King; Methinks the saying saith too much: the swine would say the selfsame thing!

— Burton, Richard THE KASÎDAH OF HÂJÎ ABDŰ EL-YEZDÎ, Translated And Annotated By His Friend And Pupil, F.B

Fuomo: ...and these uncivilized swine still wonder why I call them swine, because they thought I would turn into a moralizing, sacrosanct moron like themselves, or a hypocrite who indulges in morality. I am ethically a-moral, unlike those who are of the tribe of these devils, who reverse everything or appropriate what they think is real, while destroying and slandering my person, twisting and thwarting the idea because they are unable to convey anything in a pure or intelligent form as it was intended, and flattening it and mixing it with their mud in the battle of minds, hearts, souls and ideas, spreading nonsense about the souls and minds of men, in a game of perceptions, beliefs, illusions, ignorance and the like. My voice was robbed from me long ago when I was plunged into madness and obsession unworthy of an experienced magician. When I had upright, noble things to say, they silenced me with their parasites, or thieved whathever was of worth and remade it into their thwarted pretension of wisdom; now and then, when I was full of filth, rage, irrationality and hatred, it was unleashed and mingled the air. Silence is a refuge, true, with mental habits corroded and irreversibly damaged, yet I want to rage at those idiots who ruined everything from beginning to end, trying to abuse the voice of a magician for petty motives. In fact, it was used to the detriment of looking beyond the inhabitants of the Swineyard, who considered their strategic victory a success that was nothing more than a dagger turned against their own backs! When I regained my wits, I laughed endlessly at this mocking troupe plunging into the pools of fire and pits they had reserved for me. I would mock and laugh at them with a matured smile if I did not still have a remnant of my tired dignity. Hail the victorious, laurel-wreathed eagles of Rome, whom I see in the night and day skies, S.P.Q.R, Saturnine nobles, Hail the Horusian and Isidian hawks, when I see their scarab-studded hearts storming into this world on mighty wings, Hail all the families of heaven against this centuries-long betrayal and progressive contamination of this world trampled by pigs and fools! Only the latter have need to shout and quarrel, talk and rant through the hadesic air between earth and moon. They are ranked among the geniuses of the earthly stages and kept both as prisoners and overseers of the unfortunate few who hear their generous nonsense. Oh, if I did not see that I was falling for the liars of word of mouth, if I was not inspired by quiet, strong, powerful, pregnant ideas that contradict them, I would become either a zealous Christian or an antinomian Satanist instead of keeping an open mind that barely penetrates all the lies, slander, nonsense, brainwashing, indoctrination and spreading of ignorance. To make someone a Christian, they have to break his intelligence and free thinking to fill us with the nonsense of their outrageous religion and turn fine, noble pagan thoughts into their stupidity — thus another slave is born. In order to turn someone into a Satanist, they have to constantly destroy an intelligent person who ends up unleashing hatred against them and has no other point of reference than the Typhonian force itself. But with a pagan attitude one weighs and decides, with a scientia one thinks and learns, with a sharp mind one recognizes Providential motions and rejects enemies' nonsensical feast of power politics and vicarious religious wars for minds and souls in the name of these incompetent, half-crazy fools!

Peripsol: You proceed uncouthly, vulgarized by the conformist pigs you have dragged into their mud, they are like flags in the wind running toward their fixed targets, omnivores of their attachments, incapable of real thought and action. If you show the pigs food to the left, they run to the left, if you show them food to the right, they run to the right. However, they are similar to dogs in only one way — dogs respect themselves and bark and attack when necessary in their loyalty and canine behavior, likened to Anubis or the puppies of Hekate hunting a good game. Pigs, on the other hand, are intelligent only in terms of their omnivorous piggishness, that is, people who are like pigs use all their cunning and intelligence to enforce their petty deeds and motives and find immediate relief from their needs, while surpassing other animals in this respect and making themselves more equal than the rest, even if their meat is eaten by a lion who prefers to tear something of stature, a gazelle or cattle. So the lions that feasted on the Christians were acting according to their solar nature, and a lion would never find it reprehensible to tear up sacred livestock because of the latter's fantasies about its mildness. So your assessment is correct, because since there is no stability and no insightful, rational thinking that should distinguish a human being, no knowledge of good and evil for reason to lead to the better, and no intelligence to guide his judgment of what is right or wrong, what is beneficial and what serves the opposite, even dogs would not touch what the pig would pounce on, a human pig would betray another pig to find its own advantages, and in fact build on its crucified corpse, which you would so gladly crucify twenty times and gouge out its eyes as a Mithraic Corax, in revanchism, or they go against the fallen righteous, whom they outdo, outmaneuver and ruin, trying to make them equal in order to get what they want. What does a human pig want? Satisfaction, satisfaction of desire, prolongation of his illusions, prolongation of his stomachs suppressed desires, which he projects onto heaven, fulfillment of his whims by any means, with goals so low that even a poor old pig you have seen working as a stable boy would despise such a person. Do not dwell on it, you serpent relative of the winged dragons, may your thoughts be airy and starry! The political faction of the modern pigs is for a Cassandra seer to tear his robe or have a brave heart and retreat! If your vision clashes with the world, be sensible and retire from an estate you do not like, live while you can, and hurry away winged when you are over. Times change according to their laws. Be warned that the existing powers, having disarmed you, do not appreciate your presence in this world because you do not appreciate their scheming and refusing to be blind and ignorant, observe their swinery in full splendor. Pigs don't like to be exposed, especially when they see themselves as lions, naked as they are. Now go! Memento Mori — words of great Marcus Aurelius Fuomo: And so it is! The one who goes shall not break!

On Urania

Fuomo: I call you, Peripsol, to clarify my doubts. At night, as I continued my meditations on Gustav Holst's planets, I climbed in my mind through the sphere of Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, all the way to Urania, that powerful muse. Pay attention to the details of the operation, I felt as if my will, filled with ecstasy and inner laughter, expressed the cosmic principle, as if my genii and this will were one. I merely modulated its expression, but it was neither willful nor willless, it was perfectly attuned to this flow of cosmic forces that filled the space of the cosmos like waves, like Chaldean jinges, magical word beings. The next day I encountered the following practical problem: Whenever something opposes my will and tries to turn my nature against itself, I have to affirm it by hardening it and strengthening the will forces against the tide. I think this is harmful because the will alone as the directional carrier of vision and intention is crooked in that it has flaws, and you and I know that mortals are imperfect. But if I defend my will against minor bends of will, I harden it and fall straight into the performance of a botched magic trick, it coagulates around my spirit and thereby imprisons it with its shadow. On the other hand, when I want to tune and align my will with the whole, the larger view of these cosmic movements, I feel like I am moving through a minefield or a game of hide-and-seek, that between me and this great expression there is plenty of ignorance, self-centeredness, delusion, and purposeful or not purposeful deception. We know that nature hates emptiness, and I, as a hollow human, invite such influences more than often in mediumship. So I struggle to maintain and want to release those parts of my mind that can rush into this excellent understanding in free space, while ignoring all the debris and hubris of the earthly aethyric zones. To put it more clearly, between man, woman and the divine excellence of expressions, there is a multitude of smaller currents of forces that express themselves in the faces of these entities that blind us in the middle or perhaps, if we take into account the size, like a scanty veil of earthly dust here and there, distracting us from our works.

Peripsol: Your aspiration is that of a cosmic swindler, as Chuang Tzu said, to be one with what you do, and to perfectly match what you do with what you have experienced in the mighty spheres of Urania, you want to transfer it to life, but fail because the world is made up of manifold forces that want to move you in their own way, according to their own gravity. But they too are enveloped by this cosmic expression, but as corrupted forces they prefer to separate from it and act as bundles of peculiarities, natures, inclinations, colored energies wrapped around their substance. Think like a swordsman and imagine the scenery of these events like a good battle, and make yourself calm and serene before the fight, perceive in the fight all the events, as in a flow of phenomena, but move completely calmly through the changes, strike when necessary, defend when necessary, do not be discouraged by a temporary defeat or by fears resulting from disorientation. This should not stop you from working with determination when conditions are not met, otherwise you would lower your guard halfway and then retreat too quickly. Break those ties if you do not want a puppeteer to dominate you, and even if you do, elude his sphere of influence when you are not being watched, and return to your nature at all times. Do you remember the lesson from the Zenist text "Unrestrained Mind"? When you take the sword that is meant to strike you down and turn its power in your favor, it moves through the void. If you do not reach for the self, an army cannot defeat you because it strikes through emptiness. In other words, instead of creating pressure points in your will, observe the pressure movements that your opponents create and penetrate them, then quickly turn their swords into yours. Therein lies a simple secret. You do not have the time to understand their perspectives, movements, actions and motivations, but you put yourself in your opponent's shoes and strike through the void while disappearing from the scene as soon as the thought of pressure arises. If you master this, you will preserve your will and have more space to set it high. Train your subtle thoughts in this way, because they are very difficult to control and it is easy to break the focus of the subtle, delicate thoughts, as well as the subliminal ones that you can perceive but are difficult to control. Let them flow, but shape the riverbed as you please through the mental habits you have formed, dissolving those that do not benefit you and work against your goals. Any such tension between subject and object leads to greater knowledge of the self, for it is only through difference, through contrast, that you know who you are and where you are going. A person unmoved by opposites is governed by what he knows, often thoughtlessly; a person marked by inner struggles must be fully aware of himself at all times. If you cannot get rid of the opponents, use them in your favor and take them as a lesson. The greater the power of your concentration and focus, the greater the art of the tools.

On Dualisms

Fuomo: Peripsol, my angel, I hereby politely ask you to help me solve the following riddle: Some claim that the world is dual, others that it is a harmony, from what I have deduced from the Pythagoreans, the second monad is the dyad, this Artemisian bow which in great concentration distributes power in the world by the force of its arrow, that it is the first duality, pre-cosmic and standing before all diversity. Now to solve the problem in the phenomenal world, we should not follow an absolute example to find its magnanimous trace of an ideal world in the world of the Platonic shadows, how should I resolve these two?

Peripsol: As above, so below, but what you are asking is the question of diversity, which is an ordo ab chao, and chao ab ordo – do you understand this paradox?

Fuomo: To the extent that Ereb, the dragon that bites its own tail in timelessness, occupies the realm of Kronos, I can transfer what I know to the orders of phenomena below the eternal worlds.

Peripsol: Very well, do you remember what the Chaldeans and Egyptians taught about the Triad?

Fuomo: Ah, that it is perfected justice, with Isis at the base, Osiris, the mighty arm, and Horus at the hypotenuse, giving rise to triple transcendent worlds created in the pre-cosmic stage, which only later solidify in the space of the poseidonic universe, but are still above, as if they were unconquered, until, as the Egyptians claimed in their eschatology, everything will retreat into the bliss of the lotus and the abyss will be defeated and annihilated!

Peripsol: You have studied attentively! The worlds we are learning about are metabinary dualities, as in the Tao or the dyad, which divide evenly into multipolar qualities, shifts of energy in monistic causalities, leading to further ramifications within what nature allows before falling into the chaotic fires and reversing into subchtonic graveyards of forms. Well, my student, what do you think of this?

Fuomo: From my mortal perspective, the objective universe is of one and the same flavor, like the Buddha field, and yet people tend to divide phenomena into subject-object dependencies, and therefore the degree of their difference as duality, that is sensory, like cold and hot, darkness and light, that is categorical, like physics and metaphysics, that is conceptual, like right and wrong, good and evil, that is thematic, like politics and left and right. And yet here we are on the threshold of chaos, and behind the symbol and the content lies the fear of infinite libraries of possibilities. The foundation of human perception is dual because of the subject-object division, but the world is seamlessly adualistic.

Peripsol: We have often agreed that we participate in the order and ornamentation of the cosmos, and that the synesia, the patterns of laws, are found in all of this. If you decompose matter into infinity, you will find that it dissolves and disappears into nothingness, it resembles the infinite inspection of all phenomena – it is like the empty dharmas, as postulated by Nagardjuna, the great Nagin philosopher, the serpent man. But does this mean that we do not engage in meaningful pursuits in conventional reality when we have the transcendent and divine in mind?

Fuomo: It does. So let me come back to current world events, where ignorance rule the masses, when what is really needed is fearless reason and cooperation. What is the basis of the process?

Peripsol: The movement of principles built on ethos are the substance of staying, the statue of passionate wisdom drives the force from the insight into the unwavering observation of all perspectives and their combination with intelligence, while deriving a high acumen not to turn into a terrible mess. Critical thinking combines many disciplines and through continuous education and learning promotes reason, which is an architecture and geometry of thinking and weighing logical lessons that build on each other, while judgment, the balance is like the arrangement and composition of a rhetor – it must be sound and meet all the previously collected dews before, alas! Making a decision, an action in thought, word or deed, this is the very last thing we should do! But do not let that get you down, because if you are well trained in all of this, intuition works like a sharp blade – so true wisdom is about being at one with it, not thinking too much, thinking if wisdom fails you, then you have to rely on your thought processes and bare knowledge. If any of these equations do not work out and you give in to passion or any of the devils that haunt you, you will only bring misfortune to yourself and others. I must go now, the emissaries of the morning sun are calling for me.

Fuomo: The wisdom of the morning sun has visited me again. May you be remembered in eternity, Peripsol!

On Egyptian Magick. I

Fuomo: Here, when Mercury enters into trine with Jupiter, I call you, Peripsol, to dispel my doubts and illuminate my intuitions, which arise from pure reason and the experience with which the gods have endowed me, to eliminate any inconsistency, without being too authoritative about ancient magic, namely that of the royal Pharaonic priests and the golden-skinned soujourners of Egypt.

Peripsol: Let me listen to your explanations, and then we will decide together what knowledge there could be in every single point that you touch with your curiosity and your effective ceremonial word!

Fuomo: For "Heka" is the word that means magic, and is the son of Atum-Re, the god above the universe, who rises from the cosmic mud as the manifestations of his dominion, and I see it as a superior universal power that watches over order and gives power to Tefnut and Shu and all the other gods, as well as to the active and passive recipients of this power in the world systems. She can be likened to the "food of the gods," the divine nectar, a part of the natural order of things, which, like the life impulse, is the bloodstream of all worlds, as it can be likened to the breath of the world and the souls of the world. It is the preserver of the causes and the saver of the effects, in causality it is an essence of its manifestation. It dwells in every body and in every void, and in mortals it dwells in the body of the soul operated by the mind, and in the gods it thrives in their divine bodies operated by the Godhead as the inner Logos, and these mortals, capable of supernatural qualities, have the theogonic, leased logos from the inner logos of the gods, inasmuch as there are separate groups governed by the power of the ka or the power of the name, the soul, the spirit, and the effective power and magic of men, infinitely inferior to that of the gods. Some people are gifted with the inner logos of the gods to focus their energy as collaborators of the magic of the gods, others rely on their own inner logos as far as they – as mortals – are able to do so. Heka also denotes the time cycles of creation, as the clockwork of the eons, therefore both laws and time are contained in it, where in the transcended worlds the phenomena take their beginning, which become reality in the worlds we can recognize, that is, the manifested worlds. The Logos was called "Hu" and it was opened through the aspects of "Sia" or perception, in other words, one had to perceive in the right way to recognize the inner Logos, the outer Logos and the Logos of the gods. It is written that the Goddess Isis guarded the Order together with a certain Elder Magician, who was it? Was it the son of Re-Atum as Harpocrates, the Hypothenuse Elder Horus, the child on the lotus who commanded and created with speech as the silence of an idea in the most perfect and magnificent way?

Peripsol: The cobra goddess was powerful of magic, she merged with the powerful Isis, the enchantress of many worlds. With this knowledge, beware of the "Thousand Violent Ones," the chthonic demons. They were mentioned again centuries later in the Chaldean oracles as "many-headed tribes" and "rogue dogs" or "cacodaimons".

Fuomo: I have seen them in full force, but for some reason they have stopped harming me. Do I need to offer protection to the gods?

Peripsol: In part you are like them, for as you know your soul was killed and you appear to them as you are, in part they are divine protectors, and you have proven yourself worthy to a degree that some have adopted you and are no longer a great danger or terror, and for the most part the gods have had enough of your suffering in their hands. Be careful and do not provoke them, because they are dangerous, combustible and violent! Take precautions!

Fuomo: Thank you, Peripsol. May we say that we too are protected by Heka, the inner Logos, just as Ra's Heka is protected in his own divine body, the immortal manifestation of the Sun, transcendent as Hyperion? Therefore, Apophis strikes Ra, but cannot penetrate the sun with his magic, because it is the center, the whole, and the transcendent root that Apophis cannot penetrate, as he is slain and bound by the gods to protect the heka of this world?

Peripsol: Well said, the gods guard the order of Heka insofar as you are your Ba's, a delegated, embodied mask of Heka, the Ka power of your mind and soul is that of your magical potency and power. Hk is also the order, the justice that consecrates the Ka of the magician and the sorceress, consecrated by the gods to practice magic in order to preserve and maintain justice and the order of the cosmos. It is the self-sufficient creative force, effective and radiant, that intermingles with its subjects, the bodies, the incarnate and disincarnate operators throughout the universe.

Fuomo: A sorceress expressed herself thus: "I have made spells in my heart," meaning that she has bound and invoked her Ba-Kheper and engaged in joint operations with a god or goddess in which she has redirected, "shpr" – or created – an effect, like Isis, who has overcome fate and whom fate obeys, and the Uraean serpent, in which the serpent is the son of Isis, while the Ka-Khepher operand of the former theology consults the Hemsut of the sorceress. There are the spells that are pronounced with the heart, the mind, the soul, the heart in silence, and the spells that are pronounced by performance, speech and other actions, in which Medu-Neter, the words of the gods, receive their power through Heka, similar to the Gnosis Arretos in the Homoiosis Theio of the Greeks and that of the Theion Ergon of the Theurgic actions of high magic, in which the procession of metaphors and highly developed actions, or the simple actions marked by sincerity and truth, open the gates to the great effective actions in which we are empowered to perform theurgy as if we were elevated to a divine status, or to perform the inner Logos attuned to the movements of our will in various modalities, making us agents of Heka. Finding the source within is the purest act of turning to the great divine, that is the greater vehicle in which all pass through all and one through all and all through one, while the granting of logos through possession or temporary emanation or a skill in execution is the greater vehicle of the gods vis-a-vis mortals, while the lesser vehicles are based on the operation relying on lesser sources or on an unbalanced temporary heka of the magician in question. Do I understand this correctly, that a magician or sorceress should first seek the divine "Hu" of the gods and goddesses, and then find his own logos and heka and merge the two into a single mixture to maintain the order of divinization, while avoiding the petty acts of parable for personal achievements that do not spring from the discoveries of the Divine, but rather shallow projections of the mind and whimsical travails of its constantly erratic movements, as if enslaved by it?

Peripsol: This is a striving to strengthen the connections with the traditions and the greater whole and to advance on the path.

Fuomo: I would like to digress for a while, Peripsol. I think this is a necessary step to illustrate the type and the sign, the archetype and its manifestation, its presence, its time, its being, its return, its atavism. In an ancient story, dry myrrh is thought to be the tear of Horus. This story seems naive. Can you tell me more about this kind of understanding?

Peripsol: Certainly, if we take the world in hypostasis and assume that there are gods and divine powers, then everything is encompassed by the divine...

Fuomo: Without moralizing about it and without taking our interpretations as certain...

Peripsol: Listen to what is said directly, do not look for guile and subtexts that are just the projections of your own passing infantilism. You know better: the art of philosophy lies in its polistructural and poliperspectival approach, in the use of such and such models that illustrate certain things not only in the most honest and truthful way, but also in the most beautiful, harmonious and appropriate to the ethos and essence of the subject in question. Consequently, all material substances that somehow occur in nature are also emanations or generations of deeper forces in different ways. For this reason, in some later witchcraft traditions, herbs and plants were associated with gods, Angeloi, daimons, heroes, or the shadows, etc. This is because the incarnations of certain forces resemble them in their actions or characteristics on the one hand, and share their essence on the other. In the course of evolution and co-generation of all life on Earth, certain forces were trapped in them as if they also nourished them with a certain vigor vital, therefore, from the point considered, namely ancient Egypt, an Egyptian rightly attributed the metaphor of a tear of myrrh. In other words, they invented a metaphor based on a transcendent atavism, focusing on the similarity with the myrrh, which, like the plant world, has existed for millions of years. But the myrrh is also the child of timeless eons, just as you are. But are you more related to your time or to timeless realms? That is the range of time cycles. To put it practically, you feel the magnetism and life forms of plants, don't you?

Fuomo: That's right, when I hold my hands over a plant, a rose, a rhododendron, they have different qualities that I would call magnetic, I also feel the life force of some entities and souls, just as I feel the magnetism of people and animals. Everything you show I find interesting and I will consider it, my good teacher. But before you accuse me of impatience, please enlighten me as to how we would explain the use of heka in ancient times in modern times?

Peripsol: Heka permeates everything, even though it may be depleted or reduced by its various organization on Earth, by mismanagement on the part of local authorities, or by invisible usurpers who have abused the existing status quo of the ancients and have begun to colonize and amass for themselves the terrestrial distribution of Heka. This should not worry you, because you have developed your independence, which is connected to a star and embraced by the gods. But it is a sad matter that this mismanagement has turned the earth into a terrible prison and a kind of citadel, and at the same time the removal of these prison bars would mean the total collapse of the order of the counterfeiters who have unlawfully placed themselves in the positions of architects. Rest assured that they will pay with the blood and starvation of millions of souls. While these usurpers sit temporarily in their towers, they will wail in the cosmic abysses until the end of universal time, when they will be struck down by the solar forces. But there are so many beautiful, invisible worlds that escape the attention of these usurpers, but which you have noticed. So ignore the blinders they want to put on you and have a great perspective with wisdom and measure. Do not engage in dangerous operations that exceed your strength and time, because you know they are possible, but they disrupt a higher order and are totally impermissible or even inharmonious with the greater harmonies. "Your roots come from the depths, but your powers lie in the heart of Hermes-Thoth".

Fuomo: I have had the experience that when I was connected to the ancient realms, the depths of the moon and the toad gods of the earth, it proved devastating to my spirit.

Peripsol: You babble like a child now, spreading your words all over the Aethyrs. Let them rest Fuomo, mind you, not only yours, but also those of those who received the tunnels into these realms, but you were a victim, not a culprit. And jokingly, you have befriended some powers, in a very strange, eerie way.

Fuomo: Oh yes, forgive me, good Peripsol, but before I retire, please answer me one more question: so what is it that unites spell and object of the spell?

Peripsol: It was called epiclesis and practice or incantation and rite, the calling connected you with Heka, the rite was the exercise of its power and effect. You also enchant with words and recitation, for you can bestow your heka on objects, as you know, insofar as you can consecrate them by the power of the gods. Protect yourself from curses, because they make you unhappy, and that is the original meaning, to be cursed means to be turned away from order and to become a miser.

Fuomo: Thank you, Peripsol, all the best, may your beautiful wings be full of splendor and your scarab full of power!

On Egyptian Magick II

Fuomo: Peripsol, I would like to learn more about Egyptian magic to enchant the Skye, to gain knowledge and blessings from the gods, as I am inspired by you through and through, good angel, Daimonion of the Sun. "Riding on six dragons, may I consolidate my destinies, may the depths sustain me, may the potential of the sky become a reality in the world and in me" — this I have learned from the Book of Changes, may I invest my heart soul in that of the star spheres and the great golden fields of Yaaru above!

Peripsol: The lords of the divine worlds encircle, enchant, the root "phr" denoted this action, Elder Horus, the great magician, encircles, encircles the serpent of time, the Ouroboros, binds place and space, time and void, territory and causality. Thus the ancients went around the mastaba, around the dwellings, around their space, to bless and protect, to displace and bind, to curse and weaken, to bind time and space with Heka, that mighty essence! The great Rudjeret, when she heard the magic of the primordial waters, when it revealed itself to her, this supernatural music that Pythagoras also heard, with spheres of sounds of glory and mighty songs of the cosmos, she circled like a mighty goddess in her space, surrounded, enchantress!

She purified, made pure the sacred territory, erected a marker for the cosmic space, protected from invading forces, may You stand in the midst of the underworld, the earth and the stars, the divine fires and the cosmic abyss, the phenomenal, the transcendent and the all-pervading worlds, adoring celebrant, worshiper of the stars, all-pervading!

Fuomo: Ah, this is the union and the descent into these waters, sanctifying the bond of union between the gods, the world and man, and the magician and the sorceress! Much like Re, who encloses and surrounds, protected by his heka, phr-ka, enchanting, enclosing, silent language, I must beware of words! The completed cycle is "dbu" — the word for perfect enclosure. May I enchant with the heart like that great enchantress who enchants the heart — and captivates the minds of people as my magic circulates in their hearts, souls and minds as I oppose the evil machinations, try to pave my own ways, least of all my and my enemies' poison and black blood, poisoning them to death and scorching them in a pool of fire — may I extinguish the enemies' works and strike straight through their ranks like an Artemisian arrow — with my name, heart, will, power, with my magic, my orbits, may the work of the gods become reality on earth, in the transient times of blind masses and their corrupt leaders, may this terrible dawning of an age that should be golden, have a spark of hope that reignites when the destinies obey in the immovable movements of fate!

On Egyptian Magick. III

Fuomo: Peripsol, I ask you again to shed some light on the matters that trouble me, so that with the books in hand, experience behind me, and your interpretation at my disposal, I can clear the doubts on certain subjects.

Peripsol: Airy, prominent and benevolent I listen to you, future intelligencer of Saturn and Moon in the house of Ra Fuomo: It has been found that the Egyptian word "sp" means a spell, a deed, a magical act, and "ir sp" means the art of making and casting spells, making magical books, grimoires, an act of keeping oneself safe and exercising magical control over events, in other words, taking a magical rite as a performance or act, so how does it work?

Peripsol: The causality of self-consistent virtualities that proved effective while undertaken with an intention in a given framework, endowed with a structure and mechanics homogeneous with the universes of meaning, made symbols and actions effective. They are de facto the deep objectivity of certain performances.

Fuomo: May I take this to mean that just as in the case of "hp n sh," the script pattern of the sacred hieroglyphs, there are patterns in physics, magic, and other ways of mapping the territory of what the Hindis call "lila," or the play, and of a world of subtle patterns and their laws in motion that are absorbed by experiences and gnoses, bestowed by the gods and supported by practice and learning, virtue and intellect, honesty and justice, feeling and ratio, temperance and self-knowledge, beauty and the pursuit of happiness, do we get to combine these patterns in one masterful act of a technician of magic, an artist-magician, an artist-enchantress, to permeate the sacred actions and arts? How do we know where the limit is, when some with little experience inflate themselves in great misdeeds, others with great experience lose their minds, where is the natural matter that forbids abuse?

Peripsol: Child of chaos transformed into order, listen – Heka is watching over the natural law of the cosmos, so also of the solar house, namely the solar system. Damage can be done by abuse, well weighted logos can turn lead into gold, but beyond political, religious, military, ideological, covert and overt games on earth there are powers that take command, their intervention is continuous, but ultimately it is the people, little gods and goddesses, who decide the fate of this world, drawn into madness or enlightened by reason. The veils behind which we work are thick, but we are not the only ones trying to push this world up, there are many currents struggling behind this veil, of lower rank, of different worlds, of different ways of expressing the cosmic osiric breath, the heka of their logos different, but ultimately the supreme law is immovable, there for eternity. Their scientists hardly touched the problem of patterns a few decades ago. Your craft is to take the patterns you perceive ("Sia") with your Logos ("Hu") and decide what is wise, just and reasonable to guide you, while being guided and shaped in the movements of the deities that are in harmony with you, and disturbed by invasions of your mind and body that distract you from the above goals.

On Egyptian Magick. IV

Fuomo: While the morning rays of Ra lick me with blessings, and the emissaries of the golden-brown and silver-blue hawk-like wings hover majestically overhead, holding their khepers in Uraeic bliss, I call upon you, Peripsol, to come and shed more light on these questions which are so near and dear to me through the wisdom of my lord Horus.

Peripsol: We have already addressed many issues, but I know that the theologies of the Noma and the temple cities differ. Reading your thoughts, I see that you are following the example of Iamblichus, who advocates the heliopolitan theology of the nascent Atum that brought forth Shu and Tefnut. Here, in some cases, the creative act is substituted and reified by the human acts of spitting and masturbation through which the act was performed. The act of spitting was so important that it had its own hieroglyph "p". May I draw a comparison with synecdochism, in which a part of the whole universe of meaning is taken and, by representing the whole by similitude, a category of an act is drawn from the indivisible whole, which is thus a substitute for the whole by similitude. So before you accuse the ancients of superstitious naiveté, consider that you are performing the very acts of intellectual magic insofar as they are practiced by methods derived from the behavioral corpus of your time, acceptable to you, and so on and so forth. Be aware that the Greek term ousia, personal effort, has always been necessary to make progress, unlike some religions that claim it is enough to believe. I point out to you that we can believe in crap and decide that it makes us divine, thus enchanting us with the darkness of ignorance and delusion. But practice, supported by structure and theoria, is the way to any form of alchymic reconstellation in the approach of your soul to the Divine. Moreover, the experience and knowledge of the experience is of utmost importance and necessity, which, compared to the act of swallowing in ancient Egypt, was a main prerequisite to move forward with the magical undertakings. The act of spitting was neither negative nor positive, it could be charged for blessing, protecting, cursing, healing, self-defense, as in the case of the Black Cobra, it was simply power charged. It was compared to fire, and the ureic snake venom spit as in the instruction of Amenemope was commemorated in the crowns, because "one rejoices in the Uraeus, one spits on Apep", it was an action similar to trampling, stabbing, burning. In the statement of Onchsheshonqy there is an old proverb: "He who spits on the sky, on him it falls".

Fuomo: We have established in the past that magic can work regardless of territory, but can it work only on the living or also on the dead?

Peripsol: May the dead rest and find comfort, but it was known that some magic could affect the underworld, the earthly, and perhaps the celestial, so that both the living and the "mwt", the dead, could be affected. Thus, the enemies of Pharaoh could be cursed whether they lived or not. Likewise, an enemy who escaped battle to safety could be cursed to meet death elsewhere. The Greek "kakadesis" or the Latin "ligatio" was a form of binding a soul caught in the enchantment, as if it were knotted in a web of causalities that worked in both worlds and, moreover, forced the sympathy of the synchronous causalities to a certain result.

Fuomo: Yet somehow I feel tempted to curse some of my enemies, as I have done before, to drive them to death and fire.

Peripsol: It is much wiser than following your cruel instincts to call for the Arabic phrase: "bitiksar ullah' waraah", to break a pot behind an unwelcome guest. It is a nice opportunity to show your discontent. In fact, this was also a ritual among the Egyptians to break red pottery, because red was the color of Seth, and although he was a brother of Horus, he controlled the chthonic worlds of the shadow, as you remember, his priesthoods once visited you. Also that what was written in red ink had to do with demonic worlds, so dealing with these worlds was somehow related to this color.

Fuomo: Perhaps the color was chosen because of the dimensional synergistic layering of sound, color, physical and metaphysical properties in a certain Pythagorean geometry or the Bardo colors that are well described in the Tibetan Book of the Dead. Ah yes, the robed figures and the jackal-headed shadow of the chief priest, during the ritual of swallowing the symbolic phallus of Osiris, where I clearly saw the dead behind the Thanatos veil. So why did the great Lord Horus make me a jubilant avatar here for tiny details of time, and there I was gifted with the breath of life while Seth intervened?

Peripsol: That is because, according to tradition, you were revisited by these priesthoods and deities to whom you are subject as a mortal, and it is beyond your understanding and human psychology, your judgments and opinions, why it was so. It was as it was, now then, that the gods are beyond the scope of mortal understanding and they do not indulge in the childish behaviors of humans, although they are brought closer to human understanding through stories and mythologies. Do you think that the force called "Nut" in Egypt was angry like a little girl and threatened to destroy the universe and the Ennead if the gods did not listen to her? Or did some scribe want to use a metaphor to capture the depth of preventing disharmony between the cosmic powers?

Fuomo: Yes, sometimes.

Peripsol: Yes, a sense of humor is intended and ecstasy, joy and laughter, but remember that the forces of the cosmos are profound, gigantically strong and infinite, they contain many movements and inclinations.

Fuomo: Going back to Seth being associated with the desert, some magicians used pebbles to replace the image of enemies, and sand was used as a platform for images, ritual lamps, and the like. It occurred to me, vaguely, that in addition to the unity theory of life, there is also a unity hypothesis of matter, where all matter comes from a source that creates sympathy in between. Thus a desert is a container of sand representing the earth, the dunes are moved by the air, it is burned by fire, it is a remote place, uninhabitable, and so it represents the desolate world of the cosmic chthonic void in the black fire of Azoth the mystic. I think about the admixtures of elements, which are an external representation of their internal properties, defined not only by physical properties, but by a phenomenal understanding, e.g. "the desert is an empty, desolate space", but also a-phenomenal "the dimension of the desert is that of emptiness, desolation, spaciousness", which opens a whole new paradigm for a-paradigmatic thinking about certain properties.

Peripsol: Well thought out, so sand in this sense is understood as cosmic foundation, matter represented by the base of the triangle or Isis, but it is not matter as you understand it in your company, but a substance of manifestation in reality that transcends time and space and is matter in manifestation in time and space. Although the uniformity you speak of is not uniformly distributed, for example, if we see a number and associate it with one thing, we might associate all those numbers with one interpretation, which would be nonsensical in a world of diversity and generation. However, if you have a magical sense, intuition, foresight, causal insight, and a good sense of not getting caught up in deception or misdirection, then you can sift an order out of chaos and extract meaningful resources from the world around you, as well as read the sacred letters and signs of the transcendent and invisible worlds in this one that correspond to the world closest to you and known to you all the time.

Fuomo: One more thing... "ph-ntr" meant to appeal to the gods to use "hk" in the name of the practitioner, as I do, deprived of my soul and sahu, but how can it be used like that for both evil and good purposes, or evil and creative, equally to other functions?

Peripsol: Egyptian theology also assumes the unity of the Godhead, as "Godhead transformed into millions," and the method you speak of was conducive to later Neoplatonic theurgy. It is the merging of the two forms, for "ph-ntr" and "hk" is the ability to merge and focus the power of the deities through their permission in the world, while "kh" is the personalized use of that focus. In this sense, "sms (ntr") meant serving and worshipping a deity and using heka as a sign of this bond, while the magia of the Zoroastrians had a different overtone and was strictly personal as the Romans understood it, but under the magoi of Zoroaster and Babylon, magia was the "sms ph-ntr" of the Egyptians. Consider, however, that the Romans, moved more by reason than by magic, often forbade such practices, as Q. Aemilianus Saturninus, prefect of Aegypt under Septimus Severus, showed, threatening with the death penalty anyone who invoked such practices in office. They were considered superstitious and dangerous, as the Egyptian and Roman ways of thinking differed in the II century.

Fuomo: However, as mages of rational thought, we merge the two to see what wisdom can be found by discarding superstition and relying on intellect, science, and the patterns in magic and metaphysical reflection that are useful and directed toward good.

Peripsol: That is correct. But remember that it was the Christians who stripped magic of its theological basis and banned both Roman and Egyptian practices, while destroying even the most sacred arts and leaving their own theology to promote magic.

Fuomo: They banned private magic, forgot about priestly magic, and practiced magic by calling it "sacred works of God" without knowing how it works. The irony.

Rosa Mundi

Fuomo: Peripsol, I call you when Saturn rises with Jupiter and the full moon goes west, for I have discovered a great secret. Unfolding the Tetraktys of the Master Pythagoras and the Lambda of the Master Plato, I have unraveled it from the Monad to the Decad, following all proportions and ratios, so that it seems to turn into a magnificent rose. Is it the Rosa Mundi, often mentioned by so many mystics?

Peripsol: They have discovered the divine heartbeat and breath, which, like the persistent flower with thorns, protects itself from the profane. For the rose is the queen of flowers and inaccessible like the mysteries of Isis. It can be plucked, but never possessed, for it dies when it is detached from the retinue of its sisters. The profane must not do violence to the mysteries, for they are forever beyond their reach, and violence must not be done to the laws, for the profane contradict their reach with the foundations on which they are based.

Fuomo: Is it the heartbeat and the breath of the divine soul that opens and blossoms in every true case of alignment with ideas of the purest kind, the most honest and greatest openness, which are discovered only where the barriers between falsehoods, surrogates and illusions, deceptions and delusions are removed from human souls and hearts, so that they fully draw from heka mentioned in the Egyptian mysteries, in love and inner struggle, in joy and despair, in awe, glory, downcast sorrow and woe? It is when the pure light of consciousness enters and illuminates everything with itself, when the microcosm aligns with the macrocosm in its highest octaves, when the song soars high and opens to the cosmic harmonies like a hawk in flight enjoying nature in the element of air.

Peripsol: Many times you were touched by it before you wrapped yourself in robes of darkness to protect yourself from the stinging pain – well understood, but one day your spirit will tear the black veils and you will be free again. It is everything caught in the mystery of the breath and the pulse, as the pure ideas, clouded by nothing, are expressed in man, his reason and his highly intellectual thoughts floating in the air, reaching to the stars, a feeling of the highest sublimity and self-identity in the self-created nature with the universe of the greatest kind!

Fuomo: How can you express silence when you want to speak?

Peripsol: Do not hurt it with words, a true craftsman submits to these currents and dances on their threads, a magician artfully shapes them, but when he or she is caught by himself, he cuts himself loose from the divine continuity and calling and owns himself as property and everything around him as what he has to control. It is a balancing act, but your path was decisive!

Fuomo: What about the others? I turned my compassion into vile anger a long time ago.

Peripsol: Look at the youth in unhindered love, at the children's play, at the foxes playing in the winter snow, at a woman in agonizing pain who broke with grief because she felt that very pure peace in her heart. Need I remind you of how your own defenses were broken when your beloved hurt herself? You cried like a child after you stopped her, or that wise look on your face when you sold her dreams and lectured her with a fatherly smile about the transience of your common toil on earth, or when you fell into a long embrace after your quarrel, or when you fell wine-drunk on the forest floor and had sex when she was the seductive witch and you were her faun, or the memories of the rage when your grandmother died and the silence that followed as you watched the blood flow from her corpse in the hospital, or the feeling of a mounted conqueror when you thought you could almost build an entire empire in the Asian steppes, or the pride and contempt toward those who wronged you when you boldly challenged them and won, or the sickly scream when you were overcome with agony in a locked psychiatric ward, or when you looked to the stars and spoke the words to the gods in great longing and abandonment from the world, or when your heart spoke noble things in silence, or when in great rage you wanted to destroy and annihilate everything that hurt and humiliated you. Are these not the movements of the world? Honest, objective, free from all cowardice, falseness, genuine through and through, and as natural as a mortal man can be?

Fuomo: You remember my life well. If only I were not so forgetful… but then I would freeze in time and not become a phoenix with each new event in time.

Peripsol: That's true, so both remember and forget, so go on and – live!

Paradigms of Ascent

Fuomo: Here Peripsol, I would like to know about the retreat from this world, as I have affirmed my desire to leave my Dionisian tomb, Hades, with a sweet, merciful death, with a positive conclusion at the very end of my path. What ways can Thanatos offer to re-enter the Eros of life?

Peripsol: Thine art difficult and paved with dangerous stones that span like a bridge over the abyss. Because many masters and mistresses have perished, even if they were endowed with the best intentions, the best knowledge and the best transformation of their minds, hearts and souls. The most important thing first: realize that the way is blocked by every possible ignorance, obstacle, meanness that the traitors have put in your way, as if they were traps and entanglements. It is enough that the commonwealths of ignorance flourish in the hearts and minds of men, so that they go to their deaths and, deprived of their bodies, rise in surprise when the merciless wheels of destiny turn. Know, then, that those who have not left this world in time will not do so any time soon. Those who are caught in the passions of this world are driven back to it by the kinship with what their senses demanded, and those who are

chastened by abstracts that their minds obeyed are captured by those pleasant attachments that they projected, and run toward sailing this slave ship without sail or rudder. Know, then, that darkness has conquered the human mind and hearts over time, so that the truly realized one is like an island of light surrounded by a dark night full of storms. One must have a strong heart to move through this valley of shadows, with a lantern of one's own spirit to light the way on the steps of constant deceptions, illusions, which one leaves behind so that the exhausted traveler can leave the Platonic cave. Do not surrender to sorrow, because this perception is the darkness itself, which is overwhelmed by joy when outbreaks of sadness and tears seize your heart. It is to enjoy the black roses, but not to touch them nor to pick them, until the landscape clears more and more and you see it as a desert illuminated by the isiac joys. Oh, how joyfully you move through the deserts of the heart in all associations, how gladly you watch the sport of nature, knowing that it is a seed of your death. Some who have abandoned the world have lived in the shadows, burned by the sun, fled from the burning light, kept away from the transcendent field of gold, thinking that combustion is all there is, not seeing beyond the symbol. There are other paths, which are a circus for prisoners, who enchant themselves in the darkness of their cathedrals, who are overcome by tamas, paths of sorrow and joy, who have overcome nothing, and yet dare to believe that, without conquering this world within, they have conquered heaven! Oh, the happy ancients, their way to the stars was sanctified! Over the centuries, Typhon and the demonic world have seemingly conquered the earth. Few see how these bored shadows, patiently watching the life of mortals, yawn out of boredom, because they have already won! They observe you as a curiosity, as a madman who goes back and forth in search of knowledge and deception, but since they are sure of your own demise, they have long ceased to turn against you, turn away? What a laugh, you would have to be a giant! Call upon the Gods of Providence while you still can, as you wisely do, to save you, like a child in time. You are not able to do it yourself, because your spirit is broken, damaged! To overcome this seemingly trapped state, you should not feel like a prisoner, otherwise you will be trapped in cause and effect, like a victim of the machinations of your enemies. Wise were the Dharma teachers, wise the Platonic seers, wise the Hindi masters, wise, wise sages of Babylon, wise the priests of Egypt, wise the Hellenic priests! O forsaken wisdom, where are you now? Not enough! Not enough! And people are like children, fools, their sorrow and happiness blind them! They cannot distinguish a deep truth from the empty repetition of a thought they consider enlightened! They cannot distinguish the play of their brain from a great insight! They mistake an emotional projection for love! Shall I enumerate all the masterful initiations and courses for others, shall you?

Fuomo: The world is open and pregnant with all teachings, an awake mind will read and understand the passages of the world. Do you think that everyone will be allowed entry if they do not work, struggle, transform, change? Do you believe that all people who inhabit the earth, all newborn souls, have the conditions to rise above themselves, to form, to transform, to change? It is true that in nature nothing disappears, but according to an ancient law, what does not go beyond the earth is of the earth and therefore remains on the earth. There are those who remain in great compassion and observe the ocean of toil among human souls, but is this not a futile work? Is it not a work of heroes like Sisyphus? Master Peripsol, is all lost then? Why should I not stay?

Peripsol: You are assigned elsewhere, you have suffered enough! Times follow times, happy son, cursed son, failed son, dragon! Even if you had the means and miracles to change it, most of humanity would consider it entertainment, the times of greatness of people are over. They would consider philosophy an entertainment, spiritual journeys a recreation, guidance a borrowed vision. How do you plan, your insight is individual, take what you can and write it down, maybe a kindred heart and soul will read your signs and interpret them to further his own day! Another mind free from the deluded who take your words for truth and proclaim a sinister allegiance, a label of fetishization of mere thought! Faith! Faith is something for fools, if they cannot understand!

On Character

Fuomo: Noble Peripsol, I often find myself in a gigantomachy with darkened mind, when the light of insight does not arrive. Then I commit all sorts of evil inconsistent with the portents of intellect, self-control and high integrity that I aspire to and revere. A voice of an idea whispered in my head, "Malice and stupidity are caused and invited by weakness. Make yourself alert and strong, using these virtues you have already established as a reference point for a resourceful harmony that thrives in relation to the divinities, forces, and ideas that evoke pure, noble rapture from us mortals here." How can we attain this power?

Peripsol: Some traits and characteristics are as they are, they are hard to change and hard to sublimate, they are like iron. But with the right approach, they can be transformed into the right behavior. If a fire dragon from the vajra family indulges in irrational anger or arrogance, can not he follow that force to transform it into fierce compassion through boddhisattic principles? These character traits are divided into three classes: Those of iron, already mentioned, those of silver, and those of gold. Those of silver are valuable, but they can deteriorate with time if not used for the right purpose; those of gold are splendid and beautiful, and they are trophies of nature, of the person's innate genius and character; they are virtues that are as difficult to change as the vices of iron, but they too can be misused and directed to the wrong purpose, according to the old quotation from Iamblichean about undertakings that lead to the bad. For it is often the case that we are honest in our virtue but do not see our true reflection in cruelty. A just man was not one who slaughtered whole villages in his anger, a sacrosanct imbecile was often a pope, a lying idiot who was crucified, spreading his devils and poisoning Rome while ruining the true philosophical religions of the ancients. As you have noted, most worthies who are Caesarized are both noble, of high intellect, embellished in nature, and great in understanding the world, philosophers and emperors, leaders of their men. Remember that rigor in self-discipline makes you stiff and you soon enter into catastrophes which you evade, self-control in moderation should at all times be combined with reason measured by golden standards. This is a true living meditation, to see through the phenomena, to fight them quickly, not losing the image of the great illusion that separated the prisoners in Plato's cave from the great essences of the deities! Constantly confront old pains and free yourself from any stiffness that has solidified into terrible qualities. Even if you are stung by evil tongues, intrigues and the like, may Volupia Angerona, the goddess of pleasure and silence, reward your patience with great strength of character and an indomitable nature. Waste neither your speech nor your mind on trivial spectacles, concentrate on the point of strength which you have since recognized and are developing. It is of Saturnian paternal statism, yes, but also of Mercurial swiftness, be reminded that Saturnian work is faster and more prone to great risk and danger, rest in Mercurial quicksilver before Saturn freezes you in gravity again. Always, at all times, think of every change in your life and consciously shape it with this in mind. And now I say goodbye to you, keep it in your heart.

Fuomo: Farewell, embodied hero, great one, may you prosper! One day we will unite our forces into one, until then I need your guidance on earth!

On the Harmony of Monads

Fuomo: Master Peripsol, I was wandering through the night, thinking about the symbols of the starry vaults of the sky, about so many wonders that are signs of the intelligibility of the Great Worlds, that carry me like a child and protect me with delightful garments that nourish my philosophy, in the kindest way. The thought came to me that "every harmony is dissolved in a monad". What does that mean?

Peripsol: Accepting as axiom that dyadic dualism exists and that the world is in constant movement, there is no other way of mastery than to restore the perfect monad within, to contemplate it, to reconcile the opposites in a dynamic harmony of solutions that lead to the centre where everything around us changes, which is nothing other than the spirit that dives into the vastness of the world and blossoms whenever the alchymic ground is ready. This means not mean mortification, i.e. dying to the world, it means an active method of engaging in all states of life and being, while the inner truth is immovable and everything for the ethos, mental continuum, behaviour and operational philosophy is derived from it. That is, the goal is to achieve a self-contained harmony through means and imaginative dedicated moderation and restraint to polish, bind and release all tensions, like a master swordsman cutting the net when needed, like a seamstress spinning it when required.

Fuomo: Master Peripsol, whenever I have reached a state of calm equilibrium, or that satiating feeling of numinous joy and awe, gratitude and grace, tranquilly and commitment, devotion and noblest thoughts, after a while my mind has been invaded by the most terrible emotions and senseless anger stemming from ignorance! Sometimes I am afflicted by malicious entities which favour such a state, sometimes by entities which are turbulent when they mix with the human spirit, not with the intention to do harm, but to unite – to the detriment of my self-identity and the stability of my spirit. What is the remedy and where does it come from?

Peripsol: Remember that too much light invites darkness, and the more light you emit, and that is a one-sided approach, then you provoke imbalances of a sinister kind. All forms of intrusion into the external natures originate in the forces that are translated into their natures. For example, tamas is a heavy substance of black fire, and in the chthonic, demonic worlds leads to perpetual heaviness and gloom, while in the human worlds it leads to darkening of thought and severe melancholy or depression; dominia of chaotic substances leads to disorder and madness; that of the air element and positive mercury to brightness and quickness of the intellectual mind receiving ideas. So choose wisely the worlds with which you cooperate, remembering that any nature that does not dominate you will sooner or later become a friend or an acquaintance, and you have become respectful in the eyes of some darker worlds of the shadows and the dead, while the blessing of heaven is constant. I also know very well your kindness towards the demons and the dead, it is a form of wise compassion and determined understanding, but do not dwell too much on it. I also know well how much you respect the order of the stars and the heavens, which has made you a worshipper of the divine. You are not a Manichean, perhaps a lover of harmony, but if you lose balance you will be involved in the old dualistic war – beware. To be wise you must understand the dualistic nature of the world, but for yourself – preserve the harmonious monad to grow into maturity and true wisdom, then and only then can you be a counsellor and a sage to both. All worlds rent something of themselves in the world-building, and then they differ in that they have their beginning in the generation which they themselves have generated. To understand this paradox, think of a plant that grows with its branches and leaves in harmonious proportions from the seedling, then it begins to make sounds of itself with its life and influences itself to repeat the proportions in other branches and leaves. Thus, like a tree, the world grows steadily and then influences itself in various varieties of forces, powers, and ideas that lead to differentiation and analogies that are intertwined. Some imagine that this creates perfect symmetry, but this is not so. Rather, artificial generation finds room for many within the confines of its laws while maintaining an indivisible unity through it all. The harmony of the monoids is different, containing both, but striving for the producer, the divine, whose presence is felt even in the deepest cosmic abysses. Whenever there is an entity, whenever the form is not deprived of its substance – there is divinity, only the complete nothingness is without it, and this does not concern us, because this is also a positive manifestation of the Divine. Whenever you encounter the pull of void and the black fires of chaos, imagine yourself like a crow feasting on a carcass, like a monk performing a Maranasati mortuary ritual, and meditate on the impermanence of phenomena – until the torch of knowledge illuminates your mind, until the torch of knowledge illuminates your mind, and everything rises from the murky, shadowy waters. Set sail and steer yourself into the luminous radiance that is both the black light of the mystics and the clear light of consciousness and the divine fires of the stars.

On Innocence, Justice and Brothels of Time

Fuomo: Master Peripsol, for years I was treated like a murderer, and my opponents attacked me like their worst enemy, I was the victim of many torments, intrigues, slanders, lies, humiliations, ridicule, and I asked myself: „Where did I make mistakes that the most vicious murderers, serial killers, warmongers who slaughtered many are pardoned, while I am treated with disgusting disrespect, disrespect, hatred and petty envy, comparable to the envy of pigs jealous of another's food or copulation, as well as abstract things that lack status, wealth or birthrights, for they were nothing more than a conceit without any comparison in reality, for I was never in possession of these things, and yet some believed — on the contrary — that I was gifted beyond their tolerance with some »invisible stuff« that they did not have, and they took it for granted, as a promise of an illusion that could be realized at any time. Amusing and cruel!

Peripsol: Be assured that your struggles were worthwhile, because you not only tracked down all the movements against you, but also sincerely ignored the calumnies that you heard and noticed, and disregarded all the machinations about which your spies informed you, so that it was at most impossible for your enemies to acknowledge that you knew very well about everything and anything. Your enemies see only what they themselves are capable of, and while they rage like pigs being led to the slaughter, you endured it all like a lion-headed serpent patiently gathering its venom and cleansing it. The details, as you know, are unimportant. It would be tedious to remember all the events, because your enemies will receive due punishment, dead or alive, for all misdeeds here and in the hereafter. Understand that it is in the interest of the rich and powerful to remain so, and in the interest of the poor to accumulate more wealth. But in these times everything is governed by the pursuit of this or that, neither the elite nor the poor are ignorant, they all covet all sorts of things, their stomachs are never filled until they are full — and never arrive. This world, of course, has been turned into a brothel of the hunt, where the whoremongers are the ones who hold the bait, the prostitutes are the ones who provide it, while the clientele, rich or poor, are the ones who indulge in the consumption of the contract. Therefore, it is only natural that when you arrived outside the brothel, as if you were coming out of the temple of Hecate and were outside their leitmotifs, the prostitutes first considered you as something to be bought and sold, used, abused and abused by. After that, they projected all their filth onto you to see if you would follow their capricious, hysterical ways, and when they refused, they decided to bite away, like vermin, all your foundations so that you would collapse. So it is easier for the pigs to see when they have no thorns in their eyes, and you were certainly a thorn, because you pricked them out one by one. Socratic irony — you were to do, say, decide as you did, and likewise the reaction was natural, what else did you expect? He who is superior in inferior times of the mob and the mob rule of the parasites, shines among the stars and in the heaven of the gods, and in these days at first seems like a lazy reminder of his or her superiority over the others, and after they are ruined, deprived of their strong constitution and their noble, righteous nature, he still annoys, irritates these who are a mere swarm of locusts, because he, she, cannot be even in their downfall. Thus, a hero becomes a golden wretch who stands above the masses of opponents — listen, judge those who condemned you, execute those who dared to move against you. Are you allowed to influence the opinions, the beliefs, the self-esteem of others, especially when they are not obliged to listen or to see the error on their side? It is natural for these things to come to the table, and you are not responsible for others" perceptions, their beliefs, their ignorance, their delusion. So, if you follow this thread — you are responsible only for yourself, if others cannot raise and realize this fact for themselves — that they are immature enough not to seek knowledge when it is offered, wisdom — when it can be learned, and are decomposed enough not to seek virtue or high noble things and blame others for it, is it not a matter that they ignore and leave to their lot? Therefore, go your way, Fuomo, leave them behind, and if they must, they will bark at you, if they must, they will make your life miserable, if they can, they will harm you. But pay attention, follow the high paths, they will make you stronger, do not waste your strength arguing with parasites about trivial things — that is their own strength, arguing about such trivial things that any person worthy of a name would find it foolish at best, not even worthy of a little amusement, but a pompous omission.

On men acentric

Fuomo: As a follower of Julian the Theurgist, I must say, "Galaxies and stars were not created for the sake of men." So why are people so enamored of themselves that they call themselves "the image of a deity" or even go so far as to invert the above saying? I understand that the Divine is objective, but our reason is also flawed, and if we image the Divine, it is only through the humble approximation of our own inability to achieve such ends, and that is why I say, "Man, by means that point back to him as an intellectual animal, tries to understand the Divine end that corresponds to his methods, his apparatus, and the possibility of a potential realization of what he can know, to the exclusion of what his form forbids." Even raptures, ecstasies, and mystical direct contacts with the Divine are thus only the tip of the iceberg that the recipient recognizes by enveloping him in all the forms of belief systems that the socio-historical Logos allows and that his cognitive-emotional and biological environment makes possible through a direct connection, namely his soul or pneuma, which is shared in a hidden and unknowable form with the totality of this world as an indivisible unity. So my question to you Peripsol is whether my reasoning is correct?

Peripsol: Man has, as a biologist-philosopher put it, evolutionary defects. He is a "sick animal" with divine possibilities, as taught by various schools of psychagogic philosophies. If we take as an example your spine, you are almost stopped at the evolutionary stage of Homo erectus, with a higher density of encephalization that allows you to symbolize, create tools and conquer the land. From the perspective of ideal beings, humans have many ailments related to their spine, which is not fully adapted to the upright posture, but evolved from the mitochondrial "Eve" or the last common mtDNA strand of Homo sapiens sapiens, which has been traced back to 120 millennia before your time, while other strands spanning some 400 millennia have simply died out. Consider that your civilizational skills are barely 8 millennia old, and your technological progress is in majority no more than a hundred years old, and technological progress outstripped your natural ability to adapt to its onslaught in a healthy way. Therefore, man – a mortal animal – yes, but a potential god – equally true. Those who control the masses are political magicians, for they influence phenomena; those who control themselves are magicians, for they influence the common pneumatic element which is the all-pervading force of the universe. Do you think of yourself as a coronation of the animal world? Do you consider the solar system as the only one, or do you recognize it as a part of a galactic wing among infinite other galaxies, the most important one? Listen to me: Just as the invisible worlds behind the veil are superior to those of mortals in the hidden realms of the earth, the planets and your home star, so are the archons of the solar system, namely the planetary pneumatic natures and their individualized faces, subdivided into further powers and forces, and they are both subordinate and superior powers. For if they are archons of the solar system, they are also teletarchs of the transcendent worlds; if they are archons of other exo-planetary systems and stars, they are also superordinate, uniting them all. You recognized me as Peripsol or the one who travels around the sun, as an angeli bonum daimonios of the illuminating light of the star, but I duly answer you that I am neither finite nor infinite and that there are those who know more and those who know less. But as your holy guardian angel I transmit to you by means of silent inspiration and idea what others also transmit in the circulation of ideas, impressions and forces in the land of men and forces of the Divine. In my care I am not able to convey all that I could convey, nor would you be able to understand even an inch of what is not meant for you to understand. So please understand the affirmation of your life and the affirmation of understanding with intellectual and ethical humility to marvel and subject the world to that philosophical awe that accompanies children when they bravely encounter the unknown. You will know nothing, not in this life, but you will know all that is necessary, insofar as your life requires, demands, and permits. And one more thing: do not look down on the enterprises of others, they have their own platonic caves from which they emerge, and their own simulations of the world, i.e. their views which they project onto the universe and the Godhead. The tunnel of reality in your words that you have built is a self-contained, consistent system, but you would be horrified if it were to collapse.

Fuomo: I am well aware of the last sentence, because I only invoked this system to ward off chaos. And there is no chaos in it, only anomalies so profoundly alien to the human race that I have somehow used it as a lifeboat on the ocean and the surface of the weirdness that makes up this world.

Peripsol: What is chaos to you, Fuomo, is the flourishing soul of our life, it is natural and orderly, that should be enough to say, but there are laws and orders that would shatter your world into nothingness, and that is not the purpose. In my eyes you would find a hecatombe of terror and awe that would drive your mortal heart and mind to madness, but I am good-natured and only show you the magnificent face that you can most readily accept while preserving your sanity. You too have a morbid, terrible face, when you are angry and give way to unnecessary passions, the daimons of the chthonic hells find that you are similar to some of them and thus possess their nature and resemble them, and you may be full of splendor and glory like the heroes of past times, which brings you closer to those, who have been heroized, For why should a human mind and soul be torn by the chaos of the vast expanses of space, when the Great Priests of old can establish subtle orders to secure the inner and outer temples of the planets and the outer arrangement of the zones? Perhaps best suited for the task of traveling through the stars were the shamans, for they were perfectly connected with this and other worlds – they had no fear, they had an animal soul that took for granted what is full of horror for modern, civilized man. Their civilization sufficiently rationalized a deadly order. Take note that you had to go through a great madness to free yourselves from the shackles of modernity and then slowly put yourselves together to comprehend the vastness that is beyond the reach of most of your kin and your kind. I am called, so I retire, goodbye Fuomo

Fuomo: Farewell Peripsol.

On Death

Fuomo: Dear Peripsol, since I have ventured into the land of the dead with my second sight and experience, I also have first-class contacts, i.e. Angels of Death who have been kind to me, Azrail, the noble Soul Harvester, and Azazil, the ancient one who once wanted to tear my head off my spine because of my gross misdemeanor and anger. I have encountered the former twice, and the latter once, so much at least for the recognized encounters. Now, I know that the questions about death must be answered by the pale old horse himself, so could you recommend me?

Peripsol: Thanatazil will be a servant to guide you through your findings and musings, but remember that she is not even a familiar, but a link between your knowledge and the deeper convolutions of the philosophy of death. I will leave you and her at your request.

Fuomo: I am aware that after our demise, according to the Egyptian model of souls and the enlightening Tibetan view, human souls roam with their senses in the physical part of the aethyr realms for a few days and then, according to their abilities, fall from this radiation of the afterlife into the slumber of darkness, after which they are reborn in many worlds according to their inclinations. Nevertheless, I admit that I do not know many forms of postmortem shapes, forms and modalities. I see both small sleeping dead among graves in cemeteries, so when I came across the mausoleum of a child, I saw the little girl sleeping over her grave, in semi-transparent form, when I disturbed the soul by my gaze, and she was awakened from her sleep for a while when she began to move. Some dead people animated the stone angels above their graves as they gave me silent glances and turned their aethyr heads as if they were superimposed on the stone angel heads. Also, some dead people in the cemeteries call the sensitives to them to solve their riddles that were unsolved while they were alive. I have served some dead at night with melicraton, prayers and eulogies, mentioning the local dead in the district where I live the least. It is well known to me that some dead can take possession of the living and their bodies and spirits, others are content to fall asleep in their graves, some use special dolls if they were conscious while alive as their graves in the grave, other shadows use their cadavers to fly through the night spheres, especially vampyric ones. Still other shadows stand in one place and populate both houses of the living and abandoned houses as if they were fully aware of the living side of things. Shall I follow the Dionysian principle that the "dead know more about the living than the living themselves?" That they are no longer bound by any restrictions or morals, but follow the ethos they have developed in life, and nothing more. And so, in ancient times, children were the most feared, because as innocent as they were, they could also be very cruel to the living and play "innocent" tricks on them. That the prematurely deceased are cast out of their bodies as fate and return as vengeful or grieving dead, able to infect the living with their vengeance, pain, and emotions and passions that still thrive in their black souls? I have looked into the Thanatos green with my eyes closed and it seems that they dissolve into advanced forms of geometry, sound, light, etc., like most aethyr beings. What happens to their other souls then? Does the "ka" fly enwinged, or the small spheres of light, their souls themselves travel in groups of kin through the atmosphere, or taken under wings of angels, they jet together through earthly Hades, while the lunar island of the blessed and other planetary spheres are for the dew of alchemy and that of the few?

Thanatazil: So I answer you, my dear, my black wings and green mists are comparable to the storms of the yellowish Saturn. But I do not bring you a Saturn destrudo, but the answers you asked for. I will not go into further detail, but the shadows you mention are not just shells, as some think, but intelligent, gesticulating beings. Otherwise, the shadow witches you mention, powerful in their gestures, would have no existence except their own inclinations in life, as you have often experienced, just like some nigromancers who consider the beings of the black chthonic earth, the daimons, as violent, as mixed, as sinister. All mortals encounter death sooner or later, but even with your knowledge, you are as unprepared for this transition as a sparrow is for swimming in the sea. After death there is a period of adjustment, some lead the young dead to their destination, those who are left alone are at first terrified and then learn to adapt to the realms of Aethyr and death. Death is the sister of the dream, and if you are willing to dream in different ways, so is your death. As we know, despite your second eye, you rarely have dreams. So imagine that when you fall into tamas, you have only your inner light of pneuma to guide you. Throw away all illusions about death, that is my advice — there are many apparitions, often too strong, that overwhelm mortals' ideas about them and force them into their assigned realms and worlds. Make friends with the guides, the psychopomps, and you will be safe, because they will build bridges for you and issue iron letters for the transition, as well as hell money that you have earned in life to free yourself from the shackles of the lower realms that welcome more and more beings and slaves in their worlds. The money of hell you have earned with your pain and suffering, the advice of heaven you have earned through your wisdom with which you have overcome the former and forged yourself into a wise man. Let me now elaborate on what you have recently read, namely "De Deo Socratis" by Apuleius in relation to death and the dead. Every person has a daimon, which he shapes according to his free will and deeds, depending on circumstances and his disposition, which is the result of previous agreements. The daimon is an effective tool of the spirit in the underworlds after death. The dead who remain and attend to the business of the living, especially that of their families, are called either "lemurs," which can be called either malevolent spirits or benevolent spirits, lar familiaris. This means that they have not abandoned their descendants, but even care for them and make fate smile on them or strike them when they dishonor them. The wandering dead who cause mischief are called “larvae.” They may take possession of others or seek something they have lost, moving through the shadows from place to place, inquiring about mortals and gathering information, some have lost love, some have suffered, some have been humiliated. All the dead were collectively called “Manes”, “Di Manes” were the good dead who were nobly inclined to the living. As a medium, you know that a possessed seer can give prophecies in certain cases if he or she gives up his or her own will and lets the dead speak. When it is clear, it means that the sensitive is a prepared vessel for manifestation, when it is veiled, several spirits are fighting for the mind of the prophet or oracle, but “not every wood is made for quicksilver essences”, therefore only people of wide education, sensitive, open and practiced in trance can be good vehicles for the dead and multiple spirits to translate and interpret their worlds into those of the living. Among the dead, as among the living and the spirits, there are different classes and hierarchies, as they can be summarized in different ways, but this is not the time to enumerate the beasts, and you are not a paranormal investigator or ghost hunter that the dead taunt in their ventures, as they go into the field chasing their own excitement and whim, trying to sell their audience something they know nothing about? Remember the judgment of the dead and how justice is often dispensed not by the courts of the living or the gods, but by the judges of the dead after the living evildoer has died? Beware, then, and guide yourselves rightly. With this so much is said, you should keep silent about the rest. Farewell, Fuomo, call me no more, the secrets of death are for the dead, and you have tarried long enough in these lands, initiated years ago by the priests of Seth and Anubis, do you regret it?

Fuomo: I would never do that, I submit to my fate!

Thanatazil: Well, go on then, I wish you not to perish, little vampire, you may even have earned some wings.

Fuomo: Farewell!

Character sows fates

Fuomo: I have read that the spirit of heroism is shaped by tragedy, that it grows to maturity through hard inner struggles, is threatened in confrontation, makes judgments and decisions that shape wisdom and prudence. You know from my destinies why I have not developed into a greater man, and even if only for a short time, my nature has turned to great evil and fallen prey to constant unhappiness.

Peripsol: Ah, it's because you lacked direction, you threw the whole picture into imbalance, into cacophony, you simply lacked a teacher! But the time you fought is a testimony to the resilience of your geniuses, which is greatly revered by us.

Fuomo: True, good Peripsol, but how could I find someone who could teach? I have not found a worthy teacher on Earth, I even had to turn to Heaven to find a hearing with the masters and mistresses of the centuries.

Peripsol: A mastery gained with little means is better than a developed education, the character sows destinies, young angry dragon, yours was a fickle one, but did not you enter the council, did not they watch you fish out all the nobility that shines in the world, even if only for a moment that must be preserved, because that is a jewel that is in the crown of your life and soul.

Fuomo: Nevertheless, the idea of imperfection, obscenity, vulgar filth, many lemurs and erynii ride my spirit, to the detriment of my growth, remains, as if a misshapen tree were growing in a barren land.

Peripsol: But that tree also bore fruit, did it not?

Fuomo: Will, if one may say so, I do not know whether to place myself under my life, for it is more and more shameful, in view of the staffs and realms of the invisible worlds which I gathered at the beginning, only to disperse them with terrible speeches which, in time, have been taken over by malignant others.

Peripsol: The hardest bark you have, the gods will build a house of you, and the fruit may be sweeter than plums from the tree of life, false words heard at a small distance are cut short of all decency, imagine how cruel words, shouted at a distance – what chaos and disgust they cause among many, but now, now you know all this, your mind is strong, but like a sieve, do not make it a wooden bucket filled with dirt, it is upright, but it is easily turned left and right. You have developed a multitude in your potency through acquaintance with the many, but this multitude controls you, what could free you from this curse?

Fuomo: Well, this is the formation and the perspective and a faithful cord between my spirit and the immortal star, but when mercurial turns into chthonic whispering and shouting, how can I remain moderate when the malleability is already given, if I stiffen it now, it will join saturnally for its worst, not for its best.

Peripsol: You have trained well and in many ways, but all your tools fail if you do not remember to let go of yourself and bring this mind into order and proportion from without! Certainly, the malignant other will intrigue, for the potential is there to manifest in reality, and the similarities of natures and destinies, their differences create movements that war, connect them above and put the arrow back in the bow stretched far enough to shoot this spirit up into the heavenly spheres! Do not dwell on the life of your works, because you know that it is a constant manifestation in action, that of the deed, the soul, the spirit, the emotion, the feeling, the rest, the movement, the ceremony of all the avant-garde of your art and your being!

Fuomo: Gratefully I go, master Peripsol, do not leave me, if you lead me from above and travel around the circumference of the sun!

Addendum

A long time ago, in a closed ward of a psychiatric institution, I lingered towards the small library in the "common room". The book that I found was Naguib Mahfouz's, an Egyptian nobel prize winner from 1988. It stunned me: "Here I am not in front of this man's book, I'm in front of a whole library greater than the Library of Congress, that were long forgotten, that no one will ever remember, save for a short biographical note, an encyclopedic entry, or a dry note in literature history bothering only specialists that deal with it. Here, I stand in front of the mind, soul, heart of a man that bled, sweated and toiled in his life, that had a mother, that had a history, that left an imprint greater than a remark on his grave and that is no longer among us". I recalled Thoman Mann's words: "Deep is the well of the past", who ever dares to enter its portals? The time of great literature is certainly over, people have other, less refined entertainments, smaller attention span, erudition is not common. I write books intentfully, difficult books, that I hope only a few can truly understand. My purpose is to avoid the public that wants entertainment, I abhor such audience and want nothing to do with them. I'm a writer that is chaotic, I offend my own readers and do nothing to please them. The books

I leave behind portray the utmost of my ethos, but they never convey the standard of my wretchedness nor the banners of my malicious hate that once watched the ruin of the fiercest of my loves. Books, books, perhaps badly written, perhaps too complex for an ordinary reader, yet I would be considered at best mediocre, at worst an imbecile writer among the vast mountains of literature. There are books in abandoned houses, in old libraries, in the garbage bins, the multitudes of copies of the souls of men. I imagine their apparitions, their shrouds haunting the alleys and forgotten streets as their fading memories stop for a while, and read the rain-washed ink from their long-forgotten phrases. Maybe they stop for a while to smile at a homeless man that dug their literature from the garbage bin, something from the 1950s perhaps, thrown away after someone's grandmother or grandfather passed away. The filth-smeared person who lost everything is a voracious reader, to him the book is the last gateway to paradise. There are writers whose works are never read, the shrouds gather and open the copies and read in whispers what they liked, somehow what is untouched, unprofaned, yet beautiful in its own way, is claimed by the dead, like all abandoned artifacts. The audience of "dance macabre", of spirits, of the Divine is assuring profound readership. That should be a consolation to any downthrodden author. Yet, that is not the point, before you believe I nag about my own books! Never ever! I had a rewarding affair, and writing is mere offspring of duties and passionate needs, I let it be, when it gave fruit! The book, you, author, must be a sacrifice! It needs to over-arch you, it needs to be superior to you! How to produce something of excellence surpassing us, if we are only – us?! Is it the inspiration of incorporeal splendid muses, is it the deeply lived life that from an ever-lasting spring, that philosophical stone of alchemists brings about roses that refuse to be bought and sold. Perhaps a bit of both, and a touch of our own nature, our daimon of this severe mind of ours, of its loose insanities, of our reasons, instincts, gigantomachies, Tartaru howlings of gaping abysmal monolithic winds and Eleusinian Fields where all sorrow and woe disappers. Do you want to earn money from your petty writings? You are like a grand painter that prostitutes his art for portraits and soon forgets how to create magnanimous art! Beautiful books need beautiful minds, and a high-minded audience to perceive that gnosis arretos. Lo! Silence. Let the world follow its fashions, let us preserve the Divine musely, noble duties. If you ever find an old book by an unknown author, an abandoned one, give it a home, even if only one. It is like a Roman Lararium of Di Manes, read something about that person, and – I will betray a most guarded secret – every book written by a true author is a door to his soul, if authentically they are skilled artisans – 'tis, that may be immediately recognized. False art is made by repetition, automatism, it is never honest, it conjures phantasms from other stories and shallow fool's gold, impressiv, but easily detected as fraudulent. Books are never written, they write themselves, "master the subject and words will follow", as Cato the Elder remarked, master life, beauty, depth, gather experience and the pen, the typewriter will follow.

The End

Cold, winter fatigue, heaviness ladden exhaustion. Ponderous, noble thoughts Caught terror and shadow in the air Even they were sympathetic Bowed to my prominence People invisible to my mind's eye I was a dead soul among the dead My living flesh and eye that caught a frozen warm tear With weariness I stared long at your welcoming embrace As I climbed the stairs, I stopped at the window at night To gaze at the stars The shadows of the dead in this house touched me, As if I were their sacred artifact My eye lit a flash of an angel I climbed those stairs Like a heavily armored knight who has left his catacombs With bones intact and rusty cages of iron and Damascus steel Noble, withdrawn, To see an empty space, The phantoms we left behind, Are aware of your departure From this world and mine, From my old pains and traded memories, Replaced by bitterness and anger Of an old, bitchy man. Where is your star, O shining splendor, I wish I would join it one day Deaf as I am, passionless, dull, The rose of time is gone, The petals have been taken from old Saturn's play. Stripped of skin and muscle I stand These fleshy things, as if my soul

Only then the ideas unhindered, Flew gracefully through my heart A mind barely sutured Those who lost the pearl know, Those who never found it, how could they? Say to one unborn, "Time passed, you'll never know" The answer is as faint as a snippet of memory, testifying that what happened a hundred years ago, written in the words of an epitaph, is as meaningless to the passerby as the life that rose and vanished like a ghost.

Born in Warsaw, Poland, in 1986, I have travelled to 39 countries on four different continents, dealt with people of different origins, status and wealth.

Do ut Des. The work was a produce of working in alchemical Saturnine paths, instead of the steadier Mercurial work. The effect was codified in a semi-coherent system, a structural theory than a practical guide or grimoire. Ethos, discipline, strong mind, abilities should come before any engagement. Occultosophia is a collection of chapters and dialogues that are a generalized theory of magick.

To shadow-witch, an aged wretch I speak:
O darling, midst death's vine entwined,
Stripped bare, devoid of flesh's guise,
Why art thou woeful, honeycomb?
Outward beauty fades away,
Transient is carnal knowledge,
Thy life decayed thy very soul,
In ancient game, an ol" charade,
Wear a mask, young one, I advise,
Assume many forms amidst the shades,
Ensnaring mortal hearts with skill,
Yet, I see through thy veil thin,
As memories fade, thou must strive,
Preserve thyself in sorrow's realm,
Descend to monstrous realms untold,
Beyond the human race's sphere,
Thy birthright, mine eyes can behold,
„Midst masquerades and false façades,
I'll console thee, dear little witch,
My own soul destroyed by torment,
Though outwardly a wretched shade,
A secret harboring countless stars,
Peer into my garb, as dark as night,
While nature's graveyard gazes on,
The grotesque forms glaring fiercely,
Look through my ram's skull's empty space,
Azoth's black stars sing a solemn hymn,

Through Tartarus's winds that howl. The aged devil, speaking to himself:
When I still dwelled in living form,
They pondered my darkness, great sin,
Not knowing occult machine's cruelty,
Karma's bite, let it remain hushed,
In Arachne's web, the more thou strive,
The more misfortunes ensnare thee,
Better to be unborn, untethered!
The dead welcomed me to their homes,
Ganzir, my name, a spirit's conduit,
As my body traversed black gold's realm,
Amidst cosmic voids, suspended,
I roamed the fallen planet's gloom,
Eden's bliss forever unseen,
To all, business appeared normal,
Yet in demonic realms, a dense shade,
Resembling a torn figure in black,
As gargoyles and dark angels soar,
I catch glimpses of a fallen world. „Tis amusing, as I penned these lines,
Years ago, when I dwelled among life,
A good father inspiring his son,
From beyond space, beyond time's grasp,
A shroud of darkness enshrouding flesh,
Tapping keys upon a laptop's face,
Amidst the library's bustling crowd,
Greenery and weather laden with gloom,
A man of Saturn, somber and true,

Merged with vast abyssal spaces,
The Gods wondered at that fate, Zuhal,
In Azoth's black fire, beyond bounds,
Nighter, shadow-shifter, bowing low,
Black brotherhoods taint thy mind,
So why dost thou strive to wield thy sword? What dost thou do in this demonic night,
Exchanging winks with terror's mothers,
Thou art no friend, but a grave's mate,
They mock and mimic thy lost life,
Tell me, friend, how didst thou survive,
Without becoming a nightmare thyself?
What brings thee to the library's lair,
Tapping keys, gazing at strangers" souls,
Why dost thou pretend thou art not stranded,
In a land bereft of life's embrace,
Living a virtuous existence? Perhaps „tis but a mere facade,
How human, this mundane discourse,
Transient solace in bird's sweet song,
A realm of green demise, cosmic void.

Methods in Magick

Methods in Magick I: Pythagorean Training

You ask for method, my friend? The method is in you, in hard work, a deeply lived life, and unabandoned visions. Paraphrasing master Goethe, you yourself are the learning.

Day and Hour of Jupiter

Like in sheet music for a symphony, every method in magick is a separate line of mentalese notion, that should be harmoniously arranged with others. It is not merely the utility of the act, but its aesthetics, simplicity, virtuosity, inner composition and beauty.

Not a single magickal symphony may be repeated, it is improvised a vista with each ceremony, ritual, act, performance. It is simultaneously composed, conducted, played and enacted. Similar to generating ingenious ideas with breakthroughs and moments of realization, ecstasy, silence and equipose, the process of magickal symphony is employing the whole of humaneness to the highest possible effort for reaching the greatest ground of metaphysics in the sphere of magician's performance. It is a performative-intellectual sport of highly-pitched senses and a trained apparatus of "ecce homo" that requires no flatterers. It should be as natural as a homage accepted by an emperor, that no regular man would stand, blushing and shying away suspicious of the situation and sensing some deceit.

Indeed, we receive both homage and inspiration from various worlds that others undreamt of, yet — all for the sake of duty, beauty and destiny, as it unfolds and plays out to its utter completeness. Attempt but once reveal your succesful working to the vast majority of humanity and you will be laughed away and mocked, the reasoned will sceptically discard you, the naive will listen with interest to no true effect, the fools will attempt to claim the same, the fraudulent with employ charlatanry to emulate for the sake of gain! Yet the hardest ordeal is to be alone with the alone, solitary in the world of men in a crowded invisible world that others relegate to phantasy. Be prepared either for a great company, complete alienation and misunderstanding, or a nuthouse, if your leg happens to slip and your mind will be thrown into a disastrous state!

Here, rallying all the finest things that we may conjure, evoke, invoke, focus, catalyze, conduct, contain and master, we stand for what we truly are, we show our honest, true mask to the world. Mark of genius is the capacity to feel greatly and deeply, to harness oceans beyond one's trifle single mortal life, and to envault the beyond, the orchestra of living majestic torrent of Platonic ideas into a single point of concentration that scrupulously notes down the observations than in a Socratic irony may not be conveyed otherwise than by a crooked, insufficient medium: be it in writing; performance; science; musical composition; theatre; acting; engineering, or any discipline that needs either passion, derangement, masterful self-control or great understanding, precision and technical acumen.

When you transpose a great work, a mere notation into the phenomenal human world, and elevate it back to the transcendent, the whole that encloses a man in perfection of the creative moment it stands monolithically above the uncouth, boorish ear, and only a figment of it may be heard by a trained, sophisticated ear, lastly only those who let the symphony lead them back into the artists magickal focus may catch the starry thread, that lifts an individual back to the genuine place from whence it stemmed.

Poor art may be immediately captured inasmuch as it leads to garbage. It requires no effort, or has very little to convey, for it is ultimately the creator that stands in front of his work. On this note, when the creator is poor in mind or understanding, even inspiration of all Gods, hellish glare, depths of Tartarus, and starry expanse of divinity will not be able to inspire him sufficiently, for him to remake it into anything of worth. A poor magician will never perform any thaumaturgy, at best he will be ensnared by his own delusions, at worst, captured and pocketed by a small cacodaimon that will create illusions in his head, merely to turn him into a plaything and watch how the poor idiot falls prey to his own bombastically inflated mind.

The prime responsibility of the artist is thus to develop his workshop, training, skill, coupled with experiential knowledge, intellectual humility and learning so that his mind is sensitive and receptive enough to the silence of inspiration. Whether that will make anyone into a genius?

That is a different issue. Great artisans and technical players are not necessarily marked by genius, and the genii is easily spoiled by pampering and lack of solid foundation in technical approaches that should be improved and embettered throughout one's life. What they give on Earth is a by-product of work, no matter how handsomely done, one should think that his genius gives fruition on the other side, posthumously, where the toil in perfection is continued. Fixed with worldly affairs, one quickly loses the point of furthering his act, his art, his accentuated existence and rests on laurels that were never received, verily.

Yet, yet, how to achieve this method? For I indulged in theory and remarks for much too long!

The first stage is the synergetic Pythagorean pitching of senses, which is a method similar to sense-consciousness training in the yogas. This is a highly extended and perfected method of visualization for images held in in mental field, audializations for sounds held in mental field, for tactilization for haptic sensations held in the mental field, olfactorization, for scents held in the mental field, gustatory sensations for taste held in the mental field.

Mere enumeration, but at first extending the separate senses and focus on each one of them propels into consciousness of these separate systems, they need to be mastered in a degree capable of providing enogh backbone for further training. They should be treated as separate entities at first to delineate where they begin and where they end. When mindful enough, we may proceed to synergy and training visual-olfactory, or gustatory-auditory descriptions of the world.

At all times, these should be repeated and trained despite further progress, we can deepen them and combine them at will, preserving a sound mind. There are dangers to developing strong sense-consciousness, especially when the psychic energy is clogged in one of the arteries of senses, or when a malignant entity abuses our training for the purpose of generating false illusory stimuli. Let us remember, that sense-consciousness training should be at all times tied tightly with focus and concentration training, mindfulness, or meditation. The sense-consciousness should go where it is commanded, not where the "jumping monkey of the mind" tells us to, especially that our focus and concentration in the early phases of our training may also be abused by external entities.

This is the law of enantiodromia, the pressure of dualities; Even the finest focus, concentration and intelligence may be cut short by a leverage at the root from an unfriedly entity, if it did not resolve itself in a transcendent third that operates in a different proportion and allows safe work. The more we are swung left and right, the easier to exploit us, but also the easier to ingrain habits of radicalism on both side of polarities, killing the middle. We don't want to become hardliners of two polarities, we should seek the middle ground at all times, if the middle is transcending the polarities, all the better, but that is a question of individuation and experiential and cognitive phenotypization of the person concenred.

When we mastered sense-consciousness we may progress to the illusory generation process, to visualize and subtly materialize objects, sounds et al. In the aethyric realm. We may visualize a triangle that tastes like an apple, smells of gasoline, and sings “My way” by Frank Sinatra. It is preferred to create things within one’s own aesthetics, and the old adage goes “you are what you eat”, and that is adequately self-explanatory, if you create ugly things, you will get an ugly mind and degenerate. That’s your own choice, as I don’t meddle into one’s preferences, but it has long-term consequences on the Karman and inclinations, disinhibiting oneself completely in chaos is only as good as you may re-integrate into something useful later, otherwise it’s a terrible mess.

Methods in Magick II: Magia Umbra

According to the Egyptian modes of functioning of the souls, one of them is called khaibit, shu or shut. It is the shadow soul that needs nourishment, and in the posthumous state various offerings were made to it. Since its nature is majority psycho-sexual, as Kenneth Grant postulates, it behaves in a manner that reflects the life and occult constellations of the individual. It is by no means the repressed psychic matter, as Jung proclaimed with reference to a concept which in psychology denotes the shadow self. These two concepts should in no way be confused. The situation with shadow souls is much more complex, for their behaviour varies from setting to interaction. They should not be understood in terms of moral dichotomies, but as imprints of fading life on dead souls. It would be good to compare the shadow realms with those filled with technical black magic, spells of various targets, coldness, tormenting memories, resigned equiposis. It is the black bile of Saturn that fills these realms, and happiness is not found among the shadows, comfort, compassion, consolation towards the living is a sign of the horror that awaits them if they are not ready to understand what the dead souls bring with them. Likewise, one can find anger, revenge, restlessness, perversion, repeated self-reproach and guilt, all wrapped up in the great question, „Why are we here?" A person with a religious background, who is faithful to his idea but may end up in the shadow worlds, is imbued with grief: „Why did not his God save him, why is he being punished?". The only case of retrieval from the shadow world that I have ever witnessed was the dissolution of a six-foot tall, tattered shadow with a broken neck that could easily be mistaken for a chthonic day demon floating in the air in all varieties of dispersed light. The dead soul simply disappeared in all colours of scattered light, looking like ribbons in the wind, and was scattered in the light of consciousness.

Here there are two paradigms in the occult arts: first, that dead souls are only shells and interaction with them brings mischief, as a form of goeteia and witchcraft. They have no ontological, spiritual status in the larger view. The second theory I tend to hold is that they have the ontological status of dead souls overcoming and capturing something greater, their essence. If we treat dead souls as mere shells, then we might as well consider the entire mind of a living person as a shell, a complex bundle of psychic images wired to the physiological body frame. The suffering of the mind in the shadows is greater, as it decays and falls apart over time, leaving only bits of memory and images of the distant past. And yet it still exists in the register of the dead. Fading memories are still memories, and the exhausted pain that became cold and resigned is nevertheless an exhausted pain, a noble instinct brings forth such reflections.

The tribes of the dead have their methods of survival and domination, they have their own magic and ultimately all living witches and wizards and rely on the same rules of Magia Umbra as the dead, and so the living use their own shadow souls for psychomagic acts or persuade the dead to help them.

The methods described below are merely descendants of those used in regular magic, extended to shadow worlds.

The creation of the most basic servitors should not be of concern to us, it is the delegation of the shadow substance that we summon in form and give orders to that is of the utmost importance. The faculty of imagination, when well trained and focused, follows our will and so we can project imaginary forms and ideas not only in our minds but also in space and time. An example of calling up imaginations is a photograph. When we look at a photograph, it evokes our memories and we can reconstruct one-sided circumstances and feelings from the photograph. We can try to extend the memory to the place, imagine the space, and recall the chronology of events. First, let us take any photo of a place and try to imagine that in that place we placed an alchemical symbol of fire, a golden triangle, on the photo. Technically, at the moment the photo was taken, we placed a photographic imprint in the past, in a small imaginary world created just for this purpose. Necromancy based on working with photos of deceased people will not change their past, they are already dead, but we can try to call the soul or shadow soul of this person through this photo. How does it work? Well, a photo is an electromagnetic imprint of a certain time frame, place and other hidden information that we can try to extract. We can be almost certain that if we look into a black and white photograph of a dead person and they are in shadow, a dead, pitch black soul will appear before us. In this demonstration, it is discouraged to engage in this technique because dead souls can become lodged in your field and have extremely harmful effects.

In the same way, we project, virtualize, charge and materialize servants whether we are walking down the street, performing a magical operation, a rite, a ceremony, and so on. Ultimately, we project our mind into a form with a specific operational intent and instructions for the servitor, it is a program that is purposeful. Similar to coding, creating an effective servant is an art. When it comes to the shadow sphere, it is either our own shadow soul that we delegate, or, if we want to translate and interpret mental energy into shadow forms, we must first tune into the frequencies of the shadow, otherwise we create servitors in registers to which we are attuned. The second part is programming the execution modules and supplying the servitor with an energy source. Truly efficient servitors maintain themselves and are reprogrammed for the purpose when recalled. Truly efficient servitors are encrypted and masked on the other side so that no agent in between can take over or change the instructions given to the servitor. Why do you need a servitor? To collect information provided in visual form, to collect energy (crude and rather foolish vampirism), to operate in the fields of others, to operate in other dimensions in a form compatible with the dimension, to protect itself from malicious entities, to attack preemptively and detect the intention of magical attacks from the other side, to repel such attacks before they happen, or to tear the attackers to pieces, to implant executive will in egregors, to change intentions, motives, feelings, minds, souls of others, including other entities, etc.

Once the servitor is finished, he is directly traceable to us, as he has cuts and polishes of the mental frame we were in at the time of his creation. He is a silly tabula rasa with some of our tendencies and strange behaviors that are part of the occult mechanics of transcribing a homunculus into an umbric servitor. What is man-made has its patterns and is known to be man-made. You can charge a servitor with hatred, love, emotions, feelings, instincts and intellectual patterns and release it to act on a particular person, collectively, or connect it to a particular idea or cyber-ego (e.g. Facebook) in the eighth sphere. It can be a virus that sells itself or a separate entity that is only responsible for a certain type of task. To learn how to successfully program a servitor, you must have a robust mind that is experienced and trained to perform such functions, it is not to be taught, but to be learned. It is a good idea to preprogram simple commands into the servitor, such as „return", „locate", „view". Ideally, the servitor is instantly retrievable, but it can be lost, disintegrate, be destroyed, lose its power source, be overtaken, become malformed, or in the worst case become a puppet, be zombified, and be redirected to attack you, the creator.

A servitor is not a magical child. A magical child is either the result of interspecies soul propagation or interbreeding with astral entities. Servitors are mental children: they can be semi-intelligent if you invest parts of your mind in them, or automatons that function like robots. With the idea that you want to observe your servitor, it is possible to connect with servitors through astral projection. If you have practiced remote viewing (visual imagination that approximates distant places to the true state as if you were seeing them with your own eyes in the same time frame), you can try to use servitors as extra eyes and see things from their perspective, calling up images both when they return and from afar. This is never a perfect representation and there can be a lot of noise in between, but what you see is what you get. In the same way, you can invest your mind in astral projection to connect to a servitor in another dimension and scan the environment with its interface or senses to translate it into sensory data that humans can understand. If you have ever owned your own servitor to fly through the violent thunderstorms of Black Earth, you should know what I mean. Well, the probability of being detected in other places is high. That's why it's a good idea to delegate an external masking being instead of yourself, and a servitor can be wrapped with illusions to further mask him.

As with your own soul, you can incarnate into animals, other humans, or aetheric entities and delegate your spirit, soul, or synthetic creations to sense, control, bind, etc. the target in question. The same is true for a servitor that will incarnate, possess a medium or a particular entity and takes possession of it. You must understand that there is a great difference between a daimon or intelligence taking possession of a mortal human being and a servitor that is a rather uncomplex process that may go through several threads, but is rather cumbersome and simple in its effect.

Methods in Magick III: Focus

Let me invite you to a great opera omnia. As you read this narrative, allow yourself to expand your perspective to the vastness of the wasteland of the universe, and then focus on individual small examples, for example, a rose unfurling petals in a garden. Please read manifested words as images, concepts, ideas in a magical language that you can invent for yourself, visualized symbols, images, signs, sigils, paintings, photographs. Use your imagination to conjure great landscapes of ideas that are not mere fantasy, but are meant to bridge the land of imaginations with that of platonic ideas. My task is to discipline and order your imagination along this path. I hope you are ready. Let us begin.

In an ideal state, volition moves from action, motive, desire to vision, and vision is realized by action, action produces effects that are solid, tangible or subtle, fleeting. There are three modes here: active volition, which emerges from the illusion of the self-constituting personhood, passive volition, which is a form of reverse mysticism, for after receiving an inspiration, one creates; and joint volition, in which two or more threads converge and create together.

Each event is a flash of energy in a co-dependent, co-emergent world of phenomena, a sequence of such flashes can be called threads, while a sequence of threads is a process of reality. The grammar of these flashes, threads, processes is bound by the objective environment and syntax of physical, chemical, biological, pneumatic, metaphysical and occult laws. Moreover, they have their time, these flashes can be unique, repetitive, sequential, interrupted, occasional, continuous, cyclic, temporary, conventionally immovable or changing.

They have their duration, their beginning, their emergence, their renewal, their maintenance, their decay, their fading, their cessation, termination. I think of them as fields in a topological space that are chaotic in the sense of classical mechanics, like the behavior of the Haley comet interacting with the gravitational pull of Jupiter and Saturn.

It is important to delineate the levels of disorder and organization (entropy). Complete integrability is an maxima of order characterized by a stable and dynamically predictable inclination of the individual sequences, it is a discrete quasiperiodic spectrum. It is characterized by a low perturbation and a stable frequency of unfolding, and it can form whole groups (families) of completely integrable systems.

Under one condition, if we introduce a pertubation, the integrability is destroyed. In Kolmogorov–Arnold–Moser integrability, the degree of disorder is non-zero, the sequences can survive a weak perturbation, while they can be easily deformed, yet they remain continuous and impermeable to other processes. If destroyed by perturbation, it can form another structure.

In complete chaos it can extend over the whole phase space, the events are continuous, but to find a typical sequence is complicated, it loses its physical meaning. We can still try to apply maps and models to describe the statistical properties of such an unstable inclination.

A typical perturbation can lead to both regular and chaotic motions. Renormalization time is a process in which a chaotic system bounces from one statistically describable state to another, and the process in between is significant but difficult to capture.

When assessing the patterns of energy flashes (events), scaling is equally important. When we speak of Ursa Major, we do not confuse a bear, an animal, with the constellation of stars. Not only are they not the same entities, either in name, abstraction, scaling, category, or semantics, but they have a completely different makeup, physically, biologically, etc. Such confusion is, counter-intuitively, a very common mistake when people understand, speak and perceive any cognitive entity that either overlaps, is deflated or inflated with given phenotypes of semantic-semiotic mappings.

In terms of scaling, we should address the discipline of optics and focus. The apperture of the lens can be compared to the ability of concentration, attention span, and determination in operations, while the lenses can be compared to the psychomagic filters and tools of the trade that allow energy to move in certain ways. Rays of light that are reflected, refracted or bent diffracted are synonymous with inspirations from the phenomenal world, the metaphysical world and the occult world. The proper lens system in the apperture is critical to the perception necessary to achieve astral effects. The Egyptians believed that Sia (perception) was of great importance to the success of any magical operation. In this sense, a magician is an artist of perception.

Training of perception is similar to training of focus. It is a method of altering consciousness through a series of gymnosophical, intellectual, spiritual, and performative actions that, in well-organized magicians, function like a control panel and can be combined into multi-threaded processing. A well- trained state should be attainable at will. Drugs usually have only a temporary effect on perception, and neither recreational nor ritual use is advised. A controlled perceptual shift in a sober state is a great tool to call upon, whether in meditation, street magic, or simultaneously with other actions such as talking, walking, or dancing. Each tool has specific conditions and dependencies under which it works.

A simple example is bilocation. One must release one's attachment to the body image and fixed incarnation and try to look at oneself from a different perspective, as if another person were looking at us. Since the astral double and shadow follows the inclination, when these subtle bodies are developed, it will place itself where the will wants it. The standard inhibition in magic is the discouraging fact that „nothing happens" or „we feel nothing". Every tool takes time and training, in this case we must not only use the tool and be skilled in it, but also create and train the tool itself. So the first commitment should be to find out what tools we need and what training we need to acquire them.

To conclude this brief theoretical sketch, I must admit that in a perfect scenario the person is stable, firmly anchored in conventional reality, and does not compensate with magic for the mistakes of his life and the shortcomings of his personality. The key words are: Stability, seriousness, ethos, knowing oneself, knowing where one wants to go, astuteness, intelligence, steadfastness, perseverance, critical thinking, the key practices are: Concentration, focus, a platinum class ego and a strong sense of identity from which one can detach at will, artistry, virtuosity, ingenious devices, mastery of one's mind and body, the physical and basic aspects are: health, care of the body and hygiene, care for one's income, work, a good relationship with other people and no abuse through addictions, destructive passions and the like. At the Oracle of Delphi there were three commandments: Know thyself, everything in moderation, nothing in excess, E (Eta, sun symbol for the god within, the divinity without)

I hope I have provided the intelligent reader with enough clues to experiment and use their own solid tools. After all, only fools are led by the hand and nose in this business, while trying to attain mastery is a long, solitary and deeply reflective, introspective, insightful process.

Methods in Magick IV: Synergetic Projection

Each purposeful magical thought, the voces magicae, the description by execution, leaves a subtle imprint in the environment, on the objects, the bodies, the genius loci and its space, the entities, the souls, and changes the subtle worlds in a minute way. The energy follows the focus, and the fixation and the gaze increase the focus. This concentration can be focused on a single point, distributed on several subjects, or encompass everything. The more it is distributed, the more it gradually diminishes, although the training of increasing concentration on a large sphere of „ten thousand things" should gradually improve concentration on a single point, as should samadhi when all phenomena and „ten thousand things" are dropped on the spot. To explain this phenomenon, one would have to resort to optics and channel-modulated ray theory, psionics and aetheric hologram projection, i.e. the mind projects aetheric vibrations on the wave-function and gives form and synergetic qualities to the hologram, it is similar to the ancient auto-phaneia, or the self-revealing of Gods in which a manifest essence of their totality becomes visible to the Isiac, Eleusiac mystes and seer. On the other hand, a fixed gaze with a dead stare (as in witchcraft) is inferior to the fixed gaze of a potent mind that has its eyes everywhere.

The trained imagination can produce any miracle, illusion, or subtle-material object of a magician that is superimposed anywhere in the world. We can leave notes on objects, people, places, on skin, on spiritual layers, on „thin air" (I personally like to leave neon-like astral notes in the air), on souls, entities and invisible planes. They are our personal signatures that, along with the art of mnemonics, can recall information in specific detail, leave an „I was here" mark, leave signs for others, or provide information about a specific thing. We can bless, consecrate or curse and desecrate a specific area, place, person, object, etc. I will devote a separate chapter to the making and programming of artifacts, talismans, rings, amulets, scrying stones, black mirrors, etc. With personal effort and with the help of higher deities, middle intelligences and benevolent and malevolent beings.

Any physical object can be charged with corrupted energy, be it the clothes we wear and the median of our emotional and intellectual states associated with our „second skin", be it our body and the resulting posthumous corpse that can have properties that affect us, be it a magical armor and the body of the gods as the carrier of our spirit, be it a tattoo programmed and ritualized with a magical intention on a living person. They work with analogia entiis and not with similia similibus or sympathetic magic.

Sympathetic magic is rather crude and ineffective. To find an analogy and similarity of being, an inner law must be grasped by both, and moreover, proportions and ratios must be synchronized for a given operation and moment. It is not enough to create a voodoo doll of an enemy, it must be properly constructed on the psychomagic level: to bind the right target; to hit the target; to hit the right target where it pleases us, etc. Otherwise, we either resort to ineffective actions, harm ourselves, or inflict harm on a random person. Either way, our intent can often be carried out by a malevolent entity or disarmed by a protective entity, which I will call a co-traveler to our and other magical actions.

We can construct sigils from scratch (sigils), perform various ciphering and masking operations on a sigil, or use visual permutations, glitching, and noise to apply computational „demonology," e.g., take a chaotic oscillator circuit drawing and convert the graphic drawing into sound, then convert the sound into numerical values and bifurcate further. The question of whether it loses its original value and transforms into something else lies in the art of keying, i.e. finding the right patterns in the aetheric realms affected by the translation of mechanical and digital signals from electronic devices into astral causal chains. It is very similar to the art of naturalistic magic, which I prefer as a biomant, but on additional „tech drugs". For naturalistic magic is more effective in high magic and anything pneumatic, while computer magic is more effective in low magic and cyber magic, such as succubae that harvest sexual energy of others and are connected to pornographic exciters, or cause disruptions in information systems. The latter is more effective in the world of manipulating low desires, dreams and hunger, so the world at large of today, the former arts, high magic is a voice of dissent and liberation of anarchs from modern chaos. In fact, in this way, the gods favor the Anarchs, who would be priest-mages in the past, over the priest-theologians of the present, who would be a slime pit of foul gibberish in the old days.

The noise in the etheric realm is a definite obstacle to getting a meaningful picture and performing the necessary operations. There are many operators and just as many astral background noises generated by the living and the subtle. The art of capturing a pattern and amplifying it to create an effect is an art in itself. As an officer from CIA said in the 1950s when hiring black magicians for dark operations, „Magic sometimes works, radionics always works." Therefore, instead of relying on random hits, some agencies have resorted to technical support, developing computerized psionic cybernetics, psychotronics, regular network-based psychological warfare and social engineering, etc. As for the unhired non-whores, un-prostituted lone wolves, „pirates, invaders, and other insubordinate antichrists," less sophisticated techniques must be developed to survive and pursue their own goals.

Methods in Magick V: Calling and Receiving

From the Chaldean oracles of Julian the Theurgist comes the famous phrase: „Call and you shall receive." What does this verse mean? Is it about getting what we want on a whim? Or is it about calling to perfect ourselves, to elevate ourselves to divinity after receiving the right measure, the right portion of a daimonic essence that will transform us? Is it to lag behind and pray for whimsical things with empty words, or is it to burn out passion in great works and become as impassionate and objective as the deities in great wisdom and arete?

Every call begins with a sending, etymologically this word is related to sowing in the field, in fact a call is a saturnine sowing, because what we want to collect with our scythe is what we sow, a good agricultural professional knows how to take care of his crops, not to spoil or tire the earth, not to abuse the earth, how to take care of the seeds, how to watch the grain grow, how to protect it from spoiling and how to harvest it at the right time, how to preserve the crops, what to share, what to eat, what to sell and how to distribute it so that it lasts for the next years.

Similarly, we do not appeal to the air or to anyone who will listen, but use human logoi to direct the signal to a specific request. The best petitions are selfless, genuine, natural, coming from the depths of the spirit, soul, mind and heart in unison, made in great reverence, poetic rapture, passionate despair, lamentation, hatred and sorrow. The void ones are dull, empty, mere words, superficial.

The strength of human logoi depends on the intensity of the beholder, but their wisdom belongs to moderation and balance. No good gods will refuse a curse or a blessing for a man shattered by fate and plunged from nobility into a great abyss of broken existence, where the soul dances sadly from the ocean of the abyss to the highest of the stars.

The ethereal world may have eyes and ears, whispers, cries and silent thoughts are perceived. Woe to the child of the abyss who returns with a voice thundering through the ethereal worlds, mad or unwise, everything dirty, great, vicious and virtuous is heard.

It is written in the Book of Changes that the words of a wise man still meet with approval 10,000 miles away, while those of a vicious man break off at the end of his tongue. The earth is full of gossip, most of it unwise.

If you want to attract the great ones, you must develop your greatness, otherwise the small ones will listen to you. A monument of life testifies to deep experience, from it words follow the song of the theme, the song follows the beauty, the poetry follows the rapture, herein lies the secret of greatness, that it rises above ordinary people and the wise man follows a mountain which he incorporates little by little. The a priori conditions follow the a posteriori, not vice versa.

The call may be a silent thought addressed to a select audience, or it may be sent to anyone who can receive it over the „radio nowhere." It can be a cosmic cry that crawls out of the throat in great pain, a poetic wisdom, a gnosis arretos painted with perfect emptiness.

It can be a summons, evocation, banishment, exorcism, an incantation. There are two modalities here: either you create with your voice, you co-create, you co-inspire, you spread ideas and inspirations that enter the noosphere and are distributed in the aethyrs, that is active ceremonial magic „Here are the dragons".

The other action is supplication, typical of prayers, but prayer is something for the unskilled. A magician should know what he wants to receive, know the scope of the reception and have wisdom and discernment to know what he needs. The Hermetic planetary path begins with working with the Earth spirits, then with the Sun spirits, then with the Moon spirits, the Mercury spirits, the Venus spirits, the Mars spirits, the Jupiter spirits and the Saturnian-Uranian intelligencers in the Egyptian-Hellenic and Chaldean framework.

Knowledge of astrology and the nature of the archons and intelligencers of these planets is of great value, because in Gnostic Hellenism the archons (rulers, the totality of the nature of a particular planet, the autophaneic essence of a planetary nature) were simply a way of testing whether you could absorb the qualities of the planet without being psychomagically torn to pieces. It is not a mere fairy tale, for the intelligencers should be objectified as independent spirits, not as mere archetypes of which there are myriads and who willingly teach the willing and prepared.

If, for example, we want to develop martial prowess, sagacity, and strength of heart, work with Mars when it comes to exquisite beauty of soul adornment and loving ideas, with Venus when it comes to divine communication, the gift of writing, and speed in the transmission of ideas, with Mercury, if with truth, honesty, justice, lion-like pride — with the Sun, if with delightful sanctity, bliss, calm and easy moderation — with the Moon, if with royal, noble, cultured and civilized qualities — with Jupiter, if with imperial, wise, philosophical qualities — with Saturn. This is a flawed enumeration, but you will grasp it immediately when you begin your work. There is a danger that you will encounter the chthonic aspects of the planets, the key word here is enantiodromia, for they all have their own „hells" or spheres of torment for the little human souls, but there are more things that you can gain from the treasury of Helios, and the gods bestow gifts of inspiration, muses of ingenious breakthrough, even on the ignorant.

There are grimoires with seals that operate with traditions, but these are delicate, there were encyclopedically inclined magicians who called entities only not to bring down their seals, if they managed to win them over to the operation, there are many charlatans who try to emulate them. Therefore, from experience, it is better to make calls in a standard — and safe — operation when the planet is above the horizon, in exaltation, in daylight, possibly the heliacal rising of the planets in the morning is optimal. Planets have their greatest strength when they are seen, intelligencers are called with greater certainty when they are visible. Nocturnal work, melancholically inclined is of deeper value, as stars have their greater effects when one finds himself in the cosmic cavern.

If you have high intelligence, an open mind and critical judgment, ask for wise things and you will share in the gifts and watch them unfold, over days, weeks, months and years. If you feel discouraged, work on your shape and form, meet the gods halfway. At worst, nothing will happen, but you will gain excellence and artistry, at best you will be helped to stand out as a great person, even louts have been transformed in this way into great orators, skillful rhetors.

Do not hesitate, call often, strengthen the sacred bond, consolidate the ties with the intelligent, until — if fate wills it — they will raise your spirit to the stars. If you ask for insignificant or worldly things, be careful from which corner the answer comes, you can receive them, but only to promote the will of another, these things you can still receive if the fate is right, but not as a goal in itself, but as a by-product of the above operations. It is a joy to see a great man who has rich possessions, power and dominion, fame and nobility, not losing an inch of his being and reverence for men and the gods. It is a pathetic spectacle to watch wretches acquire with the same perishable things through inheritance, fraud, injustice and base methods. So, be forewarned, go!

Methods in Magick VI: Approaches

That the God is no less philosopher than he is prophet appeared to all to come out directly from the exposition which Ammonius gives us of each of his names. He is „Pythian" (The Inquirer) to those who are beginning to learn and to inquire; „Delian" (The Clear One) and „Phanaean" to those who are already getting something clear and a glimmering of the truth; „Ismenian" (The Knowing) to those who possess the knowledge; „Leschenorian" (God of Discourse) when they are in active enjoyment of dialectical and philosophic intercourse. „Now since," he continued, „Philosophy embraces inquiry, wonder, and doubt, it seems natural that most of the things relating to the God should have been hidden away in riddles, and should require some account of their purpose, and an explanation of the cause. For instance, in the case of the undying fire, why the only woods used here are pine for burning and laurel for fumigation; again, why two Fates are here installed, whereas their number is everywhere else taken as three; why no woman is allowed to approach the place of the oracles; questions about the tripod, > and the rest. These problems when suggested to persons not altogether wanting in reason and soul, lure them on, and challenge them to inquire, to listen, and to discuss. Look again at those inscriptions, KNOW THYSELF and NOTHING TOO MUCH; how many philosophic inquiries have they provoked! What a multitude of arguments has sprung up out of each, as from a seed! Not one of them I think is more fruitful in this way than the subject of our present inquiry."

— Plutarch, "E" at Delphi; II; C.W. King (London: George Bell and Sons, 1889)

> Each piece, or part, of the whole of nature is always merely an approximation to the complete truth, or the complete truth so far as we know it. In fact, everything we know is only some kind of approximation because we know that we do not know all the laws as yet.

— Robert Feynman, The Feynman lectures on Physics, Volume I.

Moving amidst anomalies, strange events, how not to breathe poetry into the world, this esthetic game. When others barely swim on the surface, the bold dive into the depths to shoot into the unknown space above infinite oceans. Courage, boldness! This world is for the intrepid, where others barely stepped, some of us crossed the deserts to find eerie oases when divinity meets this world, where chaos triumphs and our dust stands like an emperor over this world, until time does not erase us and a senile age of dementia will not triumph over genius — this invincible spirit!

Because of the complexity of the systems we can boldly assume that the results of magic are never certain, but only potential, they are not objective, but interrelated. In a given internally coherent system, these potentials can arise when they encounter others. Like a Venn diagram, they are intelligible, but to an extent bound by dynamic, often unpredictable laws — this picture is never static.

We have to be honest, we can not prove the effects of magic, we can not be bothered with effects to prove, and that would be foolish. Some attribute its wealth to industry, others to magical operations, but it is the rational, skeptical and reasonable that should be considered between force circumstances, personal efforts and possibilities. Magic, as a subtle art, can be evaluated either subjectively or intersubjectively. Most magical phenomena cannot be grasped by a linear mind, and the obvious, crude occurrences of insight rarely stabilize to be repeated, hence their non-reproducibility.

It is a delicate art that requires profundity and rigor. It resembles the world of watchmakers or artisans who make porcelain, the delicate art that can arch sublimity, subtlety and storms of black fire in this art. It is a dangerous art that mixes with the invisible worlds, often exposing our minds to combustible, dissociative, psychotic interactions, to quote Confucius, „Keep spirits and gods at a distance," but respect them first and foremost. It is an art that requires close exploration of the territory in which one is acting. It is a determined step of a blind man over an empty abyss to set his foot on an invisible bridge, and yet we walk as if on solid ground, knowing where we are going and how to avoid the obstacles. We can extract parts of the general laws of magical working, keeping in mind that they are dynamic laws, with many variables and laws that interact and can cancel, accumulate and complement each other.

A versatile magician approaches his activities apophatically, with reason, skepticism and yet positive affirmation, relying on the thyrsus when something works as it should. It is a person who has an infinite arsenal of „I can" but knows that he is operating within a system of limits of phenomena and physical and occult laws that prevent certain actions and limit delusions of grandeur, inflation, idiocy. Such a person knows that regardless of whether his actions produce results, he acts continuously — without stubbornly dwelling on false assumptions, but correcting them and constantly evolving. A magician experiments and gains experience until he skillfully trains operational techniques that prove effective in „winning" the other side to his vision.

The point of understanding is to discover what kind of actions lead to significant effects. The field of action for rituals, prana, ceremonies, meditations, musings, contemplations is the phantastikon of the noema. The effects are always limited by what has been judged superficial, meaningless or ineffective. Often people may wander through the deserts all their lives, often they may dwell in Platonic caves, this is one of the reasons why cognitions and magic are relegated to the phantasms of human imagination, at best to infantile phantasms, from where all approaches and efforts of education are abandoned not even halfway, but before they really begin.

Consciousness and perception are the field of operation of magic, phenomena and illusions are its substance, but they are only a means to achieve goals. The attainment of siddhis or helpful means for their own sake is meaningless unless they are a vehicle for the soul to attain greatness, surpass its own condition, overcome inadequacies, and unite with supernatural essences. It is not a consciousness reduced to psychological effects on one's mind, or a training in neurodivergence, but it interacts with one's modalities, tastes, possibilities and realities. It influences the soul, the mind and the hearts, inspiring ideas and working from behind to foster visions of wonder in people.

Magic is a wise art of perceiving the effects produced in the world of causality in such a way that we philtre out the true patterns of the workings of the magical process by excluding cognitive distortions, fallacies, deceptions, blinding illusions, charlatanry, self-deception, Excluding obscuration — this is a skill of critical thinking and discernment, both in the world and, most importantly, in our own selves, and the greatest deceivers are those who are in a fortress of illusions and delusions — like madmen.

What is a clear, precise, strategic and tactical insight into emergent co-dependent causality is also a commitment, a commitment to spinning one's own networks of causal patterns while preserving one's own perception, sense and reason, ideally detached from the sea of phenomena, passionate, striving for metaphysical objectivity, observing one's own mental processes, mastering perception and cognitive-emotional processes in great balance.

Methods in Magick VII: Scrying, Consecration, Artifact Creation

Have you ever dreamed of creating your own talisman, amulet, or other artifact that performs its function as desired? We know them mostly from games and movies, but it is pop culture that took inspiration from the real things and turned them into consumer fetishes, not the other way around. I would like to share with you some methods that I have used with relative success. I detest charlatans who sell such things to others, they have no value, or at best you have an uncontrollable entity or a messed up focus of the creator of such things. Procure your own best, either high quality jewelry (which does not have to be expensive as long as the materials are right), or make it yourself. Avoid used things unless you know something about the owner. A grandmother's ring or jewelry kept in the family is useful, but you are also working with the owner's energy. Personally, I prefer to order items and catharsise them properly before consecration.

The law is that of synthesis, i.e., correlation of the correct, compatible or complementary dimensional frequency or higher capable of redirecting the entity or energy. The same law applies to excorcisms, about which I will write a separate chapter later. Hence, the correlation of an external entity greater than or similar to the overwhelmed, trapped entity to command it. Another methord is to change the „riverbed" so that the focus directs the entity or energy into the given object. Nature likes to hide, but the notion that „nature hates contradictions" does not apply to the subtle world. Sometimes two opposite polarities can try to magnetize each other, that is, the nature that goes against your innate qualities and ethos can force your mind, emotions and soul to do the same. Especially, if it is envious and jealous, it must try to reflect in you. A contradictory nature oft cannot tolerate superiority, and superiority is defeated by making us similar to the antagonist and making us inferior on its own ground, according to its own rules. Similarly, followers of exclusive religions have to convert others. They abhor the idea that they could be wrong and want everyone to be the same to compensate for their own ineptness to be anything other than a blindfaithed person. Similarly, a homosexual turned tyrant would want everyone to be homosexual in their narcissism that contradicts nature. Laws to destroy excesses and superficialities should be based on the center, on reasonable grounds. Bigotry or extremism of any kind should not be tolerated, least of all you want it to spread and end up affecting you and those close to you. What breaks you absorbs you, you have to fight upright and stand your ground, otherwise you are not like a strong mortal, but depending on how many persons or entities will try to lure you into theirs, you may end up as a spineless, unstable, hysterical, psychotic, crazy idiot or a scripted extension of another's will. Know yourself! Perfect yourself in wise, responsible individuation!

Consecration was a process of integration into the divine realm by the will of the gods or men themselves. „Consecrated objects were believed to be either divine property or to be in some relationship with God, thus sharing in His supernatural substance and energy" (Thesaurus Cultus et Rituum Antiquorum). Consecration was a transfer of the object into the realm of the deities, for res sacra, dedication are something else, the act was similar to the offering of objects to the divine and the transfer from the profane (touched by men) to the sacred (belonging to the divine).

We can consecrate objects with our own soul by using the prana focus and programming them with intentions according to the syntax of creating servitors. We simply create a procession (from, to) desires, wishes, intentions, motives, a syntax of intellectual-emotional, purely intellectual or purely instinctive vasanized (ethos-influenced) prana and endow it with the object of choice. There are middlepersons of this process, for some external currents, streams, and entities may interact with the process, accidentally or intentionally, to enhance our will, thwart it, or turn it completely against the original intent. One can work directly with such entities to amplify a blessed or cursed object, depending on the purpose. How is it blessed or cursed? Think of it as a set of instructions that set in motion scripts and processes that are read from the „other side" and have their own qualities. A hateful Mars war talisman worn by an unstable sensitive may cause acute anxiety symptoms or random outbursts of manic behavior in public and cause nasty synchronicities. Moreover, the wearer of such a talisman may combine the energies of his own energy network, soul and mind complexes, and thus be amplified or abused by multiple entities from the other side. In the city we never work in the void, we cannot afford to create impenetrable vaults as in Lhag Thog traditions in Tibet. People carry around a lot of mental garbage, stress, frustration, destructive passions and emotions, nervousness, anxiety, so stabilizing one's mind is extremely important. Entities can bless or curse certain objects out of their own will.

I once consecrated a Saturnine onyx dodecahedron embedded in silver in the burning fire of the Sun and an angeli bonum, a good lady of the other side appeared and kissed it for a blessing. More advanced techniques required study of planetary natures, horary astrology (with reserve), and ceremonial magic, the sigils and seals of particular entities and traditions. The laws and rules of „drawing down the moon" are similar.

The other part is clairvoyance, which almost always involves the capture of an entity or an image of it for preconceived purposes. The nature of the objects used for such purposes, such as the structure of crystals and mirrors and their chemical properties that resonate with a particular dimension, are often found in magical correspondences, but insofar as they are useful, never trust them. After all, they are made by humans and it is a gamble that they will not resist the allure of inaccuracy or downright fantasy and imprecision because they want to accomplish it. For example, John Dee's Enochian Tablet is not properly deciphered because people forgot that there is a letter Th „Thof" in the Elizabethan alphabet, which messes up the whole gematric cipher used by today's ceremonial magicians working in this tradition. Another example is Sir Isaac Newton, who claimed to have deciphered the Tabula Smaragdina Hermetis. He did not know the language and interpreted it poetically, whereas we now know that it was written in Samarian, a Semitic alphabet, in about the 7th to 6th centuries before modern times, and that it was a curse tablet intended to destroy Egypt. Always test things, you can start with correspondences, but do not be blind.

Scrying is not only a means of imprisonment, divination (e.g. when a being is scried into a black mirror), but also of preservation — of memories, of scenes, magickal knowledge etc. It can also provide a shelter for spirits that are not imprisoned, but can stay in the objects and leave them at will. In this case it is similar to bionic statues and objects where a deity inhabits an image in self-manifestation, it is present and inhabits the statue or withdraws its essence and the object becomes desacralized, i.e. normal, profane.

Powerful artifacts attract attention. I once ordered a lapis lazuli stone embedded in pure silver and consecrated it with sacra drakontes, Aesculapian currents to protect it from malevolent influence. I was safely protected, but the amount of malevolent entities and less friendly shadows gathering around my person and taking possession of random people was tiring, so I threw the ring away into a public WC. Gods be merciful to the person who will find it. Sometimes it is better to use more subtle methods or magically go „naked" and without armor, this hardens the mind and after a while gains the respect of the other side. Malice and strength that torment you and cannot defeat you, may be won over with patience — dharmic methods. As long as it does not break your nature, you can call it a respectful achievement. But protection, even subtle apotropaic rituals and objects are better in this regard.

Methods in Magick VIII: Vehicle of Heathenism: Homoiosis Theo, Theion Ergon

Extracting a pattern from the living universe in its magnificent form, taking it up and expressing it, turns a fragment of the world-soul into a phenomenal act manifested in the generative world of matter. Between the great divine and terrestrial labours there are manifold mediums that hold the Hecatean keys of perception, consciousness, and transformation of the animalistic human soul into an astralistic pneuma. Hierarchies and boundary points are merely a model of something complete to make it more tangible to human symbolic-systemic thought. Gods do not contradict nature, they make it their own. By invoking a power, an idea, a force, a god or goddess, we seek to lease their power to our ethos, our daimon, to impress upon our soul an ability, an idea, a potency. The only goal is to transform ourselves into something that agrees with the power we invoke. „What we eat is what we become", this refers to all kinds of food, aesthetic, intellectual, physical, soulful, magical, performative, artistic, political, social and so on.

To perform this operation, we need a point of reference, a coordinate system for events and insights, a guide for orientation and arete, clearly — we need a map that we have acquired through experience, knowledge and life. The map is a projection of our daimon and it sets the plan for our further development, it unfolds along the way. How are we to proceed without clues? How are we to transform without knowing what we want to become, except through automatisms that pull us into destinies and events like puppets on the strings of emotions, desires and rash decisions, directing our time and effort in the wrong quarter? Sometimes I sketch schemes at various points in life to reevaluate my path, reflect on it, and recall long-forgotten memories, sensations, dreams, insights, visions, events, emotions, and feelings.

First, we need an object to inspire us, and like mystics, we make ourselves receptive to what it has to convey. Every object has its perspective, and as an Aghori knows, even faeces, blood, and decaying cadavers have something to teach us-to take an extreme example. This means that if we want to work with the solar energies, we must become the sun in trance, in performance, in meditation, in contemplation. When I close my eyes and stare at the sun for a brief moment (with my eyes closed, otherwise you will be blind for the rest of your life), I am exchanging perspective and intelligence with an object that physics considers a rather volatile but „inanimate" object. Its intelligence is hyperionic in hypostasis, that is, interpreted by the intelligible, intellectual apparatus of man, it is superbly alive, superbly divine, and supremely fierce and majestic, standing as a temple of truth and honesty. The reification of the sun in the figures of antiquity, be it Aion, Helios, Zervan-Akarana, is not naivety, but an attempt to allegorize the sun in order to bionize its high intellect in representative human form.

The iconoclasts hated the idea, they wanted a monotheistic, abstract God, and made short work of heathen symbols. They destroyed the balanced path between the supreme divine and a chain of mediums, symbols, forces, powers, masks of the divine in all their freedom, autonomy and unity. In Jungian terms, the introjection of the Divine as gods is wiser than a unified force, the step through the abyss is easier than with a gigantic void in front of us. Monotheism asserts that „here are men, there, beyond the void, is God." Symbolically speaking, the mediums of the multitudes, ordered in hermetic beauty, lead steadily to divinity, not just as symbols, but as living gods — do not make them demons or archetypes, as some have tried! Even if you want to go deep into the bowels of what they are made of — you will find a void of dharmas and exclude yourself from the process of participation.

We can exchange perspective with any object to approach its perspective, to rent its essence and acquire a part of it. This is an ad hoc scenario. But what if we want the intelligence of the planets to cooperate with us and shape our minds, hearts and souls? Please note that I use the term intelligencers for spiritual entities of a certain sphere, planetary and stellar, millions and millions of spirits are waiting! Somehow I have a faint, sad impression of human souls in chains, I dare to quote William Blake:

"The millions of spirits immortal were bound in the ruins of sulphur heaven
To wander enslaved; black, depressed in dark ignorance, kept in awe with the whip,
To worship terrors, bred from the blood of revenge and breath of desire,
In beastial forms, or more terrible men, till the dawn of our peaceful morning,
Till dawn, till morning, till the breaking of clouds, and swelling of winds, and the universal voice, Till man raise his darkened limbs out of the caves of night,
his eyes and his heart Expand. Where is space? Where O sun is thy dwelling?
where thy tent, O faint slumberous Moon?

— William Blake, French Revolution (1791)

Intelligencers polish, shape and carve in ethos, mind and soul, they shape us if we are willing to cooperate. The results are tremendously impressive in months, years. Work with the Saturn energies for seven years, and if you come through the great ordeal unscathed, you will attain a disciplined, systemic, cruel, deadly witty, versatile, somewhat vicious sense of humor, if not dead and ruined. Work another seven years, if you survive, and you will refine yourself into noble gold of great intrinsic value at best, or drown in mélancolie noire and obscene vulgarities at worst. Saturn is almost a sure way to the grave, with Mercury my inner trickster somehow begins to ask a question, „Will you survive or will I get rid of a competitor in the easiest way possible?" I leave it to others to come out with such notions and leave me far behind, I have to deal with the bitterness myself — that's my problem. But first you must learn to rise above yourself. I am a master upon myself and need no other after years of confrontations (although contested by swine that deal with their opinions or preferences, a grand „nay" to me, are like yesterday's farts upon the morose winds) and if you can find a mentor to guide you — all the better. But if in his arrogance he makes you a slave in a guru-like relationship, you should look elsewhere. Mastery goes with intellectual humility, arrogance with intolerance of fools, but the latter are never good teachers. Personally, I prefer to write because I know my limits of mischief. I would quickly become a charlatan if I extended myself to larger groups. Manipulative charlatans quickly forget their inner truth and follow ugly things. Remindeth thus, carry on!

Methods in Magick IX: Theion Ergon and Homoiosis Theio

As with mastering a language, one must acquire the vocabulary, grammar, usage, cultural and situational context, style, circumstances, and relational skills to use the language fluently. Of course, we never wait to master a language until we use it; we learn it as we perform it.

Similarly with any form of craft or art, including magic. This method in magic will try to explain how we can raise our individuation to a high threshold and surpass our Daimon to make him more effective in high magic actions. This is an immediate requirement, because the law of pitch is necessary in order to be in harmony with the worlds with which we wish to act. To give a rough example: If an ordinary person, shouts something to a mass of people, he will be mocked and ridiculed, but put him in a charismatic leadership position and they will weigh his words and most likely he will even be praised for the same utterances! Similarly, if we do not excel in anything, if we do not rise to greatness, our words will carry little weight with the „other side". If we have proven ourselves with words and our name is carried by ancient stories and legends, we will have an agreeable influence as long as it is wise and solid. The other side is intelligent to a much greater degree than mortal man can comprehend. It does not need a brain and senses to think, register and feel, it is a completely different kind of intelligence and uses different interfaces, and they can use the human mind, senses and emotions at will when necessary.

So, to impress something, we have to take a likeness or superiority in ourselves and act it out! It is a hard task to learn how to develop an inner value, an inner truth, which is objectively confirmed by the other side and the heavenly worlds. Here there are no lies, no falsities, what is subjectively true can be objectively false, what is subjectively false can be objectively true, we cannot lie to the universe, and if our subjective truths and untruths coincide with their objective counterparts, then welcome to the land of notions beyond the imagination! Here you begin to know yourself, to form yourself, to carve the matter of your wholeness! Homoiosis Theio is incorporating an ancient concept of virtue, very similar to the way siddhi (powers) are acquired in Eastern yogas. Virtue is like a Platonic idea, it is a high order from which you derive behaviour, feelings and experiences that correlate with the measure of your individuation, ethos and nature. It needs to be trained and comprehended.

Can an „evil" person be virtuous? Of course, he can even misdirect his virtue. An excellent charismatic rhethor can use the art of „bene discendi" for a malevolent purpose. Just as high intelligence and reason can have horrific effects on society if used for a blind, erroneous, foolish, or malicious purpose. Instead of thinking of „good" and „evil," we can think about nature and its karman, inclinations. These are diverse and do not fit into such simple Manichean categories; we can further classify these natures into a societal „right or wrong" based on the premise that what preserves a certain healthy order in which people can flourish is „right" and the opposite, instigating chaos and discord, death and destruction is „wrong." What is „right" and what is „wrong" should be derived from insight and deep reason, calculating patterns in causality, supported by ethical rulership over our minds and emotions. A simpleton's „right" and „wrong" is always flawed and short-sighted, and if a simpleton were to create laws, we would all begin to destroy each other, hate each other, and relegate justice and jurisprudence to hell, revenge, lynching, and resentment. Namely, all the instincts of justice that are not institutionally regulated, that come out when justice fails, when people do not trust the courts and judges, when we do not experience justice.

Homoiosis Theio learns from philosophia naturalis, from philosophia humanis and philosophia divina, with „ecce homo", a humanity in the center. What can we learn from nature, from human beings and from the gods to become mortals with a stable, perfected, beautiful ethos? How should we implement this in our daimon? We do not need to be demigods to perform high magic, we just need to defend, strengthen, perfect and develop our nature, under close observation of the deities. Defend to avoid tartarism and bestiality, strengthen to accentuate, understand and amplify, perfect to have guidance and round out our alchemical works, progress because life ates a standstill and it is relatively short for a mortal to achieve any form close to excellence. We often have a sense of virtue, but when asked what it is, we do not know how to explain it. We behave in certain ways because we were taught to, but that is a socialized, automatic behavior. The first step to integrating virtues is to question our behavior and figure out what might be good about it. Then we extend our behavior to others, exchange perspectives, and try to understand them so that we have a reasonable reason to try to imitate and absorb them in a reasonable way, i.e., to integrate them just like the language we use in everyday life.

Theion Ergon is another case, namely when we are perceived, that is, when our homoiosis Theio is recognized by the spirits, the intelligencers, the Gods, and we receive their permission and blessing to proceed with the acts of high magic. Here it is worth to decide what is our duty. Is it a priestly duty to work for humanity as a Magoi, is it a royal duty to work behind the backs of politicians and societies and pursue goals to catalyze Heaven into the actions, arts and inspirations in the minds, hearts and souls of people without violating their will? Is it a wise duty to retire from the world as an intelligencer and commit in his daimon to engage posthumously in the world, from the assigned sphere and star? They all hold dangers and pitfalls that can quickly pull the rug out from under us, but there are also great achievements and wondrous miracles that are worthy and splendid as long as our nature can resist pride, attachment, inflation and delusions of grandeur. The best approach is „oh, this and that," when we appropriate something from our work, it captivates us. The best works are the byproducts of excellent work and conduct, they are never claimed as possessions. We just do our work and live our lives, what else is there?

Methods in Magick X: Proportions and Ratios

To draw order from a world of apparent chaos, we must recognize patterns. We must arrange these newly found patterns into proportions and intelligible, reciprocal relationships, frames of reference, and points to each other in order to arrive at any hermetic science at all. Normally, this pattern recognition is innate and readily available to us. Let us take the example of face recognition without getting into the neurocognitive aspects. The face is an external principle of our identity. When it is damaged, our fleshly identity can suffer, whether it is somber, grimacing, silent, or cheerful, vividly representing the character's movements. Its gestures and expressions represent ideas, emotions and feelings. The sculpture of our face represents traumas, dreams and reflections, rawness, roughness or a carefree, easy-going life. We can call the sum of facial expressions a general tendency, or let us put it this way, the accumulation of tendencies of facial expressions over time is directly proportional to a general inclination, if it really represents the inner states and masks, a manifest karman of that person.

The faces we encounter, the faces we forget, our loved and hated faces, it's like a great Greek theater of masks, so where is the essential personality? The Greek theater constructed identities through masks, and the masks we wear consciously, learned or unconsciously, are a social game of appearances. The Greek theater was honest, the actor did not grow into the role, but delegated his skill to a mask and acting. The most essential appearance by which we recognize our spirit is our face. I once saw the most beautiful face in the world on a starry night. It was the face of my old love whose spirit was consecrated to the Magna Mater, it instilled awe and wonder, sorrow and transience in my wretched, mortal mind, moved my old, dead heart to a form of semblance feeling. When I caught sight of it in the starry night, I turned my face away, I could not bear the pain of loss and longing, for somehow I knew there would be no happy ending in this story, either in life or posthumously.

Let me hurriedly explain why I have organized a short declamation on faces. Because the patterns of our identity resemble the patterns of daimons or inner values, worth and spirits, because between known and unknown faces we choose proportions of relations and ratios of beautiful and ugly, of qualitative and quantitative. We are all somehow in relationship to the world and to ourselves, and in the end the finger points to the universe, suspended in a direct question, „Why?" points back to us and asks „How?".

All hermetic approaches to high magic must recognize proportions and ratios and extract order from apparent chaos. „Every model is wrong, but it is useful" — wrote George Box; „The map is not the territory" — wrote Count Korzybski; Nevertheless, models and maps are necessary, and those that work approach our success as we bite through false ideas and delusions to arrive at diamonds of insight and experience-saturated, reasonably derived knowledge.

The open model of a hypothetical inductive-deductive method is a way to test hypotheses supported by the hermeneutic-heuristic model of imagination, the imagination supported by the knowledge of the sciences to prevent ideas that are intuitively correct but generally unfounded. How does this apply to high magic and metaphysics? Let us begin with an example.

We begin with the axiom „there are gods." What are the gods? We back this up with the Iamblichean argument that „gods are incorporeal, objective, and dispassionate, that they are in everything, and that they can be omnipresent." We continue the argument that „there are realms of entropy and gradation, and that the World is neither symmetrical nor chaotic, but at some level is unitary and indivisible." We have three hypotheses that we are trying to prove, the patterns that we need to order.

Let us start with the first one and assume conversely that „there are no gods". From a realist point of view and a materialist worldview, there are no gods, because a materialist has not seen, touched or experienced any gods, his model collapses in his worldview. If he sees an autophanic manifestation of a god or if a god avatarizes his body, he can further declare, „This is a delusion, a hallucination, I am going crazy." If he was religious in his childhood, he can retreat into religion as the nearest known explanatory atavism, like a frightened animal saying, „I am possessed, something is wrong".

Experience is everything, no one will convince anyone that gods exist, unless they have their own idea, conception or experience of them, blind faith is simply put, plain ignorant. All theologies derive from the axiom that „gods exist". A materialist may brush all that off and go about his life, convinced that he is dealing with a fantasy. And yet we are dealing with people who acknowledge the existence of gods who have experienced them, seen them, or been inspired to believe in them. And now the second argument: how do we know that gods are „objective, impassionate, and in everything?" Since the scale between unity and difference, order and chaos is a gradation, we can assume that more unified forces in the universe are directly proportionally extended, so that what is extended, like space, must necessarily be objective and profound. The more diverse the forces are, the more subjective, quarrelsome and combative they become. They are incorporeal, so they are not subject to the passions, the instincts of the generative biological world, but neither do they contradict it.

It is a different vantage point of perspective and perception, and we can't exchange perspectives with daimons and Gods, until we become them. When space and objectivity are connected with incorporeality, they can be omnipresent, there is no „above and below" here, there is only the right or deceived perception, perceive in the right way and you will see gods, perceive in a distracted, strongly materialistic way and you will see only what is in front of you. How is it that a girl in the USA summons Hecate and another in Greece, Athens, does the same and when they are successful, the delegated masks of power called „Hecate" appear to support their operation? This is because they are invoking a manifestation of a reflection of this goddess who is omnipresent as a force in their domain. Reminds me of the title of Campbell's books „Masks of God", well — E Pluribus Unum.

As you see, we have a pattern, we establish certain proportions and try to explain them, then we experiment with them to reach conclusions. Similarly, we can encode certain laws in symbols, in sigilia, in rectified concepts and usee them as signs of condensed experiences that we can manipulate and play with finesse. In this way we build our own library of a Glass Bead Game that we can operate on mental, astral, pneumatic and artistic-intellectual levels with high degree of success.

Methods in Magick XI: Ars Memorativa

The very evil that wants to deprive us of true, beautiful, just, good and right memories accordant with Aletheia is the very evil that masters us through deceit, ignorance, stupidity, blindness and indoctrination. It hinders the acquisition of true memories that resonate with realizations and hard-won skills and sports false ones, ruining our works. It makes us forget what is true and splendid, and makes us remember what is false, commanding our minds and hearts to the dictate of that ugly crone — forgetfulness and that malicious and envious greybeard — delusion. May Mnemosyne stand triumphant!

Today, not many of us have the proper focus, duration of concentration, time, and resources to train in the Renaissance Ars Memorativa, as propagated by Giordano Bruno, for example. For more information on the history of the art of memory, I would recommend Frances Yates (Yates Frances A. 1966. The Art of Memory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press). The imagination of many people is weakened by weapons of mass distraction and a constant replacement of their phantastikon with pop culture stimuli and other superficial things that can hardly be called an adornment of their minds, hearts, souls, daimons, and genii.

How can we save our memories, how can we maintain them? After all, they are the key to maintaining the arsenal, performance and defence of any working magician. Without memory, we forget our tools, our purpose, our vision, and ourselves. Without memory, we become prisoners of the present, and the beauties of the ethereal worlds elude our perception and our eyes. Lest we forget! There are many plans aimed at depriving people, and especially the Magoi, of their operative memory, which is crucial for the maintenance of their work. Sometimes this is associated with indoctrination, because a person without memory is easy to influence and brainwash with the most heinous deceptions! Let us remember that in the Orphic mysteries Aletheia, the truth, is synonymous with non-forgetfulness (A-lethe). It is the heroic souls who remember the immortal and divine worlds and never give up the revelations (epiphanies, apocalypses) of the treasuries of Isis, the joy of the true philosophers.

How can we remember? We can make notes in space, on objects, notes inscribed on our thoughts, our soul, our mental-emotional fields, creating a whole network of memory nodes that we can recall when necessary. To remember everything at once is an impossibility in mortal life, it would be a curse! This blessing comes with death and immortality, embodiment — if our Herculean ways lead to this total memory, then we are in truth in possession of all our universal memories surpassing our single Earthly life, when this gift is bestowed upon us! And yet in life, in order to progress in the alchemical toils and work in Homoiosis Theio and Theion Ergon, we must create our own mnemonic web and masterfully weave it so that none of it can be torn, none of it — unwoven. Here we play the spinners of destinies, resembling the Moires. It is the fates of our memory that we weave together and maintain to make battle of the Thyrsian splendor.

Short is the memory of mankind, short the memory of the masses mercilessly exploited by their masters, short the memory of the masters and the history of their elevation! Short is the memory of the horrors and miseries of their history! Shards of the dead catch the echo of long lost events, even the living confuse their long lost loves with events that no longer captivate their hearts. Perhaps it is better that way! For total recollection in a mortal life is total horror, to relate all memories with their emotional burden to a single point in life is a terrible ceremony of the best and worst, the deeper the life lived, the nobler the pains and raptures, the greater the dangers of crossing the threshold of what is bearable for a mortal! Do not let me use double standards if I think that it is better not to remember for some people, because the experience should be dissolved in the fusion of pain and awe, of sufferings and joys, to find a wisdom in the moderate understanding!

Memories in occult understanding are synergistic information in an enthropic synthony held in a topological space that are places in a spatio-temporal continuum with all the threads attached to it — dimensional, ontological, magical, etc. Memories are also a hierarchy of rationed events distributed in consciousness and in the memory of the mind, both as „ghosts of the mental sphere" processed by the brain in short and long term memories, but retrievable from the matching astral spheres and not just distributed in the neural networks.

Think of how difficult it is to remember what we did yesterday at 1:33 p.m., what was our thought, emotion, feeling, mindset, worldview, what did the jumping monkey of our mind come up with? What state were we in? It is much easier to grasp the place we were in, the people we were talking to, what we were seeing, than what we were thinking about. Depending on our aptitude for certain senses, including the „extrasenso-

ry" (extrasensory senses are senses that go beyond the accepted ones, but retain the qualities of senses), we can remember sounds, visions, scents, smells, abstract ideas, force fields, energy spheres, magnetic phenomena, signs of entities, sigils, signs and symbols. Someone with a photographic memory and developed astral vision and second sight will find it easier to remember landscapes than thoughts or sounds, but the point is to master all synergistic imprints to the point where we remember not only what we focused on, but all environments and stimuli that we can reconstruct from scratch. With training comes mastery, master the craft, and everything else will follow!

The first idea is remembering, the Aristotelian method of remembering. We put a „hook", an „engram" or a „coex" (condensed experience) in our memory at a certain time and place, and then recall a few hours later what the „hook" contained, the places, the sounds, the chatter, the thoughts, all of it! The hook works like an „astral note" and is a mnemonic device filtered through a particular perspective or reality tunnel. Any event can be viewed from many perspectives and often it sheds more light on different models to extract more valid information that can be used to develop better magical tools.

We can not remember everything at once, so we have to consciously and selectively choose what to take in and remember. Here the guide is both ethos and esthetics, what is useful and what is superficial, what helps our development and what hinders it. What good is it to remember that a dog barked in the park? But it is useful to remember that a garden spirit acknowledged our presence, it is useful to remember that we met our great love in such and such a place, it is useful to remember that a certain ceremony was performed there and then. We should remember not only important things but also useful things. If you clutter your mind with dull or foolish knowledge and gossip, it does not pave the way for excellence.

So we go about binding spatiotemporal memories in this way, and by binding we narrow down the search criteria when we need to remember something. We can leave astral notes around people, places and objects, make them float in the air, some undead shadow witches write on the living skin of people to communicate precise information, true or false, to the shadows and the dead. The language of shadows and gestures is a separate chapter. In this way, information can be gathered or left behind. Notes are a form of magical mnemonics that we can use to remember important things about certain places and events. We can even leave notes in imaginary realities, dimensions, realities and places if we choose to do so.

In secret I tell you that I call upon the goddess Mnemosyne to preserve my memories, and that in a secret place, a field, a temple in the stars, I make backups of my memories, well encrypted and secured so that no outsider can access them. Methods to encrypt and cloak will be next. Thank you!

Methods in Magick XII: Ciphering, stealth techniques and cloaking

"Once we came and went as we please, now we come, and need to escape the prisons, to ever attain liberation"

Virya (energy) goes where the dhi (mind) goes. I will use this Dhi-Virya link to avoid „Prana" and „Kundalini" as this would be inaccurate in this context. I want to focus exclusively on the mental sphere and thought forms, which, properly used, organized, visualized, mentated, cogitated, proportioned, rationed, and energized (subtly materialized), are useful in many magical operations, depending on the potency and talent of the observer.

Surveillance is a big thing in human society, and on the „other side", the surveillance of thoughts, the detection of anomalies and „illegal magic" on Earth, or any form of circumvention of the „allowed" by the transcending, transgressive, unauthorized magicians, anarchs of the modern world is a red flag to pacify such an individual, deprive him of memories and abilities, and in the worst case eliminate him. By whom? By the individuals who govern the system that authorizes and registers the technological or aethyr grid, that is, the distributed geomagnetic field complementary with the bioelectromagnetic component of the human being and the pneumatic-ophitic (soul) component of the human animal.

The „God Complex" did not come out of nowhere, but was created by those whose intention was to control the resources of human minds, hearts and souls. As far as I know, there are three vertical spheres up to the stratosphere with horizontally distributed power centers on the geomagnetic grid, all of which contain illusory „sources," „heavens," and so on.

Once controlled, you can fill them with anything — religion, ideology, beliefs, science, etc. Sources are programmed „dogs on a leash" that say what they are programmed to say. If you stuff them with Judeo-Christian belief systems, that's exactly what you'll get. That does not mean they are true, it just means that is the content they are programmed to spread to hide all other possibilities of liberation. It also does not mean that the network is completely dominated by the Judeo-Christian faith. It means that they are in the majority and therefore it takes a strong and steady persevering spirit, bullshit-proof and carrying its inner truth like an immovable diamond, to escape the inhibiting beliefs and engage in magical and spiritual practices veritably if one rejects their forcible conversion, their wallowing in guilt and shame, and their civilization-preprogrammed architectures of meanings and beliefs and fake „miracles" and „burning-hearts", „crowns of thorns" and other pseudo-„thaumaturgic" incentive trips for fools. Personally, I prefer what I received from Gods, and Judeo-Christian bigots never bought me, nor the gifts that ignorance of darkness had to offer.

To leave the ionosphere, one needs a well-developed pneumatic component; to reach the extralunar and planetary spheres, stars, one needs a vehicle provided by the gods. Crossing the abyss and drinking the ambrosia of the gods is a descent below the zones of control, a transformation of the spirit and a preparation for ascension bypassing the honey trap of the earth, becoming the star-born. The descent into the abyssal zones brings with it a trick. Hell is breathing down your neck and trying to keep you there. Escaping psychiatry if you take a wrong step borders on a miracle, not committing a crime and being under the influence of malignant possessions if you are loyal to the Solar Forces depends on the strength of character and the counter-influence of helpful deities. In other words, you will not make many friends on Earth because you committed a prison break. From the point of view of the innocent prisoner, it is innocent; from the point of view of the guards, it is a capital crime to become a minor demigod on earth because of the transformation that comes with the Eleusian initiation, which has been clearly forbidden for centuries and is transgressed only from time to time.

From the point of view of human souls, it is a honey trap, because everything within the triregnum (three spheres or kingdoms of heaven on Earth, a forest of pleasant illusions to keep the imprisoned souls happy) is vulnerable to rebirth on Earth, because the times on Earth continue mercilessly linear — and it does not get better.

The question now is: How do you get away with your secret operations without being discovered?

Ciphering is a method of disguising and camouflaging the intention, deed, performance, thought, visualization, materialization, evocation, invocation, incarnation, broadcasting, emanation, reception, invocation, action, and effect in such a way that no unauthorized person can gain access to the information contained therein, apart from the intended recipient or effect. It is a way of modulating the mind to put all this in incomprehensible languages that cannot be understood by unauthorized persons or persons who are interested in it. Human languages are easily deciphered, so what I write or think in words is immediately overtaken by any being who can understand human languages. Mentalese is a language of ideas and a separate tool to be mastered. Encapsulation of mentalese language in further layers of ciphers and codes during ritual practice requires practice.

Encapsulated ciphers can still be cracked unless we use „quantum ciphering", i.e. where the information changes in the opposite direction and mutates into meaningless strings, and only the one who has a unique key is able to receive it only once and execute the commands, requests, disposing of both information and keys. Cloaking techniques and camouflage are first about making our operation invisible, or we create deceptions and illusions that we are doing something else to make the action of transmitting information invisible to the intruders, and furthermore present illusory data and fake tokens that are mistaken for real information in the process of camouflage. The more sophisticated the deceptions we create, the better. Ultimately, we can assume that the higher thresholds of united executive the information is sent to, the easier it will be partially „omnisciently" decoded and we will escape detection by low-threshold levels.

The good thing is that sometimes we can play with our cards face up, but this risks spoiling our work, overtaking it and undoing all our efforts. The occult means „hidden", it is a sacred science, not a card game, but a game with sophisticated and advanced rules that change according to the setting, person, aethyrical and astral environment, genius loci and environment, time and space.

Methods in Magick XIII: Qi, Ki, Chi and Vhri

There are hidden senses of which not many people are aware. They are well known in birds, for example, magneto-receptivity, which helps them navigate, or electro-receptivity in sharks. Some people sense biomagnetism as heat, rare individuals can sense magnetism from both plants, animals, humans, aetheric astral beings, electronic devices and anything that generates such a field. I personally started my practice with an electronic device with a relatively strong magnetic field, namely my laptop. Back in 2007 in a small house in Waun Fawr, Aberystwyth, after several traumatic events, I noticed that I could sense a strong field around my computer and began to experiment with it and train myself in this regard. Soon I was feeling the fields of plants, trees, people, animals, subtle beings and so on. The vulgar practice with a strong magnetic field slowly made me perceive the subtle fields of other subjects. In other words, I became magneto-sensitive. When I experimented with other people by changing the potential and valence of the field in my hand, they felt an intense warmth emanating from my hand, and a lady who had a similar ability confirmed that she could sense magnetism.

Soon I was able to gather this energy from many sources, including electronic devices and appliances (you are dealing with electricity, safety first, unless you want your fragile mortal body fried!) and convert it into bionic fields.

In this regard, I would like to note that Tai Chi, which I have practiced for a while, is one of the least invasive methods of mastering this energy for general health, and that the different figures and poses adopted have different benefits for the management of Qi. Most likely, it is related to the correlation between neural activity and psychomotor attitude, which modulates qi differently in different postures due to flows of this energy. For example, arms stretched upward in a runic algiz posture help gather that energy from the environment. Therefore, the proper way to worship the gods was to stretch out one's arms toward the sky and the stars. Before and during a storm or when the atmosphere is highly ionized, it is easier to gather this energy because qi is related to a well-controlled bioelectromagnetism that is amplified by neural rewiring and directed with willpower and concentration. For a detailed description of how Qi works, I recommend Chinese manuals on the subject.

The main ports of this energy after the activation of qi power through training leading to neurological rewiring are in the hands. Depending on the lateral inclination of the brain (left or right — leaning kundalini vortex, left-handedness or right-handedness), the left hand is the lunar gate and the right hand is the solar gate in right-handed magicians; conversely, the gates are analogously interchangeable in left-handed magicians. Please notice, that I don't mix the conceptual systems of Left-Hand Path and RHP here, which are completely different esoteric traditions. In this system, the feet are the grounding. The meridian points in the nervous system are one of these descriptions, and they are often confused with the „chakras" of yoga, which are an emanation of nervous bioelectromagneticity in several points that are not as precisely defined as in your usual „yoga illustration", but are localized according to the organism and function as an „translation" of these neural points generated in the soul. Most importantly, the „chakras" in this sense „are based on the spine, which in ancient Egypt was called the „djet" and from which they radiate to the rest of the body. For this reason, the spines of pharaohs and priests were often kept as artifacts and relics.

I would like to point out a difference between the energy of the mental sphere, i.e. psionism, qi energy or life force and biomagnetism, and the pneuma force or will power of the Ayna zone between the eyebrows. I have already mentioned the Algiz rune. In some manuals of runic magic, the postures are clearly explained as a form of gymnosophy, including sexual gymnosophy, a Nordic yoga. Qi in esoteric Germanic traditions can be compared to the bionic Vhril and is symbolized by the Sowilo rune, Sieg (lightning), or Zeus lightning, or Vajra lightning, if you want to avoid the runosophic connotations with nazism, as lightning during storms is the furious discharge of this force by nature. During experiments I have found that I can transform electromagnetic fields by converting them into bioelectromagnetic fields. What can qi be used for? Balancing qi throughout the body can have health benefits, including faster regeneration, healing and slower aging, keeping the mind mentally sharp for a lifetime. To do this, one must master and muster the movement of qi throughout the body, and this is done by mere thought. As mentioned in the previous article, Virya (energy) goes where the Dhi (mind) goes with its will. Since the earth has natural deposits of free qi in the atmosphere, which are rarified nowadays — I believe that the fields were denser in ancient times, making miracles such as levitation possible. After mastering qi, it is possible to bend this field, both by creating vortices in the field and by wave discharges, subtle projectiles, focused discharges, externalization of qi, and so on.

Mastery of qi is useful for magical self-control and balance. It is also useful in banishment and exorcism, since almost no subtle entity remains unmoved and does not go berserk when we create a strong discharge against it. Qi can therefore be used as a magical weapon (astral swords, spheres with rotating daggers, whatever) and for defense (amplification of the sahu or soul force and, when destroyed, amplification of the remnants of the life force to create aethyr armor). Life force or qi armor is unfortunately easy to penetrate especially during weakness caused by illness, so other magical substances such as khaibit (black tar substance made from dead souls) are more effective in creating impenetrable armor. Only people who possess a soul and soulcraft can create layers of body armor around themselves. People with slaughtered souls, shadows and soulcrafts like me have to create armor from available resources — the dead souls, demonic substances or pure khaibit et al.

Qi is also responsible for animal magnetism and control functions when combined with willpower. Animals have their instincts and their own will, so it is often difficult to overpower an animal without an external agency, although after some experiments I was able to break the „will" of birds, swiftly changing the course of their flight, and calm aggressive dogs.

Since humans are more complex animals, it is possible to break their will and force them into submission by magical means, although I consider this unethical. First and foremost, you should use persuasion and wisdom. If you are a skillful rhetor, you can achieve more with ordinary words than with will-bending magic and enticement.

Methods in Magic XIV: Biomagick

> "We can exterminate the animals but not annihilate them; they withdraw from manifestation to the primal images, perhaps to the stars. The men who explored the moon could not tell that there was life on it, for they brought wasteland along. The earth cleanses itself periodically, new shapes will come thronging. They are heralded by tremendous birth pangs. Then new Prometheuses will be their midwives. Or will we find our way back to the animals after a chain of spiritualizations, as after a sleepless night? Thus, the lamb could return on a higher level, as Capricorn, a sign uniting happiness and power"

— Jünger Ernst and Joachim Neugroschel. 1993. Eumeswil. New York: Marsilio, p. 248

> "Evolve, mutate"

— Discordian motto.

First things first: for lack of competence and formal training, I will not discuss cognitive science, evolutionary developmental neurobiology, or other related disciplines from an academic perspective. This report is about experience codified in experiential knowledge; it is neither para-academic nor pseudoscientific. It does not pretend to be scientific, as it does not follow a rigorous scientific methodology of discovery. It was written to convey certain ideas covered in cybernetics and computational radionics, but without dwelling on those disciplines. It describes fine-tuned, self-induced qi operations, force condensations, installation of modules in the CNS, archaeo-magic, trading with alien intelligences, modern shamanism, and non-intrusive para-operations on the living organism that relate exclusively to the realm of „magic," or magical philosophies and operations that do not conform to the currently accepted paradigm. Of course, if you are gifted in the above disciplines, you can experiment with an additional level presented here, in which I have more talent and intuition than knowledge.

In order to limit the scope of the description of this method, I will not dwell on various variable external influences, including possession by entities, and I will focus exclusively on four aspects of magic used with respect to the nervous system and the organism:

I) Eucrasia of the nervous system influenced by magical means.

II) Dyscrasia of the nervous system, influenced by magical means.

III) Various techniques to amend the nervous system towards eucrasia or dyscrasia.

IV) The extension of the nervous system by extraordinary modules, which would be called subtle mutations:

A) Permanent, i.e., alteration of the organism.

B) Temporary, i.e., modulating the functioning of the organism and the nervous system in order to achieve one's goals, to change or counteract the dyscrasic processes that have a deficient effect on the whole.

The functioning of the nervous system can be influenced by installing the following „modules" in each of its parts, including the functional regions of the brain:

A) Malignant parasites that can affect the eucrasia of the organism.

B) Barrier layers that can block the expression of neuropneumatic expressions of the organism. They may be induced for the purpose of regulation or may be induced externally to control the organism or limit its abilities and skills, for example by malicious agents and competitors.

C) Compulsions that may affect the neuropneumatic expressions of the organism. They can be induced for the purpose of regulation or externally for the purpose of controlling or limiting one's abilities and skills.

D) Biomagnetic modules that reinforce the crasis of the organism.

Depending on the part of the nervous system in which they are installed, they affect a certain region and cause a certain neurotyping, which affects cognitive, psychomotor, psychosexual, biochemical and electrical regulations of the organism and, to a certain extent, psycho-pneumatic variables.

Furthermore, all these factors can be divided into:

A) Delimitation, weakening or strengthening of the work of existing brain and spinal regions, chemical-electrical expressions of the working organism, without additional information except the volume and intensity of energy. Let us consider this as a „pure type" of interaction.

B) Enrichment with additional information, for example, mixing the nervous systems of snakes or fragments of them with the nervous systems of humans, creating symbiotic relationships or temporary imprints. Here an incompatible nervous system can react violently and override the human nervous system (a maliciously installed „astral imprint" of a woodlouse copied into my spine led to involuntary jerking and spasmodic movements), and mixing with alien nervous systems can have biopsychological effects (one can become more focused, aggressive, weakened, etc.). The law of nature, proportions and measurement: how is a human nervous system measured with the nervous system of a snake, how strong is the mixing of natures and in what proportions (which functional areas of the nervous system are affected).

There are different types of augmentations that can be brought about in the meta-programming of the CNS itself:

A) Focusing qi energy on a specific part of the nervous system, functional brain regions, or the spine to achieve the desired effects. Strengthening or weakening the fields in specific areas to achieve the desired modulations. Maintaining a „fix" in a specific region to maintain it, temporary „fix" in a specific region to counteract malignant disorders of eucrasia. Please note that changing any part of the crasia of a particular organism, and the crasia of each organism differs, affects a whole network of other subcrasias of the whole, so this should be done carefully. The risks are: the development of a disease, the development of madness, the invitation of undesirable influences, the invitation of invading astral parasites, and much more.

B) Copying parts of the nervous system and parts (e.g. venom glands) of other living or extinct animals (recovered from the graveyards of forms) to gain certain subtle abilities by fusing an „astral soul imprint of the functional part of a particular organism" with one's own body and organism to create a subtle magnetic imprint that affects biochemical-electrical modulations in the CNS.

C) Development of certain historical elements of the nervous system (strengthening of archaic or reptilian parts to eliminate emotions and increase toughness) or strengthening of non-existent elements (e.g. Extension of the „osiric" spine, the „dragon" brain, or creation of a typhonic magnetic extended skull that is not bionic but merges with the existing skull and brain to perform additional operations, such as strengthening concentration, discipline, predator-like biopsychological performance, etc.)

D) When you go to the high regions of the daimon or surpass the biolevolutionary aphrodisiac generation and associate all this with high celestial regions, the optimal state is when a greater nature pulls your nature upward and refines the organism into a divine state of Eucrasia as envisioned in the human-specific blueprint. This is a perfected state and in the land of generation and the ever-changing movements on Earth, it is possible to approach this state, to experience it, but almost never to perpetuate it.

"I like to cite myself, it adds spice to the conversation" — George Bernard Shaw.

Methods in Magick XV: Sex magick and the Venusian armory

Austere, rigorous, and perhaps sexist remarks that do not fit within the framework of „political correctness," but magic as an anarchic discipline has never been politically correct. I should call this chapter: Diary of youth excesses of a middle-aged man.

„Women cannot produce their own inceptive serpents, so they need foolish or willing men for magical operations, otherwise it is a transaction, unless they are impregnated by the currents of magic they work with, solar, chtonic or otherwise, when their souls or shadows grow wings"

„If a woman can teach you nothing in terms of magic, or the transaction does not increase your own abilities and powers, then do not waste your time with her, she will waste your resources and prevent you from further work".

„If everything wants to fuck you, it means that it wants to drain you of sexual energy, if you have mishandled it, if you are an idiot, you will fuck everything instead of using the currents for other work"

„In some cases it is better to get rid of and regulate excess sexual energies, otherwise you will be harassed by demonic bitches".

„A clever sorcerer will use a woman's soul to achieve his goals, a clever witch will bind a foolish man to her to carry out her orders".

„Respect yourself if you have more to achieve in intellectual than in sexual magic, do not waste yourself in ceremonies unworthy of the cause. Fuck quickly when you are young, and then devote yourself to philosophy and the high arts."

The mortal body is a „diamond" among the aphrodisiac animal worlds, a refinery for occult energies and astralistic currents, if it is used consciously and properly. A very important aspect of magic is sexual magic, although the assertion that „all magic is sexual" is a gross offense to every other aspect, which is an equally important part of the whole, harmonious man, woman, alchemical Vir Unus. The time of sex, the genius loci of place, the focused currents from the mental, psionic, and pneumatic spheres, the majority of instincts (normal lust, refined lust, high eroticism), the components of love in proper proportions (eros, philia, agape), the astralistic environment, the invited intelligencers, the participating entities that intermingle with physicality: e.g. archaic nervous systems produce, atavistic life forms associated with primordial reproduction when sexual control fails and is tied up in the primitive genital regions, resulting in spiders as symbols of female lust, worms, symbols of male lust, a variety of shadow creepy-crawlies, and flesh demons, undead whores whose faces contort in agony as they take possession of our beloved, the dead addicted to sex but unable to find fulfillment without a body, or the purified souls, agathodaimons and gods are a coquettish interplay that forms the starting point for all the other arcana mentioned below. It is of great importance, for example a combination of primordial lust, shadow-centipedes, flesh demons, etc. In conjunction with the operations of the Black Kundalini is an invitation to tremendous failures where foolish actors believe they can achieve something of value. Note that you must first purify the surroundings, control your qi, regulate the flow of serpent energies through the spine, and move them freely through the body if you are to engage in advanced sexual magical practices. Withholding ejaculation during orgasm is not for prolonging your orgasm or making your partner happy — it is a time when you have the most sexual energy and can use it for a specific magical operation.

The tantric winds and female angels, the dakini and yogini incorporeal consorts.

The purpose of these operations is to be elevated to the „realization" or the „bliss" of the soul, in which an advanced yogi will not shed a single drop of semen. I have failed several times and ejaculated, achieved orgasm rather than transforming the female angeli bonum energy into a state of penetrating understanding and high bliss or ecstasy. The paradigm that angeli bonum and dakinis and vajrayoginis or other retinue of various goddess do not indulge in sexual activities is false — but the purpose is different from animal sex for pleasure or procreation, the purpose is to transcend pleasure and procreation and transform into ecstasy and enlightened, enlightened bliss that enables alchymical marriage, transformation of the soul and spirit and posthumous ascension. Once, during eight months of asceticism, an asura ambushed me and tried to copulate. A fierce red body sat on me, while she was chased away by another deity and screamed with great anger in Hindi, then returned and bit me on the lips as a helpless punishment for scorning her approaches.

Black Kundalini — the Black Sun of hellish naughtiness.

Black Kundalini is the chthonic or khaibitic psycho-sexual substance also found in the demonic and among the dead, in the underworld, in the undercurrents of Seth's tunnels. To awaken this component, initiations in the Thanatos traditions must be performed. I will not go into the details of the operation, but if you successfully offer the djet (the spine) and the body to the priests of Anubis for mummification, in which the brain and vital organs are removed, you pave the way for the priesthoods of Seth to initiate you into the mysteries of death. The crucial part is the „swallowing of the rotten phallus of Osiris". Please note that the traditions do not „war" with each other as in the mythologies, but each focuses on a different part of the human initiation process. Thus, one may one day experience the double breath of Osiris and the other may participate in the mysteries of Seth, as long as it is well-balanced. The black kundalini, which comes from the underworld or from one's own shadow (khaibit, one of the souls), should be whirled along the spine and merge with the spine of the partner during sexual intercourse. When my partner rode me, she created the form of a deer skull with horns in a black robe, I created a black ram skull, which was later fused into a two-headed entity and charged with ruling over parts of Plutonia or hells. A successful black kundalini operation can produce demonic magical children. Intercourse with succubes usually produces a faceless (no facial features, white) black boy or girl; intercourse with Saturnian vampire females usually produces female shadow offspring. An operation can be botched at any point, as it can create unstable abominations that tend to take possession of either the mage operators or anything they hold on to, connecting to the sexual regions and mixing with the mind. This can drive the infected victim insane with either chthonic diseases, uncontrollable sexual urges that can lead to rape or misconduct, and other mental illnesses.

Baphometic operations: Soul mingling during sexual activities, twin serpent streams.

This operation requires a partner of the opposite sex, where the souls are temporarily exchanged and then merged through a sexual discharge associated with serpent currents that meet at the Ayna point and intermingle like a double-helix. When they are condensed, a magical aetheric winged hermaphrodite is created, the twin body, twin spirit, twin soul, twin current, twin serpent. The goal is to merge these components in the „domain of the Faun" so that they continue the work with a twin purpose — united — of the lovers who performed the operation.

Sex with shadow witches and the shrouds, or thanatophilic operations.

In some voodoo traditions, the rituals of the shadow witches include inviting the shrouds of the dead to engage in sexual acts. In this case, the offering of semen is like the offering of blood, it animates the dead and allows them to contribute information and skills, to whisper and exchange gestures. You should be aware that the female shroud, when prepared, mimics sexual behaviors — not to be confused with a succubae activity or accidental copulation with a male demon, be careful with demonesses, they like to make men their personal slaves and bitches to „own". Shadow witches can adopt you and incarnate you temporarily, enhancing your abilities and doing their bidding and your will so that both parties are satisfied. I was trained by an Italian Strega in Aberystwyth, Wales. She was seventeen years old when she was burned by the Inquisition and lingered in the shadows for five hundred years, gathering skills, knowledge and expertise, observing mortals. Later she was sent to the stars and appeared in beautiful white and silver robes, wise and benevolent as she was.

Dealing with sexual energy, or how to transform it and get away with it (examples of priests and nuns and mismanaged sexual energies leading to problems, psychosexual aspects).

All stored sexual energy during ascetic rituals and behaviors should be properly managed and transmuted, otherwise it will concentrate in the genital areas and invite succubic attacks, as well as „demonic" activities that create illusions from one's oniric and mental fields. To properly transmute sexual energies, one must alchemize them and master both the flow and change of the type of energy in the human pelvis that is purified and sublimated into bliss. The solar „halo" of saints or masters of the past, yogis and others is the result of an effective rectification of the sexual energies into a solar-intellectual, enlightened activity that creates a continuous flow of the strengthened life force, qi, through the body, centered around the head. The quaternal hermetic halo is visible to the second-sighted and the other side and looks like a solar halo with four flames high in the mountains.

The nervous-muscular-pranic vortexing of the Kundalini.

This is a vulgar technique to drive the serpent energies up the spine to the crown. It is based on sitting and binding and releasing (yogere) the lower parts of the nerve-muscle-joint complex at the base and then creating a Qi-vortex at the base to propel them through the spine and bypass any blockages at the spine. Oftenwise, it produces useless „fart-flyers", because it should be connected with the Kheper, the Mind and the Ayna-spirit to be endowed with intelligence.

Yogic Prana Orgasms and the Golden Body.

The Golden Body is the bliss body after a successful ecstatic Kundalini operation combined with the vertebral and gymnosophical techniques, which is usually preceded by several orgasms without semen discharges or losses. The prerequisites and dependencies of this operation are that it must be guided by a higher, disembodied attendant who enables the birth of the higher consciousness into the world of the gods. The being appears as a solid, bright, golden sphere that illuminates the surroundings and is delegated to the world of the gods.

Methods in Magick XVI: Ordo ab Chao

Often beginners are inundated with esoteric chaos and do not know where to start. I will highlight the necessary prerequisites that will save you a lot of trouble later when you dive deep into magical activities and performances. First, an education in ethos, a coordinate system that leads you to know yourself; second, ethics, a coordinate system that leads you to find in-depth meanings about what is right and what is wrong. Often this is attributed to „common sense", but rest assured that an unexamined „common sense" does not work when you are going through ordeals that can lead to provocations and malignancies that may incline a mind to murders, sexual perversities, aggressive and antisocial behavior, perversities of the mind, bestial tendencies, suicide, self-harm, rape, delusions, insanity, molestation, criminal activities, and all socially unacceptable activities that will quickly incapacitate you and send you into the arms of prisons, fines, and mental hospitals.

Take the Ordre du Temple solaire, Order of the Solar Temple, or OTS, as an example. Were these people a cult? In essence, yes. Did they have good intentions? Essentially, yes. Dealing with solar energies is an invitation to the forces of darkness and the agents of Typhon, cacodemons who do not care about right or wrong as long as you are eradicated, and in the most cruel way. I am not trying to gloss over these activities, but I have been there too, dodging my worst instincts and impulses while my mind was tortured. It doesn't mean all criminal activities are somehow demon-ridden, it means that when you deal the cards in the right sense, it may be so. Some magicians purposefuly engage in such rites, and they commit crimes as side-kicks to their fiends, become their familiars in the posthumous worlds, but that is not the point here. Let us focus on high magick: „Right talk, right thought, right action" is oftenwise not enough, you must also be resilient, tough, well-volitioned, and protected. You must appease the gods and take apotropaic measures or you are doomed. You just want to get a grip on your mind, your soul, your decision making and judgment process and see how far they get to destroy you, because there are forces out there that abhor realizations, as long as you fool around and dabble in the occult, religion, there is no threat, impotent ignoramuses are left to fend for themselves and because they didn't hit the target, they are ignored by and large, living their lives as if nothing would go in the background. The battle begins when we start to become effective in our performance, knowledge, action, potency, and then you may be robbed of your reputation, your sanity, your friends, your family, one by one. The arsenal of illusions, lies, slander, aversive and hateful methods that can be used against you is endless, the „fixer" is being „fixed". You are here alone with the gods, amidst a host of mortals who can be used against you like mindless dolls, if you make one wrong move. Friendship is important, loyalty is important, understanding is important, especially when you are working with other mages who are securing the area and supporting you. Solitude is a bitch because you have to fight alone. I did this for years to know all the tricks of the trade, observant and memorizing in survivalism.

Third, an unshakable backbone that has learned from experience to tame chaos and limit it to what is not harmful. Fourth, a well-meaning, serious nature that observes all movements with a keen and intelligent mind. Fifth, a philosophically inclined mind that brings order to chaos.

Most people do not know about ideas, they do not know why they behave in certain ways, they can not do introspection and analysis even at the most basic levels, they do not have knowledge about their being that comes from confrontation and experience. I do not mean superficial descriptions, but methods and contents, what is „freedom", what is „having a vision", what is „will". If you stop for a moment and ask yourself these questions, you will see how difficult it is to talk masterfully about these ideas for more than ten minutes, some talk for ten seconds and then go „ahhh, beeee", without illuminating the knowledge of experience, grasping the point accurately. „Grasp the subject, and the words will follow," as Cato the Elder said. But first you must grab the subject by the heels to rise to phoenix-like understanding. Ideas are one thing; people are another. You must know people, their behavior and social interaction, not superficially like a gossiping market woman, but with insight, with depth, with knowing what they want to say and do, with a „miraculous" precognition and intuition that penetrates their innermost dreams, desires, characters, words, and exposes all notions of falsehoods. Wisdom is based on the penetration of causalities and knowledge of essences. Using wisdom involves restraint and eloquence, she knows when to speak and when to be silent. It is a miracle because it is half human, relying on the stages of the above qualities, and half divine, relying on intuition and divine speech inspired by the spirits of Providence.

Let me now explain the aforementioned necessary components that some of us learn by gaining magical experience, and some of us are talented enough to have innately, nurture and raise them to use life experience, educate, socialize and derive operational achievements from them.

Ethos, the character that defines our innate inclinations, is a daimon (like the Socratic daimon or the daimon of Julian the Theurgist, who was an archangel, or that of Sosipatra, who was a goddess) that unfolds with life and circumstance and is of varying quality. Some have the daimon of a demigod, some that of a mortal soul, some that of an angel, some that of a malignant demon. Since there is more freedom in ethos, the daimon is never the same, and we are not born equal in this sense. There is no point in boasting about it until we live up to the nobility that is in our daimon, otherwise we are just elitist snobs who are worse than pigs!

The malignant natures can be overcome and changed, transformed into divine ones, and divine natures can be twisted into malignancy if their ethos is malformed. Ethos derives from daimon and has nothing to do with morality. Morality is relative to the given group upbringing, a concept of humanity defies morality — and ethos should be measured against humanity and strive to develop and polish the daimon to the best of its ability. How do you define humanity when even Confucius in his „Analects" was careful about it? I would define it as an individuation of a particular ethos and daimon, distinct from any mortal mind and soul, that somehow conforms to objective divine laws in the movement of deification and the soteriological goal of rising above one's nature and molding it into something objectively superior in the eyes of the gods.

How can you „know yourself"? Starting with the „E" in Delphi, which meant that there is a God in you, „everything in moderation, nothing in excess", means that you should courageously explore life and find out what you are made of in confrontation, contradiction, ease and agony, greatness and humiliation. Only then will you arrive at self-reflective proportions that determine your true nature. And only then and only then, when you see the contrasts both between you and the other and between you and any alien nature that is inflicted upon you by possession or tries to violate yours by taking over your mind and body — will you find it unnatural and quickly repel such attempts with the right methods. And if you master absorbing the natures that try to overpower you and that penetrate through your consciousness, you will be as versatile as the ocean. What passes through you and is dominated is your ally, what overpowers — well, you may become subservient to it. Then you will find how divine natures raise your ethos, mind and soul to the highest level without hurting your will, mind and body, how they work true miracles to make possible such blissful changes that can make you outstanding personalities — suddenly you can become an excellent speaker if you have started such training, a great painter — if you have the workshop, a highly inspired politician — if you are honest and consistent, an able warrior — if you have the combat training. When the will and the effort are there, when the inspiration of the divine arrives, then we surpass mortal understanding, for we draw from that immortal pool, „nothing new under the sun," that people who lived before us have mastered their abilities beyond understanding, polished them posthumously in the great expanses of the spheres and stars, and are ready to bestow them upon us when we call and receive (Chaldean oracles) when we are ready. This readiness means that we are ready to receive in proportion to our openness. There must be fertile soil, the gods do not cast on barren ground, nor on soil whose seeds would do harm and develop misery.

An intelligent, receptive, open, spacious, organized mind gathers experiences, arranges them beautifully and carefully, and lives through them — sometimes at the cost of stability, madness, anomalous experiences that few may survive, but ultimately victorious over them and integrated into our tools and knowledge. Intelligence multiplies intelligence, stoutness multiplies stoutness, as long as you know how to use it, multiply it, and not rest on your laurels. Constant curiosity, solving problems, playing with ideas can turn into a pleasant goal, intellectual hedonistic engineering makes us feel great when we solve a difficult problem, when we overcome a big obstacle. Mental resilience to harm and trauma can be trained, because where there is a will, there is a way.

The hypothetical-inductive-deductive method of magic in a feedback loop is an excellent tool to hermetize experiences. Because any chaos, any information, any experience is just content. When the content is present, we can derive the laws of work that incorporate values, virtues, tools and approaches. No scientific experiment can be done without data and information. None can work in a void where there are no laws to discover and no order to find. This content must be wielded, forged, and strengthened to become armor, shield, and sword. Why the military comparisons? Because magic is a battle that is about divine obligation, duty, mastering dominia. Slaves will never want to rule, and if you let them rule, they will not know what to do with the power either. This is where natures and ethos come in, pigs will want to rule for the sake of status and money, lions to shape the world like magicians, with a vision, reforms, with the inclusive perception that they are integrating the people, the republics, that if they are superior they are integrating with a great view, a vision of something they want to nurture so that it thrives forever. If you are above the masses, integrate them. If you hold your head high but are just a pig, you are an idiot; if you are proud and understand them, derive your pride from your nature and understanding. A magician should be a bit of a philosopher, a bit of a king (autokraton, self-governed), a bit of a warrior.

Everything in the world changes, definitely, you can be sometimes a pig, sometimes a lion, but only ethos, characters that uniquely exhibit high virtues, greatness, excellence of thought and action for the majority of the time, they have such a nature and hold it to their flags, who return to it, no matter what happens to them from outside or inside, what they have to endure in terms of envy, in terms of petty attacks from people, are highly praiseworthy in the eyes of the gods, they are the true men, women, the true companions of heaven and the rulers of men. Like Giordano Bruno, who „loved this world too much, who loved the truth" and wanted to banish the monster, the Vatican, from the land, his body was destroyed in the flames, but his spirit survived as a great master calling from above.

Methods in Magick XVII: On Evoking Intelligencers & Planetary Embassies

To count the gods, intelligencers and spirits, the genii of the earth and planetary spheres, the luminaries and moons, their octaves, hells and heavens, dimensions and palaces is an almost impossible process. It is like counting the stars in the „Little Prince" by Antoine de Saint-Exupéry by a businessman who thinks he owns them. So if we remember this work, we should remember the lantern-lighter of the „Little Prince" who is a hermit whose work is relentless, but in its futility has a theme that sustains the spectacle. So let me be the lamplighter that starts this new chapter, do ut des. With all due respect, I once tried to calculate the number of spirits that populate the aforementioned worlds, and then concluded that this is a disgrace to my friends. It is another mystery of the sacred, it never ceases to be so, but when it is vulgarized in the human mind — it withdraws, like an aetheric unicorn touched by a mortal human, it disappears; not from the world, but from the mind and soul of the offender who committed the offense.

Oh, you blind minds of mortals, you could participate in this great spectacle if you had not turned your spiritual eye away from the great expanse of the Divine. The gods are not to blame, it is your world and you have made it your own by an act of violence against Pymandrian" rule: „First the Gods, then the world, then your kind". How you make your laws is up to you, the gods will not interfere. It is the continuous rise to the divine that makes a mortal shine. In the golden era of the Wu and Xi in China, for example, the tradition and honor given to the heavens were strong and appreciated by many, but the legendary times are long gone and only a few call with perseverance, although people point out to them, that what they pursue is but a fantasy, little more than a delusion, an eccentricity, though they are blinded and desensitized by the forces that keep such pursuits in check, so that they have a firm grip on human ignorance!

To the point! There are many traditions in a discipline called theurgy by some, which has survived from ancient times through the Middle Ages to modern times. It is practiced by some respected people who have not lost all hope and who work with the spirits, not for personal gain, but to transfer the celestial realms to themselves and to incarnate portions of these essences to resist delusion and broadcast these realization upon the terrestrial stage!

There are many methods to invoke the intelligences, with or without additional amplifiers, be it scents, ointments, certain plants, places with their genius loci, consecrated areas, hours and days, astralistic settings, mediating entities, writings, words, prayers, gnosis arretos, silent speech, spirit languages, but in the first place — the temple of the gods is within the artifex, artifexa, that is, the only temple of the deities is the magician, the epopteion, the seer, there, there — all the change happens.

I usually use two simple techniques. One is a performative art, a dance offering, a ritual offering, a ceremonial offering, the invocation of an illusion that is a gesture of gratitude to give something of mine to the powers that be. The other is more complex, requiring focused concentration and samadhi-like states that I call „voidwork," pulling myself out of phenomenal states and then focusing my attention on the appropriate spheres and stars that correspond to my intention, sometimes rising from a temple in the stars that I have imagined and built for this very purpose. I can assume that the effect is almost immediate, or it takes a few minutes when the planetary sphere is above the horizon, the astral occult optics of the Arabs and the theory of „rays" is useful here. What we see is what we work with, when invisible, take my word for it, it is either a question of trust or wise faith that is based on reason and structured in a splendid theology. We can combine it with the correct hours and days determined by the planets because respect is given to these traditions, but what is an accurate and true calculation of the correct time and day is another aspect.

For example, when Mars is above in the eighth, divine house, strengthened by constellations and stars that have their own nature and mediated by the Moon and the lunar houses, which are often ignored and should not be, we begin our work! Lunar astrology is often forgotten. Let me remind you of the work of Alexandre Volguine from the 1930s, which is a good source. We can perform a dance, sing and chant, we can salute the Salian dancers of ancient Rome, we can use all our knowledge for a purpose, we can use gestures of restrained aggression, we can call for warrior skills in the Gigantomachia, warlike patience and wisdom, restraint of choler and aggression, imprint a warlike spirit in the Salian dances that shakes its ancilia, that is perfectly clear and uses aggression rarely, only when necessary, and is resilient and tough most of the time.

Then, then I see a bright red ghost flashing in the sky, or a winged warrior in red, the embassies are greeted, the diplomatic affairs well received! Do not call the embassies if you have no vision and no idea of what you want. Some spirits can be deceivers or tricksters and give you gifts for which you are not prepared to receive. You are at the mercy of the intelligences and it is up to them to decide if they want to work with you. What is of higher intelligence cannot be bound as some idiotes (Gr. Att. — unwise) magicians imagine — it is always free, rather you become the plaything of a demonic intelligence that allows you to shuttle a soul or familiar to fool you into a sense of control and power.

What is important here — do not fall for religion, religion is a slaughterhouse for the freedom of heaven, a blindfolded deception for mortals who do not have sharp enough minds to observe the diversity of nature, religion is an indispensable decoy for knowledge. By this I mean the non-solar religions, the Abrahamic religions — in the case of the latter, realization may be found, but these religions have always fought their mystics, magicians and seers, discarding them as heretics for destruction.

Pater Liber, Mater Victoria, what religions men have created in defiance of Heaven is ignored by the great spheres of the Celestial Mien. Like a lion acting according to its nature, the planetary intelligencers work in harmony with the nature of these planets, not according to the whims of mortals. Get to know the nature, and the purpose will follow. The Iamblichean dictum has thus come true: „Theology, religion and philosophy are all man-made, the eternal gods — never". Do not discard the wisdom that religious traditions convey, do not discard the techniques that they have to offer, but seek wisely and discerningly, both attributes grow with experience. Whenever you encounter religious illusions and impostors, cast them off as veils that seek to blind and cage you. Whenever the truth comes upon you, it is irreligious and gives freely from the treasury of the gods! Make your own religion from the experiences you gather, religere means something that delimits the sacred, hermeneueion is both the act of interpretation and the creation of boundaries. Go now, equipped with this knowledge, and act with reason, beauty, acumen and purpose!

Methods in Magick XVIII: The Glass Bead Game and the Language of Gods

We are soaked in a causative environment of events. Some of them may be visible, catch our attention, some are completely hidden from our perception and understanding. Yet, the general law is that all these events are somehow related causatively, meaning that events co-arise and co-depend on one another. This is a subtle yet profound law permeating the whole of universe. Synchronicities are acausal to the observer, yet they are strictly tied with causality at an a-perceptive level. Thus, they are not a-causal, but a-perceptive. The method proposed here is tied with adjusting the perceptive and a-perceptive networks of psychic events and modifying them consciously as to relate and reconstellate the processes that surround us. Learning a language is tantamount to using it fluently without worrying about the details of the process. All advanced magic is concerned with weaving such silent networks of ideas, visualizing and materializing them, sending them out and receiving them.

Mastering this silent, concentrated language is akin to mastering the „glass bead game." Once we master it, we merely learn new content, new knowledge to make the hermetic game more precise, beautiful and perfect, more objective and veritable. Whether we apply it in magick, or every day life and psychological and intellectual yoga, it may be of use. It is based on grammar of thought, which is utilizing modules of ideas and patterns of the mind to capture some hidden laws via tools of philosophical maths. You can call this method 'ideathics', if you like. Mathematics is a formal discipline and deals with consistent internal objectivity of its language. In contradistinction ideathics if a non-quantifiable conceptual formalisation of thought that like in Chaos Theory creates 'attractors', or 'magnets' that draws certain thought-patterns from the environment nearer to the attractor-structures. I conjured some examples to portray it better:

$$Re = \frac{In(Exp)}{Sc : MSc}$$

Re, Receptivity
In, Psychic inertia
In(Exp), Exposure to content in a state of inertia

Sc: Static Conditioned Experiential and Perceptive State

MSc: Momentary conditioned experiential and perceptive state

Receptivity equals inertia multiplied by exposure divided by conditioned state in proportion to momentary state.

Example I: Our receptivity to an advertisement is related to inertia of focus, and if we are continuously exposed to the advert the absorption is governed by our solid conditioned state (or the most 'continuous, permanent, immaleable' parts of our mind) in proportion to the momentary solid state (the state our mental continuum in its totality is in at every 'flash' of mental events distributed in time).

Example II: Receptivity to a servitor, or a shade of the dead is related to inertia of focus (ignorance/unawareness/indetection/mindlessness), and under exposure we are influenced (absorption) to an extent that our solid conditioned state allows (nature, inlination, character etc.), depending on the strenght of the occurence (exposure) in proportion to our momentary state (under influence/in a given psychological moment).

$$Vo = \frac{Af}{Sc \cdot Aw}$$

Vo, Volition
Af, Active Focus
Sc, Conditioned State
Aw, Awareness
Volition equals Active Focus (mindfulness, simultaneous engagement) in proportion to Receptivity, divided by momentary state multiplied by Awareness.

Example I: Highly focused concentration divided by Receptivity (or the inner psychic millieu and the environment) is divided our regular predispositions at the moment multiplied by awareness of the whole mesh and therefore may be adjusted accordingly by psychological, intellectual, energy and magickal techniques in the desired direction.

Mesh is the sum of all potentialities (pot) divided by occurence of actual events (rev, revealed), think Schrodinger's cat.

Ca, Causation,
Mesh, Topological space of entropically possible states
T, Time

Causation is the proportion between Meshes distributed accumulatively through time. Therefore, combining with the aforementioned patterns:

$$\frac{Re:Mesh}{Ca:Vo} \Rightarrow \frac{Vo:Re}{Ca:Mesh}$$

Receptivity in proportion to the Mesh networks, divided by Causation in proportion to volition proceeds that Volition in proportion to Receptivity is divided by Causality in proportion to Mesh.

There are endless possibilities here, quoting master Herman Hesse: „The Glass Bead Game is thus a mode of playing with the total contents and values of our culture; it plays with them as, say, in the great age of the arts a painter might have played with the colors on his palette. All the insights, noble thoughts, and works of art that the human race has produced in its creative eras, all that subsequent periods of scholarly study have reduced to concepts and converted into intellectual property — on all this immense body of intellectual values the Glass Bead Game player plays like the organist on an organ. And this organ has attained an almost unimaginable perfection; its manuals and pedals range over the entire intellectual cosmos; its stops are almost beyond number. Theoretically this instrument is capable of reproducing in the Game the entire intellectual content of the universe."

Methods in Magick XIX: Techniques of Ascension — on The example of the Mithraic Persian Cave

There are three kinds of ascension: one is that of a soul carried away to the higher spheres and to the stars, as in a narration in „Somnium Scipionis" by Cicero; the second is that of the spirit carried posthumously to its rightful domain after the Dionysian tomb — the body — has been left behind; and the third is an astral journey which takes place only during a ritual and is associated with ideas of ascension by similitude. I have encountered two types of ascension in my life, the first belonged to the ascent of the soul to the stars, the second was a complex ritual, a ceremony that tried to repeat the ascension in the sense of resemblance, as if repeating the steps of the soul. The third spiritual ascenscion posthumously is the crowning of the trismegistos and the latter means: descend in soul to the abyss (V.I.T.R.I.O.L), excel in life, ascend after the Herculean zodiacal task is done.

The rapture of the soul was mediated by a saturnine deity, Odin, and it happened in my dream. First I was questioned about my honesty and truthfulness, and when no fault was found, I found myself in the neighborhood of my childhood in Warsaw, with two golden disks spinning so fast that they represented a sacred sphere, attached to my head. Remembering earlier lessons of flying, that were part of my oneiric upbringing and curricula, I lifted my soul through the city, above it, into the clouds, through the atmosphere of the earth, passed through the planets of the solar system, and found myself flying at high speed through the stars. There I was suspended for a moment, watching everything with joy and delight. The Chaldean Yinges or sacred beings that carried my soul through the stars had golden wings, although I cannot remember if they had any human features. Most of the angeli bonum daimones and agathosdaimones I see with second sight look like a pair of wings or a sun disks with serpents and wings extending from them, they have no human features at all. I believe that the Egyptian, Babylonian and Zoroastrian reliefs they represent were chosen by the deities to be intelligible to me in their autophaneia (self-revelation). Whether these are their true forms I do not know, but they denote their existence, so there is no need to argue about it in the eyes of the beholder. Several times these deities incarnated in me, they fell like lightning into my body, my qi field became as big as districts, cities, not once I felt an armor and helmet when I met a Spartan king who had ascended centuries ago. So much for this report. I will focus on the ability that does not require the help of the gods, but the cooperation with them, ie. how to imitate this kind of ascension with a series of rituals, ceremonies and meditations, an artificial ascension of the spirit that, once trained, moves through all the spheres, visiting planets or distant stars, gathering everything there is to gather in order to train the mind and the soul and pave the way for the spirit to re-enter the divine realms once it is prepared.

For this purpose, I will use the analogy of the Persian, Mithraic cave. The womb of the cosmos is a cave, vesica pisces is the entrance to the Stella Regina, Isis. Isis is the follower of Osiris and the first star to rise after the Pleiades, Aldebaran, Osiris, Sirius, the Dog Stars, or Isis, Hieros Hieros. She is the helmswoman of the divine ship — why so? Because Isis, as the base of the Pythagorean triangle, represents the justice of the triad: Isis, Osiris, Harpocates (hypotenuse of the triangle) among the Ennead. We do not have to enter any artificial or other cave to do our tasks. When we are in a forest at night, the Mithraic cave is above us — by the stars, when we are in a room, we can pretend it is the cave. The principle is to restage the spatio-temporal dimension, transposing and interpreting it in both directions: The space of the ritual becomes the cosmic cave, the cosmic cave becomes the space. We can call it a fantasy, but with enough focus and depth of operation, the sacralized, consecrated area becomes the temple of the stars. We must not take it lightly, for to consecrate a place we must invite the spirits to perform this theurgic miracle for us, otherwise we are fools playing rituals to no effect — I have often been one to deceive myself, but when it began to work with the right intention, action, deed, preparation, then it began to work!

I used to play Gustav Holst's „The Planets" in the Mithraic order (Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Moon, Sun, Saturn), or in the heliocentric order. The reason for the Mithraic order was mystagogical, pneumagogical, not astronomically correct, but astro-mystically of great importance, like the sacred directions from which the souls enter from the Sun in Cancer (Cautes) and exit in Capricorn (Cautopates). How should we approach this ritual? After delineating and consecrating the sacred space, we initiate apotropaic and devotional rites to honor the gods. Then, with knowledge of the theological structure of a particular tradition, we conjure up a delicate structure that provides a scaffold for the operation. Sabotaging Leibnitz: What is not the words of Platonic ideas cannot be in the land of notions, what is not in the land of concepts cannot arise spontaneously in the intellect, what is not the senses cannot be in the mind, what is not in the mind cannot interlock with the intellect to enter the land of divine notions. Therefore, the theological structure must be present, educated, learned and reasoned, mature and strong, in order to arrive at works with the help of this structure. This structure is a form of coordinates in the dynamics of moving concepts that „fix" the content of our operation in forms. In a deeply concentrated meditation, in a performance of any kind, we represent planets, we invoke their intelligence, and we are both the subjects of their destiny and the designer. We follow their essence, imagine the attributes associated with them, wear their clothes, robes and symbols, ascend, request rites of passage, preparations — this is not without effect on our lives, someone who works with Mercury spirits and suddenly targets Saturn can be plunged into great suffering in real life. Be careful on these paths, because this is not a playground, but can ruin or enhance your life. It is of serious benefit to invoke these intelligent spirits of past people that they used to be, that is, in the case of Mithraic initiations: Corax (Mercury), Nymphus (Venus), Miles (Mars), Leo (Jupiter) Perses (Moon), Heliodromus (Sun), Pater (Saturn). Pay tribute to these before you. If you are dealing with the rank of Pater, you are dealing with great spirits, Marcus Aurelius was a Pater Patrum, a Golden Eagle in the Mithraic Mysteries. If you do not follow the chain of aetheric spiritual initiations, you may end up in the saturnine guidance and plunge headlong into existential hells, black melancholy, dark nights of the soul, it simply means that you were not prepared.

Let me give you an example in the form of a story I once left as a review of The Cult of the Black Cube by Arthur Moros:

> A man entered the temple of Saturn and demanded, „Give me all the gold you have." He was slain, disarmed, crucified and put on display, then quartered and burned to ashes.
>
> Another person, concerned about the cruelty, asked the priest, „Why?".
>
> The priest replied, „Because he wanted the gold without dying for it."
>
> The person asked, „Is he in Elysia, after all you killed him in the most cruel way".
>
> The priest replied, „When you die for things for which you are not prepared, the fates are particularly cruel".

The person asked again, „He wanted to be your acolyte", a disciple.

The priest answered: „Those who are not entitled to cross the threshold will be crushed at the mortuaries of the rings of Saturn".

The person asked another time, „Why did not you accept him?"

The priest replied, „Becoming an emperor and remaining an emperor is a difficult task, obtaining the gold depends on the constant appeasement of the lead"

The person asked, „What is the gold?

The priest took off his mask and revealed himself as Marcus Aurelius, Aurelion Thrion: „My friend, to enter the spheres of gold, you must defeat the wickedness of men, and you have passed the test, one head lost and beheaded, another worthy initiate saved, come join us!"

Methods in Magick XX: On Feasting with the Spirits

An important feature of the ceremonies and everyday exchanges with the spirits is that you share your life with them. They are everywhere, in the cities, in the forests, in the steppes. What inspired me to write this article is the following event: I smoked my cigarette outside (tobacco is my Mars addiction), I greeted the garden spirit, a little silver fae, a Sylven girl with whom I have a good rapport. She loves to sit on my shoulder, and I kiss her gratefully for taking care of the greenerie amidst the concrete and streets, human buildings and apartments. I returned to the seventh floor, caressed the ghost of a lady about 40 years old who greeted me in the elevator, she is a „host" of this building, and entered the flat in complete darkness. Shadows of people from the bygone Jewish ghetto watched me keenly, as did shrouds of people who lived in this neighbourhood and were given posthumously to this genius loci, one girl sent me a vision of German Nazi soldiers burning the whole place down with flamethrowers. Shards of memories that slip away. A demonic friend, a torn shadow with conspicuous broken claws greeted me, random souls of the living not fully aware of the spectacle beyond their vision „on the other side" and a vampiric living girl moving through the shadows with her shadow soul watched me, I winked at her.

I walked into the kitchen, past the bathroom, out of which grew a mask of the deceased, obviously not so restless as to occupy such an uncomfortable space. I reached for a soft drink from the fridge and noticed through the window that a small pitch black gargoyle was watching me. I raised my hand and invited him to sit on my arm, he immediately moved to the strategical position, I drank my soft drink and imagined the taste, then I projected the taste onto the miniature gargoyle so that he too would participate in the sensual feast. Synergy in conjuring sensual illusions is extremely important. If you are skilled, you can conjure up an entire feast of delicious foods for a cohort of demonic friends and sit down with them at banquets in this reality. This is important because in their reality, the food, the senses, the tastes, the smells, the satisfied hunger and thirst are real. I remember that once the soul of a hungry homeless man incarnated in me. I created a similar illusion for his soul and it was immediately satiated, perhaps the homeless man's existence did not become easier, he was still hungry and should be fed according to „Akkadian principles", or humane instincts, but his soul was uplifted. Note that synergy works in two directions. It may be that an illusion is created for you or other mortals that you suddenly emit scent of roses to yourself and stink like faeces to others, or vice versa in various, mischevious or saintly combinations. Aghori's approach of overcoming indifference is commendable, otherwise you'll go insane.

Consecration is another matter, here we ask higher spirits, intelligencers, etc. to sacralize the food for the dead, the erynii and other souls so that they are truly „energised" for the purpose of accomplishment. Like the ancient epoptei, the sages of the Eleusinian mysteries, who soothed, liberated or put to rest the dead, they used specially prepared foods, they were feasts of the living in which the dead participated. And how? By using the senses of the living, they could taste, sense, see, feel again. This is especially important on the boundary days, such as All Saints Day, when the Thanatos veils thin and the second-sighted see the dead walking among the living again. Are the dead something better than the living? They know more, but they are like in the novella „Bobok" by Fyodor Dostoevsky, where the recently dead fight in the cemetery as if there were no tomorrow. What Catholic priests essentially do in cemeteries, if they are skilled, is „lay down the dead" or put their shadows to sleep so they do not bother the living — of course, the clergy are not skilled in necromancy, and most of these shadows walk the earth or linger wherever their inclinations take them. I was involved in a ceremony to „lay down" the shroud of a serial killer hung in a different city, when death sentence was not under moratorium in communist Poland, who plagued me with thoughts of cruel misogyny, rapes and violence. As I prepared a doll, honey and wine to send him to sleep in a nearby forest at night, a miracle occurred — he was freed along with all the women he had murdered. The story is retold elsewhere with precision.

Theories in Magick and Heathen Theology

Theories in Theology: On the Mandate of Heaven, bringing the Gods closer to Earth

> „Master all threads by a single means, each sword for another weaving, a movement of ten thousand swords, cut every Gordian knot, leave nothing untouched, in unison they fight in a learned way".

— Saturnin

> "Self-cultivation leads to the interiorization of social and ritual values ... It consists of an ever-ascending path wherein one's basic vital energy (qi) is transformed into quintessential energy, or vital essence (jing 墜), which is itself, in turn, converted to spiritual energy, or Spirit (shen 塺) ... [These texts were] like a declaration of independence of the human mind from divinatory procedures ... and an affirmation of personal power over one's surrounding objective conditions."

— Romain Graziani on Self-Cultivation in Lagerwey, John, and Marc Kalinowski, eds. Early Chinese Religion, Part One: Shang through Han (1250 BC-220 AD) (2 vols.), (Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 31 Oct. 2008), p.14

The development of all earthly theology, the development of the perception of the gods, the forms of worship and understanding should not discredit the divine, but should be understood as a magical technology that various forces from the divine fields, some individualised as „masks of E Pluribus Unum", others separated, and still others so uniform and unique that it is difficult to say anything about them, connected and considered each other in order to arrive at an order, a tradition (the Chinese concept of „li") that guaranteed and maintained the social order. In this order were found freedom and eudaimonia.

> "(...) Justice has been cast out, and evil is inside the shrine. The designs of the gods are disturbed, and their perquisites are passed over. The land is in dire state. Mourning is everywhere. Towns and districts are in lamentation. All alike are grief stricken. The back is turned on anything of worth; the tranquil are distressed. Troubles occur daily, and the face shrinks from what is about to happen. I will say my say about it, for my limbs are heavy laden. I am distressed in my heart, and it is painful to hide my thoughts about it. Although another heart would break, a stout heart in a difficult situation is the companion of its master. O would that I had a heart / that knew how to suffer. Then I might alight, and I would load it with phrases of misery, and I might drive off to it my suffering. He said to his heart: Come now, my heart, that I may converse with you and you may answer me my sayings, that you may interpret for me that which is throughout the land, for those who were radiant (in white garments) have been cast down. I am thinking about what has taken place. Misery is ushered in / today. By the morning the strangers have (still) not passed away. Everyone is silent about it. The entire land is in a serious plight, and there is nobody free from wrong: all people alike do it. Hearts are dejected. The one who gives commands / is (now) one to whom commands are given, and the hearts of both are quieted. One rises to these things daily, and hearts have not thrust them aside. Yesterday's state is like today's, because of the passing by of many things. The countenance is perplexed. There is no man wise enough to know it, and there is no man angry enough to speak out. Every day one wakes to suffering. Long and burdensome is my suffering. There is no strength for the wretched to rescue him from one stronger than him. Silence about what is heard is painful. It is miserable to have to give an answer / to the ignorant. To oppose a speech makes for disaffection. The heart cannot accept truth. A reply to a speech is insufferable. All a man wants is his own talk. Everyone is based in crookedness. Precision in speech is abandoned. I speak to you, / my heart, that you may answer me. Yet a heart which is appealed to can> not be silent. The needs of a servant are like those of a master. Plentiful (now) are the things which weigh upon you."

Let me first define the mandate of heaven (tianming) and sons and daughters of heaven (tianzi): It is a state in which human rulers are close to high perfection, a reified metaphysics of divine laws that contains qualities correlated with the objective, passionate eternal dynamic that affects individuals who mastered themselves in self-rule, and act seamlessly as expressions of the divine impulse, thus ruling together with the gods, as midwives between gods, earth, and men, from whose radiance dominion flows like a fountain of wisdom, righteousness, and magnanimity to the peoples. Whether we believe the stories of pharaohs who ruled together with Horus the Elder or Chinese emperors who ruled together with Tien (Heaven) and the Dragon Gods (Long Wang) is a question that can only be answered by those who have had wise insight into these processes to arrive at a proper understanding. In this sense, magicians are themselves cultivated Wu, Xi (shamans).

When the rulers and the people turn away from the gods and honesty, they repeat the narratives of the chaosmos among themselves, their legitimacy is an empty formality, and the divine impulse withdraws, it is no longer among them. We can say that there were pharaohs who were really divine and ruled together with Horus, and those who were such only in name, this can be said of all human rulers. Their characteristics and their nature, the effect they achieved, are the most important indicator. Both the sages and the rulers, the humans, when they turn away from the divine rite, from seeking of truth (philosophy), transform from semi-divine mortals back into animals, some into beasts, others into lesser demons.

They choose an aphrodisiac, generative world and destroy it, under exploitation and unjust orders they destroy each other. In the course of time, borrowing from a Sufi parable, they forget the seafaring people they once were, that is, the state of perfection of their ancestors, and they have ended up in a lackluster world of surrogates as prisoners of the present. They decide not to exit Plato's cave, but to find exits in the labyrinths of its catacombs and come to terms with this as a normal state. In the Dharmic narratives, they are like trapped children who are thrown into the black sea of tar and sink deeper and deeper. Breaking out of the Black Iron Prison is the first step, a cognitive discarding of the delusion about conventional reality, to use Nagardjuna's words. A cognizant and balanced progress towards Eleusia is another matter and requires hard work, commitment, experience, rite and ceremony, calling and receiving, educating oneself, struggling with active deceivers, while at the same time preserving one's basic means of existence — a job, an equilibrium, perhaps a family, preservation of the senses and sanity, at least we do not want to end up on the street, in prison or in a psychiatric ward.

Let us not forget in an idealistic way that the great mass of humanity was not supreme, but it had a set of coordinates to strive for, in the words of Joan Palevsky, „Many textbooks on the religions of the world should be entitled The Religious Life of Noble Persons" (Laine James W. 2014. Meta-Religion: Religion and Power in World History. Oakland, CA: University of California Press, p. XII, preface). The given tunnel reality, superstructure of ideas, belief systems in the Noosphere directly impact the health and outcomes of entire civilizations. We cannot say, „People are bad, but religions are good." It is the religion itself, the worldview, the politeia, the values, the traditions, the technology that determines the outcomes, within such a phenomenon there are holy men and scoundrels, but it is the fabric of the many, the people in droves working within such a framework that shows what it is really worth in stage-wisdom and historical effects, present and future events and outcomes in motion. That is why, for example, it is not a „Western Christian civilization," when it comes to Europe, but a „post-Enlightenment Graeco-Roman, revitalised, technological civilization, with a retrograde Judeo-Christian grip on its throat and relativized individualistic chaosphere of both kitsch and beauty, art and science." This definition excludes a variety of other issues, but it is meant to illustrate that civilization is not monolithic, not in these times, but is a process with many aspects functioning in unison or in complete confusion of memetic noospheric warfare.

We are all the people of Ik, if we were to be robbed of our technology at this time by a major catastrophe, such as a powerful solar CME that would damage it. The human world was designed not to survive impending catastrophes but to maximize profit, not to be decentralized in a mutually supportive web of logistics, energy security, population security, food security, knowledge, education, and skills, but to concentrate power houses and networks of power-wielders that are by and large mismanaged and largely inefficient in times of crisis. Controlling the populace via social engineering, surveillance, draconian laws doesn't change the situation, in the long term it worsens it — the damage in the noosphere is done since decades, carry on. At these levels of high entropy, negentropy begs to dismantle a largely unstable system by the „invisible and unseemly hand," and the gods have nothing to do with it.

Well, who are the Ik people?

> The Ik are a people of northern Uganda who live at what must surely be the extreme of deprivation and disaster. A largely hunting and gathering people who have in recent times practiced some crop planting (...) [They are] (...) a morbidly fascinating case of collapse in which a former, low level of social complexity has essentially disappeared. Due to drought and disruption by national boundaries of the traditional cycle of movement, the Ik live in such a food- and water-scarce environment that there is absolutely no advantage to reciprocity and social sharing. The Ik, in consequence, display almost nothing of what could be considered societal organization. They are so highly fragmented that most activities, especially subsistence, are pursued individually. Each Ik will spend days or weeks on his or her own, searching for fo- od and water. Sharing is virtually nonexistent. Two siblings or other kin can live side-by-side, one dying of starvation and the other well nourished, without the latter giving the slightest assistance to the other. The family as a social unit has become dysfunctional. Even conjugal pairs don't form a cooperative unit except for a few specific purposes. Their motivation for marriage or cohabitation is that one person can't build a house alone. The members of a conjugal pair forage alone, and do not share food. Indeed, their foraging is so independent that if both members happen to be at their residence together it is by accident. Each conjugal compound is stockaded against the others. Several compounds together form a village, but this is a largely meaningless occurrence. Villages have no political functions or organization, not even a central meeting place. Children are minimally cared for by their mothers until age three, and then are put out to fend for themselves. This separation is absolute. By age three they are expected to find their own food and shelter, and those that survive do provide for themselves. Children band into age-sets for protection, since adults will steal a child's food whenever possible. No food sharing occurs within an age-set. Groups of children will forage in agricultural fields, which scares off birds and baboons. This is often given as the reason for having children.

Although little is known about how the Ik got to their present situation, there are some indications of former organizational patterns. They possess clan names, although today these have no structural significance. They live in villages, but these no longer have any political meaning. The traditio> nal authority structure of family, lineage, and clan leaders has been progressively weakened. It appears that a former level of organization has simply been abandoned by the Ik as unprofitable and unsuitable in their present distress (Turnbull 1978). Tainter Joseph A. 2017. The Collapse of Complex Societies. Cambridge University Press. pp. 17—18

With these thoughts, I leave you with questions and no readily-served answers, only bigots have them.

Theology and Metaphysics of the Sun, the Kingdom of Phoenixes and the Divine Fire

> „Whatever words we use for the divine are tainted with an inner understanding. When we speak of things intelligible, we indulge in a Socratic irony, in which subjects which ought not to be spoken of and written down must necessarily be so, otherwise they are lost, unexplained, and those who have an inner eye to read them will recognize them at once, those who have no wisdom will fall prey to their prejudices, and the great majority of mankind will not even attempt to approach either words, or hearing, or wisdom, or the truth of the inner eye."

> — Saturnin

The physical, objective universe is explored, there are physical laws, this is a conception of a category of the indivisible whole that applies. Another such category is „meta-physical", which are „hidden auxiliary laws" — most of what we do not know about the world. Imagination can enter very strange realms here, but the point is to determine the concepts that are correct, using the faculties that are considered metaphysical, abstract, or intellectual.

In this approach, I will try to derive the metaphysical properties of Helios, the visible Sun, and exclude Aion (third transcendent) and Hyperion (second transcendent) from the physical and pneumatic properties, which are a meta-proclivity, so that the Sun, as one star among countless other stars in all their possible types, can have its own „Karman" in the world of changes and movement. This can be said of any inanimate object, but there is a difference between a piece of material substance, from which nothing emerges except the change of its substance within its possibilities, and the sun, from which an entire habitable system emerges. Here Karman is understood as an inclination to change and transformation with its pertaining characteristics based on the essence, substance and nature of a given thing. As a divine intelligence, the Sun can be autophanic, self-identical, self-manifesting, and its intellect should relate to all the axioms on which it is based in order to be integral.

We can think of it as a highly complex geometric sphere in motion, where its core, layers, coronal mass ejections, hypergranulation, thermonuclear events, radiation et al. are a „shadow" of its philosophical essence from the physical perspective, being absolutely inseparable in this respect. What is at play here is the magnitude of the effects that the philosophical essence produces in manifested reality. Otherwise, every solar flare would be considered an act of an „angry God" in which an anthropocentric infantile fetish tries to seek meanings where there are none. Yet, we should not shallow down the philosophical essences to near-physical processes in the process of reification, they inter-penetrate each other in pockets of entropy in topological spaces, conceptually speaking, but the philosophical, intellectual essences hold the higher ground, as they are qualitatively rectified to suit the purpose — all magical, mystagogic, pneumagogic, intellectual, Apollonian, Heliotic endevaours in which we may engage. The intelligibility between the philosophical Sun and mortal is most entwined between the inner eye and pneuma, here rational thinking and order out of chaos arises, it appeals to logic, prudence and purity and stands for reason, for fierce truth and honesty, it is „as evident as the Sun". Like the Akkadian kings, who were lion-headed and serpent-tongued, it smites with Divinity.

The sum of its divine presence is derived from the attributes and properties of the whole, insofar as we can pneumatize and hypostatize the observable processes, while using metarhetoric to return from the physical to the divine in order to arrive at certain premises. Conversely, we derive the physical from the divine, and in this inductive-deductive feedback loop we attempt to determine the characteristics of the Sun God.

Let us think of „dead, lifeless matter" made of elements, which through a complex transformation over billions of years becomes life and inhabits our planet. In contrast, the Sun is the first foundation stone of life on Earth, it already contains a potential „blueprint", from the totality of its potentiality an actuality arises, it too is made of elements available in the cosmos, and there is a mystery here of atavistic generation and re-generation. The serpent's egg (the universe's hyliotic elements) generate the intellect (the sun) and the intellect (the sun) generates the offspring (life). From a strictly linear view of causality and effect, this is an incomplete description, so this process can be co-dependent and co-emergent, representing a seamless flash of events that are uninterrupted. The philosophical sun must draw its intellect from the essences, be it Anima Mundi or transcendent realms in order to envelop itself in the hyle, and order and repel the chaos of forms (the Tiamatic Black Sun aspect) and so it already contains the divine seeds.

So much for „matter", here appear the divine philosophical essences that contain all the potentials that can become a reality under the right conditions, for example, life, if you take evolutionary biology (evo-devo) further, where a bauplan is necessary. I am not presupposing an omniscient demiurge here, but built-in rules of the game that are pneumatized, the self-generated divine is, but it plays its own game because the rules limit it and make it divine, a holy serpent would not hatch from the cosmic egg otherwise.

Apart from the occult factor, the sun was often represented in Egypt as „the great eye," and among the Chaldeans also as the „corridor of fire," in the latter case as the gateway for souls and spirits from third transcendent realms to the phenomenological world. The development of the optical faculty in animals would be neither possible nor necessary without the sun. The sun is the observer of its own perspective, because it „made" us« to observe it and to develop organic abilities to see. Here no valuation is necessary, the superior policy of the sun is the essence of our existence. To see the light of the sun with our eyes means to reflect the star »biologically« or »physically«, to reflect the divine intellect means to »see it „intellectually and pneumatically".

Intelligence, or rather intellect, is often associated with the ability to think and feel, for which a brain or mind is required. Let us leave this common sense aside for a moment and think of the solar intellect as a non-animal, non-human intellect, a great mind that contains Platonic ideas, which in the philosophy of mathematics are called types and are therefore eternal, their representations are transient tokens. How does it contain these ideas? They are a manifestation of the syntax and grammar of the deep laws of the universe. Are they ordinary ideas, as if I would think „the idea of freedom"? No, they are the crystallization, a sublimation of simplicity into multiplicity, which have their own characteristics, geometrical, intellectual, full of inclination, nature, ethos, pneumatism, which show and manifest themselves in reality.

Human imagination and conception processes all possible and impossible worlds, that is, ideas can draw from an infinite library, but an infinite library is only partially meaningful. If we command a monkey to type infinitely, it will eventually write a great novel in one of the possible worlds.

This book written by a monkey represents the idea of a notion, that is, the place where human imagination and intellect coincide with these objectively valid truths or approximations to these truths of the universe.

For too, in the sun, there is singularity and multiplicity, individuality and collectives, its servants and midwives, its angelic host, its spiritual intelligencers and a magnanimous choir of Divinity, it manifests as a wigned Sun-Disk interlaced by twin Ureic serpents, in continuous motion through the galaxy, it has its home in yet higher, Divine fire, wherein it rests, after the weigh of matter and chaos destroys it.

Theories of Magick: Second Sight and the Web of Indra

This chapter is dedicated to Isis, Hieros Hieros, who gave me the second sight of the divine realms after countless years of only being able to see the shadows of the dead, the black earth and the physis-chtonic daimons.

As rational creatures, we may have experiences beyond normal perception, and since we are bound by world-interpreting interfaces, sensory perceptions, and aggregates through which we grasp reality, we can only test as much reality as we can perceive, understand, interpret, and aggregate into patterns. We are not infallible, and this is quite a pioneering field, the understanding of which is prone to error and risk of misinterpretation. Please keep that in mind and read on calmly and with an open mind, yet critically. There is no model or narrative that can perfectly describe reality, this is merely a negotiated frame of reference, a kind of measurement limited by the tools at my disposal, do not let the tools distort the overall picture.

These experiences may not be reproducible and vary from consciousness to consciousness and mind to mind, which is not wholly interpretable through itself. I personally believe that consciousness must undergo several anomalies of perceptual shifts during and after magical operations, whether it is a recalibration of the soul descending into Tartarus, or a change in perceptual attitude (the Egyptian hieroglyph „sia" meaning perception, was the basis for magical operations) and the deprogramming of conditioned and socialised scripts, and this is not a process that is easy — the breaking of conditioned scripts and the shifting of perception releases bundles of energy that can exert mental pressure and pain. The psychic agony involved in reprogramming civilization-programmed perception when encountering irregularities and anomalies is not to be taken lightly. Perhaps a minor rewiring in the brain is also the reason, although it is more likely that consciousness is modulated as a field of interactions and changes by the mind, and a brain is merely an interpreter, switchboard and reducer of reality, immersed in the wholeness that is available for understanding of our species.

Types of vision in Second Sight Siddhi

Regular optical vision (what you see is what you get... or what you believe is what you measure):

Open eyes:

Dependent on intelligent manifestations, the energy-field shifts that feed stimuli signals into the brain interpreter re-linked via consciousness (Ayna) and decode the shadow, shape and/or color of an entity in auto-phaneia (self manifestation); Either true forms of an entity are encountered, or a decoy mask of it, a macabresque demon may decide to polymorph into a beautiful woman. It may also choose to pick a form that is intellgible, for example traditional Goeteia forms, in order to be recognized. Four dimensional distributions are encountered (time+coordinates), as well as five-dimensional distributions (time+coordinates+non-place), in the second case, the coordinates can seemingly be fixed at the time of seeing, but in retrospect the image cannot be accurately located in 3D, only the vector of motion can be traced, or the entity is generating its intelligible form either from a diffrent loci than it is occupying, or it is an auto-phaneic excerpt of a greater force that decides to minimize itself to the perceivable, intelligible form that a mortal may recognize. This is commonly known as clairvoyance, or second sight, seeing the invisible world under normal conditions. The scope of seeing is depending on the registries into which the consciousness is keyed, therefore a broader spectrum covers more entities that are noticed vis a vis Aetheric sight, for example.

Closed eyes:

Mode 1: Seeing in energy, or detecting energy changes, flows, and vortices that are normally interpreted as black and white shapes on the closed eyelid screen. One can expect to see one's own hands as enegry-imprints in silver-white among darkness, although the eyelids are closed. Seeing demonic and dead forms in true forms is henceforth called Thanatos-sight.

Mode 2: Seeing in color or bardo, where the flow of shapes, colors and forms are condensed into manifestations of entities. The process is mining the image base of the unconscious and at the same time provides the temporary forms, colors and shapes of the near zone (or the tunnel to which one is connected). That is why it is crucial to keep a minima of aesthetics when feeding the mind with imagery that may be used by entities to manifest, for example if you watch horrors and a malignant entity will attach, it will go to every extent to trouble you with such oneiric images. They should not be given objective reality, not because they may not exist, but because the visions that dominate the meditator „multiply entities beyond necessity" instead of filtering more reliable input and redirecting the focus to transcend these conjured „realities" instead of being fixated on them. Notice that you may be pulled into various dimensions vis a vis hypnosis, vortex-pull, and then view them, consciously entering them, or being forced to.

Inner Insight: A visualized or conjured image projected onto the inner mental screen and held in the mind in the closed and open eyes mode. The visualized image may or may not be rewritten and translated into the Mode 2 of Closed-eye vision, but it generates mental energy that is readable and accessible to any dimension/entity that resonates with it. That is: a visualized image captured on the mental screen may or may not appear on the clear illusory bardo plane with eyes closed. Nevertheless, it is comprehensible to certain dimensions/entities because the bardo level feedback appears whether or not the image itself appears on a coupled mental screen with eyes closed. Therefore, whatsoever we imagine, get a subtle materialization in the mental sphere, and when it is charged, it goes astral projected into a world, dimension, subtle reality that we broadcast to.

Depth modes (emergent order)

Phosphenic regression:

Reversal of the light signal introjected from the moving synergetic images of reality from the previous modes of vision in form, shape and colour clarity. As photic energy normally moves outward and generates feedback signals, it encounters the electromagnetic spectrum and the gross plane that reifies the exoterra in a way that a naive realist grasps the world. This is the habitual way of seeing for most people, when the moving synergetic images are not reified and we shift the focus to the inner seeing, which is Ayna-consciousness or Omega-consciousness, that refocuses on the scenery of the frequencies of the emanations in which it is interwoven (the „keying", my vortex is red-green-yellow-black, it used to be bright yellow-blue in the middle of the spectrum) and the signal of the energy begins to move through the ocular nerves via Ayna and meet the content of the visual core, and then completing the environment by descending and bypassing the moving images through expansion (diving deep down to see the expanded above, short-circuiting the regular blueprint of vision), it builds up the energy of pure consciousness expanding from a highly condensed form, bypassing regular perception into information-variable fields that are interpreted by the human aggregates to the best of their ability. It is therefore an act in which all the mental energy invested in the external or sense consciousness is withdrawn and reinvested into internalized Ayna-consciousness.

Staging of Sight in Intensity:

Threshold 1: Clear flow on the Bardo level, entities are recognised with greater precision as they can be seen clearly

When the Threshold 1 is penetrated successfully:

Threshold 2: Space breakthrough when not clogged with black and white noise (jamming of unknown source); multiple tunnels layered in image vessels appear as a kaleidoscopic warp moving with the spirit through the tunnel of cosmic space, repeated flashes appear during the journey that are "hopping" points of unknown units of distance, faster than the speed of light.

Two modes of Threshold 2:

I. Astral Telepathy: Interstellar warping or travelling through the universe, communicating with a calibrated zone by points of focus, for example electromagnetic transcription of star phantoms, that appear as tunnels and lightning. Random experiments led to trafficking wit foreign entities (sometimes leading to incarnation). Everything from wyrd input (identified as non-organic frontier system species) to communication with beings capable of incarnation into the humanoid nervous system, who hold themselves quite well and communicate through energy or highly abstract ideas translated into energy, and human-aggregated information is intelligible when translated back and forth into energy, as if the contents of the human mind and emanating fields were immediately known as information. I've encountered both species superior to humans, but completely benevolent, and species that attempt to forcibly adapt the human body as their host (infectious), both "getting" the human nervous system and others, completely weird attempting to "read it" to no avail. Note, once contact is made, it is not lost, we can recreate experiments for a time. Thereafter, by regular vision, constellations can be communicated with, if the consciousness triggers work, an entity can incarnate from afar with its soul, or communicate with astral telepathy in its own ways. If a constellation about 360 light years away can be contacted in a few seconds, then the speed of communication via Omega-channels cancels the speed of light and is only limited by the speed of though traveling through cosmic aethyr (quantum teleportation of information?). Remnants of Supernova in Cassiopeia A (as experiment) 11 000 light year away was reached and remotely viewed within a matter of seconds. Intelligible technological transfers and genetic modules broadcasts may occur, although they would have to be recorded from the visual cortex.

II. Dimensional warping, instead of travelling through space-time, the mind starts to interpret signals from the deep-web of the syntax of cosmoi, but staging is necessary from Threshold 2, otherwise the Bardo level is not left. Note that space is also abolished here; one can communicate in depth planes that shrink the observation point of universe expansion when one encounters a multiversal plane (from what I observed there is only one universe, but parallel dimensions within it are close to infinite) — in the sense that any part of the physical universe can be contacted from this plane, although this is not controlled by the operator, or I lack talent, but a free fall and dependent on the mediating Deities or dimensional nodes- anomalies seem to be a-deterministically causal, but so far removed from human perception of causality that it seems like synchronistic chaos moving through different levels of pockets of entropy in topological spaces. Depending on the connected dimensions (seen as colors), the entities and representative contents interweave in more advanced forms until they become a „living grid" of geometric structures (the color spectrum and Pythagorean geometry; the green dimensions are more disorganised or diversified and complex, the yellow-blue dimensions are less diversified and more unified).

Gardens of Edin, Obaron's place,
The smallest of forest spirits,
Gives you thy name,
How can you reach for the stars,
If you don't applaud the little wise game?

Theories of Magick: Tribalism and Individuation, or Thoughtforms and Egregors

Denkforms are treated in this briefing as thought forms, subtle emanations of the mental field around the human mind, read by telepaths, mentats, „the other side." By necessity this brief is one-aspected and does not entail majority of other models to explain a whole, but far from dilletant, its duty is focus on a figment of the whole which it attempts to describe. Thought forms can take as many forms as there are modalities and functions of the human mind. For example, the simplest thought form is verbalization of the thought „Here be dragons." The most complex and sophisticated thought forms are generated by silence and synergy, poli-syntaxed, multi-level, polisemous, multi-contextual, masked, disguised, encoded, encrypted, ciphered, psychosomatically programmed — a ritual dance could be an example, astralistically transmitted to the receiver as a message.

Egregors can be a common denominator of collectives of two or more mental spheres of people. They interpenetrate each other, depending on the koinonia (togetherness) or ideatic ecclesia. That is, they are extracted and emancipated as the character or ethos of a particular egregor within the boundaries of the mental sphere. It can be a biopsychological egregor, an instinctive egregor, such as fear or arousal, it can be a sophisticated ideological egregor, for example authoritarianism or anarchism, it can be religious, for example Christian or Buddhist, an occult egregor, e.g. Fraternitas Saturni or Ordo Templi Orientis, a linguistic egregor, e.g. the way we express ideas, it can be a cultural egregor, e.g. nation, collectivity of ethnic identities and related behaviors and mentalities, etc.

Unknowingly associating with an egregore by mixing with people who have similar arrangements of thought forms is often the case with people who are neither mature nor have developed autonomy and critical thinking, with a weak resistance to the submissive influence of foreign egregors, which ends in the absorption of mental-ideatic clusters in one's own mental sphere, according to the law of distribution. This law states that each egregor, thought form, and idea will be distributed differently according to the cognitive topological spaces of each mind, according to their phenotyping and liminal entropy, their resilience of liminal absorption threshold, and their critical breakthroughs in resilience to conditioning. Therefore, they will be interpreted differently when translated into the language of persona and what follows — interpreted.

Egregors can intermingle, and the result is multiple, changing constellations of mental fields in mutual dynamics and interdependencies. Consciously connecting with a group egregor helps to attune to a particular working group, whether in magical work or in ceremonial affinity with a larger group of participants. Conversely, we can be ritually indoctrinated into an egregore, be it a cult, a blind religion, a political ideology, or sealed into an egregore, for example, through „baptismal mark" and the like.

Egregors can be protected by their own mental field, by entities charged with their protection, and by their own power, or by people and entities charged with working on the egregore. It may be that unlicensed or other entities and persons plug in under the given egregore and, during its operation, imprint the egregore with their own mental cuts and polishes, or root or camouflage themselves in it. Some egregors are programmable, e.g. those of the scientological sect (Dianetics), Jehovah's Witnesses, fundamental evangelical groups, various New Age movements, deliberate social engineering of sections of society via the media, infotainment or computerized cybernetics-radionics propagated via the „eight-sphere" of radio communications and frequencies compatible with the resonance of human brains.

People with great willpower, high resistance to conditioning and magnetism can either survive the onslaught of indoctrination and brainwashing or influence many people through their charisma — whether they are right or wrong, whether they spread harmful nonsense or realized ideas, they can dominate group egregore and consciously or unconsciously implant their own mental sphere programming in other group egregore. In working ethics, it is crucial not to interfere in the mental sphere of others, others will meddle with yours, but punitive and retaliatory action is a separate chapter. This is also related to the soul sphere, because the soul is often a passive recipient of thought forms, emotive-cognitive content and egregors, think of imprints or engrams. Conduct your communications carefully. People who are susceptible to manipulation should arm themselves with methods that help them recognize their own autonomy, become self-aware, and understand their own position and relationship to other people, ideas, and the world.

Some people, and certainly those who are „on the other side" together with entities, can read parts of the information from the mental sphere. Therefore, it is beneficial to train synthetic languages and methods of encryption, as well as to camouflage the declared intentions under and outside the subliminal fields to avoid trying to decode them. Sometimes, frankly, openness is recommended, because a fortified citadel is just inviting to be besieged and conquered. But in all major magical operations, it is advantageous to scramble or operate on a plane that is inaccessible to „the other side" but overt to larger powers, at least the parts we want to get away with and avoid detection.

On an individual level, i.e. personal privacy, inner silence is recommended, while we can work with non-verbal ideas, mentalese, idea constructs, motives, inclinations, which have enough individual imprints to be undecipherable by the majority of uninvoked entities and human magicians. Mind scrambling is a useful technique where we create a false facade, a false identity, deceptive communication where we communicate only the parts of ourselves that we want to convey, or create illusory masks that are a form of defensive disinformation, misinformation and denial of information.

Candor is only useful in direct communication, and even then, when „everything has eyes and ears," we can play openness and use double or triple speak to convey false information to the „other side" while withholding true information from our interlocutor. We should often think about „what would normal people do to us if they knew the content of our thoughts if it became public knowledge". The same method is applied to the „other side", cautiously, harshly, firmly, in a Machiavellian (or rather legalistic Han Feizian, that was Machiavellan seventeen centuries before Machiavelli) way, openly when necessary.

From my experience I have come to the conclusion that Great Forces, and we are dealing here with High Magic, with which we work during the ceremonies, recognize the true intentions and contents anyway, even if they are veiled to unauthorized persons and entities.

The methods are as old as the African shamanic masks, which were meant to imitate the nature spirits, to be one of them, so that the soul totem of the wild beast, the sorcerer, the daimon is tamed, and to disguise our own intentions, because when we hide behind a mask, we separate the space of the known (profane) from what belongs to the spirits (sacred) and to the uncanny (terra incognita). Children have a similar method when they say, „I am not here," in the ritualization of their theater they disappear into their environment, playing hide and seek or throwing away the toy, they play little magicians banishing the toy — it disappears. This is essentially how it is when

I know my friends" children, who scatter their toys in the abysses of treasure troves that are so difficult for adults to discover.

When we move through the streets among anonymous people, we dehumanize them a little by the force of our habit, they never receive the masks of closeness, of proximity, of intimacy, the Other is a little distant, the shared glances are devoid of content, they are at least phatic, if something catches our attention they can be erotic, or at most magnetic. Nevertheless, there is no engagement here that exists between acquaintances, relatives or close friends.

Many contexts of exchange in the sphere of anonymity can be expressed in intentions connected with the superficial interpretation of the other — a flirtatious look, an aggressive gesture, indifference, the game of gestures belongs to the refined, the apparent gestures belong to the vulgar and immature, it is still — another game of appearances and „as if's". The ancient Hindi dance theater was refined in the use of gestures that are not known in the vulgar Western societies.

The interpretation of gestures is a matter of consent in anonymity. The more subtle gestures are rarely noticed or misinterpreted, the absence of gestures can be mistaken for a gesture, the obvious ones are quickly grasped. I have experimented a lot with indifferent observation, that is, taking myself out of the context of gestures as if I did not notice them, and closely observing the behavior of the people around me. I have found that when they lack feedback, when they can not see themselves reflected in you, whether subconsciously or overtly, they become agitated because their ever-changing monkey brains demand input so they can respond. It is hard to treat the other stranger, the xeno, as something different, it is a treat for your own movements, gestures, perhaps something fascinating, something you make fun of, something you fear but rarely approach.

When we get to know a person, we enter an imaginary virtuality of a „sphere of koinionia", in the realm of knowledge. By establishing a contact, having a conversation, we deepen this virtuality. When we shape interpersonal relations in the way that is most useful or amiable to us, we do not feel that our privacy is being revealed, that we must jovially divulge any information — instead, we rattle masks, narratives, small talk, deep conversations, showing a greater or lesser part of our authenticity or false masks, their variations and metamorphoses. In the end, no one knows who we are — and this is a fait accompli, because some circles are so damaging that they should not know, it can lead to gossip and reputational damage that is not our fault, but these people were never of high character. In the end, those who should know see a holistic being that we wanted to portray — and this is another achievement — and find a circle of friends here.

Sometimes it is impossible to create a facade for our person, but the more skillfully we master our being, the better we succeed in communicating important things we want to pass on, be it ideas, self-expression, etc. I have dined with political officials and a president of a country and his wife (Komorowski) and charmed them all, I have been in low circles and seemed strong and tough, I have been among snobs and pretended to be a redneck to their disdain, I have been among smart people and had something graceful to contribute. When pigs rush in, despise them or you will lose your nature. Nothing is more annoying than pigs running around in the aethyrs — show them an ugly side and watch them rise in their own faeces, proud of themselves, what a sight! Remain a god among the gods.

Why did I write all this? Because it is beneficial to deal with thought-forms and group unity in a similar way. If we mingle with everyone, we become like a mob, we generalize, we lose our precious time, we charge spiritual spheres of people who are pathetic and would lose important expressions, we lose our inner truth and power that could be used by a parasitic egregor. We lose our nature and ethos among the pigs and forget that we were lions and dragons among them. When human resources are in constant derangement and our thought forms are in chaotic motion, it is difficult to achieve effective magical communication. Using Shannon and Weaver's theory of mathematical communication, one of the interfaces illustrates how we can achieve one goal by communicating from many transmitting sources, or how we can achieve many goals among many receivers by communicating with one source. The whole book is worth studying.

The rest is a matter of media selection, intent, dissemination, rhetoric, tools and algorithms of content delivery, its duration, continuity, strength, context appropriate to the audience, its substance, place value, status, interpretation, reception, discharge of the content to the final recipient according to a particular vision and its negotiation in unison. No one wants to pet people who choose to follow a will rather than take power over themselves into their own hands. No one is wasteful enough to educate complete fools — and yet you must guard against them. Stupidity is better controlled before it reaches for power.

By the time the mob appoints the pigs to the elite, it is far too late. Therefore, all egalitarian meritocracies, responsible freedom, paideic standards, institutional protection of the political systems, and aristocratic elites with the common good in mind should be protected as a priority from the abuse of power by the pigs of the various populist, autocratic, authoritarian, fascist, and theocratic regimes in order to maintain a republic of wise, strong, cultural, educated, and polite rule.

Theories of Magick: Necrodous, the Black Voyage. Theories of Death and Transmigration

Nature is an allegory of higher laws of the indivisible world.

> "Divinity doesn't contradict nature"

— Porphyrius Malchus.

Here I would like to reveal some secrets of death and the souls" sojourns, journeys and births in many worlds. I draw my knowledge from the strict observation of both the newly deceased who came to me to find a solution to their problems, and the dead pitch-black souls and the aetheric souls who stayed in the Aethyr. My means and methods of observation were second sight, inclusive of seeing the dead, as well as some interaction with them. First of all, I would like to present my conception of life and death. It resembles the Orphic dictum: „Bios, Thanatos, Bios" — there is a cycle of life and death, but from another perspective this is merely a continuity of existential and ontological threads woven into the fabric of the world that transcend both concepts. Nothing really dies, nothing is really born, everything reappears in the great samsaric cycles. Apart from the bestiaries of the world, the realms of Thanatos can be divided into many realms, just as the chthonic, plutonic and black demonic worlds can be divided into many other realms. To do justice to all the ethereal beings not mentioned here, I will focus only on human death, human transmigration, and simply exclude all other worlds involved in this process for the purpose of precision. This human-centred perspective should not be considered the only one. Interaction with animals, spirits, the dead, demons, elementals, angels, daimons, purified souls, heroes, demigods and deities (this model is solely referential) is a necessary ordeal to grasp most of the world that usually escapes human-centred perception.

I would like to start with several principles, so that it is easier to find your way in understanding later:

I. Individual consciousness, existential mind, individuated genii are tenanted from the indivisible world, which functions like a category in this indivisible world.

II. Each functional soul, and there can be several of them, specialized for different purposes, per individual, is a result of the evolutionary transformations of the indivisible world on the scale of flashes of events in time, its polifunctionality obeys the laws of the registers of the world to which it is tuned in synthesis and synthony. Thus, the historicity of the souls is connected with their transformation, and the human souls have evolved from the animal souls in great transmigration and metempsychosis. However, the human souls obey other laws due to their symbolic, self-reflexive cognitive apparatus that shapes the soul vis-à-vis the cognitive, affective, karmic, psychic and gymnosophic magical operations that the human aggregates possess. The interfaces of contact with the world, the sensory, cognitive-affective, mental, pneumatic and occult, psycho-pneumatic processes, the psycho-somatic and physiological processes cause that the initial syntax of the emotional-cognitive imprints, of the alchemical-magical transformations is different from that of the animals, which are specialized in other types of dynamics coming from nature. Animals possess souls, but they act according to their inner nature and their karman, their inclinations, when they are transferred and translated into the pnematic realms, the laws are similar but the dynamics are different.

III. The laws of the physical, objective universe are a category of the laws of the indivisible universe. To create a theory of everything on the basis of these laws is beyond the possibility of its categories. In other words, only the intelligible world is intelligible totally and is fully understood by itself.

IV. Deep and occult laws operate in the universe, of which the philosophers undreamt of. Both the physical and the ethereal worlds obey these laws. To discover and ferret out these laws in order to attain wisdom and truth is the task of the philosopher, to implement them within is the task of the Hermeticist, to act in passive and active modus operandi is the task of the hypophant and magoi.

V. There is a life after death that corresponds to the indivisible whole, and the question of the fates of human beings offers many answers that depend on the following:

— Sporulated form, i.e. which soul parts remain, which synthesize and synthonize, which decay, how does the individuation take place, because even great, strong souls (Ka) of gods are not immortal, they last for millennia and yet are subject to changes like everything in this world.

— Biopsychological imprints, the gene machine, socialization in nature, society, civilizations, religion, the value system, taboos, the sacred and the profane, beliefs, the foundations of the mind, the karman, the oneirocracy, or — to put it holistically — the psychophysiomagic „homunculus", which arises with death, and disposing of the carcass (the organic carcass retains some „memories" of the living organism, so some necromancers and unethical grave robbers indulge in this sport, which brings more trouble with the shadows, eidola, simulacra, and dead souls, eryniis, than benefit)

— Pitching of the mind, intellect, living soul heart (Kheper, symbolized in Khemetism by a scarab when undergoing Ophite operations with the Ka, a winged soul-heart) to frequencies, registrations or channels of a particular world (examples listed at the end).

— The consolidation of the souls of a single mortal into proportional wholes, their harmonic intervals, their separation, distinction, union, fusion — i.e. a part of the spiritual apparatus of a mortal can be translated, interpreted (born into) another place than another functional soul of a human being. An example: a shadow (khaibit) can reside in the land of death and possess the land of the living, places, houses, while the bionic soul is reborn in an animal and the spirit takes the garb of the Agathosdaimon of the Hadesian Aethyr. The ability to synchronize all components in unison is a rare trait, but should be achieved while still alive. Note that some components are underdeveloped in some people or never developed, but a sense of „elitism" should be totally discarded, since every moral being has the potential to develop different functional souls at its own pace, if properly guided by diverse occult operations. In this way we avoid a caste system and erred determinism. Often souls do not choose the place of birth but are drawn into the womb of worlds and bios, often they are forced into a womb, the paradigm of a „lesson on earth" is false. The game is much more profound and merciless for those who are left behind.

— The totality of the tendencies on earth and at the time of death, as well as the posthumous changes (Karman)

It is difficult to change the Karman after our death, so it is of great importance that we work to surpass and shape our Genii while we are alive. For a list of other important variables that influence our fates, check here:

— The totality of our ethos, our nature in life (what do we have as our daimon, our genii)

— Hidden threads of destiny, seals on our souls that posthumously strengthen or weaken associations with certain worlds.

— Attachments that embody the subjects of our attachments in posthumous inclinations and associated illusory worlds.

— Protection, evaluation, endorsement, praise or recognition by deities that can help us navigate the netherworlds and protect us from malevolent worlds, as well as bring us back (liberate us) to their worlds, overcoming and breaking sigils of cacodaimonic entities, futhering psychopomps (the guides of souls) can facilitate the posthumous journey.

— Posthumous recognition signs, names, sigils that help us navigate, make us recognize, chain us to certain worlds or free us. They can also be recovered in life to regressively identify us with earlier living persons and continue our work in the current life.

— Posthumous assignment or strong destinies that lead us into a particular sphere, world, for example being cast into a particular planetary sphere to work as an intelligencer-spirit of that sphere etc.

— The ability to navigate worlds in an impersonal, detached and objective way so that none trap us in their „reality", otherwise we embody the subject of perception as truth and deflate to a true world.

— The ability to find one's „home," the posthumous telos reality or place where we want to be.

— Individual soteriology, or the ability to achieve a posthumous state of necessity and will after a series of successful initiations, spiritual, magical and ceremonial acts.

— The law of the interlocked kaleidoscope or the ability to create keys (clavis) in the soul and consciousness that open the gates of certain worlds and increase the possibility of reborn in those worlds.

VI. The worlds we can be born into can each contain a myriad of millions of entities that are assembled in depth into complex geometric figures that undergo entropic transformations.

Principle: All worlds are parallel, they are not mutually exclusive, they can be in a different registration or category of an indivisible world, and since they are in different pockets of entropy, they can be invisible to each other. Life is the only moment of reality (Austine Osman Spare), most of the chaos of the other worlds opens only posthumously and reminds of a flowing dream until one meets stability. Whoever masters this dream is like an immortal. The more subtle a world is, the less it has to do with ours, the greater the influence it has on all the others. From the point of view of the beings in each of these worlds, their own world is as real as it is to a mortal man who dreams a realistic dream without being aware that he is dreaming.

VII. As for „hell," it is a place of subjective suffering, when a sentient soul is cast or reborn into an unnatural state, tormented by pain, terror, delusion, suffering, attachment, unmet needs of life; likewise, „heaven" is a subjective experience of bliss, eudaimonia, which is pleasant. Both states are chains, one is the iron chain of delusion, the other is the golden chain of realization. A liberated person transcends both states and can travel through these realms as he pleases without being trapped in them. The shedding of attachments and the ability to travel through the worlds without embodying the subjects of these illusory states is the goal.

Theories of Magick: De Anima, Modernized

My dragon-soul destroyed, woeful, what am I to do, they hatch souls like brides in me, for malignant and benevolent purposes few, yet they are all denied, denied, they'll never match that spirit mine, and I remember with the memories of a veritable starry dew!

> The soul is not immortal, it is mutable.
> Gods do not contradict nature. Animals have souls.
> Even Gods age and die.
> Only the liberated spirit (pneuma) has a notion of immortality, but it lacks individuality in our sense.

Interdependent, co-occurring flashes of events that change give rise to inherently homogeneous systems of phenomena. The world is an example of such an indivisible system, from which perceptive animals, including humans, form categories.

The interpretations of such categories are models, and they may be useful for a particular teleology, but they are flawed because they cannot capture the whole indivisible world in any category.

The laws of such systems must be integral to the structure and content of our analysis. The star of our system has drawn from the elements found elsewhere in the universe, if one starts from the point of view of Einstein's objective physical universe. From the occult point of view, it has drawn from all the hidden aspects of the Unus Mundus, the World Soul, whether from the transcendent Aions, the field of divine fire, if we follow the dictum of the Chaldeans, or from the Tiamatic black form mass of the Black Sun. In the latter, occult sense, the Sun is a birth child of the merged duality that led to a transcendent third — a stable physical form that observable astronomy and physics attempt to interpret. We can compare the birth of the Sun to the yolk of an egg sustained by Chalaza from the Chaos of Forms and the Aionic Divine Fire. Thus, in the visions of some mystics, the Sun is both the Black Sun of Azoth, a mystical black sun; in the blessed visions, the Sun is the Great Being, a dazzling intelligence of divine fire. The category follows the perspective, the perspective follows the perception.

Thus, everything in the generative sense must come from the preexistent environment of the given system. On the linear time scale, planets must form, life must evolve. If we take all this into account, we are dealing with a series of generative-evolutionary anchor-ensoulments of the world in physis, from stars to life. If stars in their diversity share a common blueprint, why not life? I must mention that I am not a creationist. I believe that the „Deus Absconditus" is a primordial impulse of generation and that intelligence, at least in the sense of intellectual stars, is a reflection of non-human intellect that takes on new forms continuously in a Divine crescendo of intelligibility. Let us define this intellect as the ability to adjust in reflection to a higher order of magnitude of the generational order, that is, to perform through intelligible unity an autophanic rite of emancipation from the whole. In the Hindi sense, the perception of a star is anatmanic in the human sense, but atmanic in the universal sense. The greatest mystery in this is the ability of the living intelligence of man to relate to the sun and perceive it as a god, for it reveals its atman as a sun-god manifested to the cognoscenti of the Egyptian-Hellenic, Egyptian-Babylonian, and Zoroastrian cults as a solar disc entwined with serpents, and yet is of an entirely different intelligence than a human perceiver. In this sense, our interpretation of a higher intellect by our intelligence is doomed to failure, for we have only our perspective and cannot go beyond its grasp. Therefore, it is good to keep it in mind and to deal with approximations that are in relation to the Solar Intellect, but never grasp it intellectually completely, yet out of necessity with divine intellecting.

Experiences such as raptures, ecstasies, illuminations, sudden realisations rush into our world, but they are only a section of the totality of phenomena. Since it is a cosmos and not a chaos, and the stars obey certain laws and rules, this also applies to life as a subgenus of the habitable solar systems. „Adult organisms, while conforming to several different body plans, are formed by repeated shuffling of a highly conserved set of genes." [Gilbert, S. F., Opitz, J. M., and Raff, A. R. 1996. Resynthesizing evolutionary and developmental biology. Dev. Biol. 173, 357—372]. The ancients tried to find a perfect harmony that governs everything, but does it really exist? Let me propose a solution: isonomia means finding equal parts in a topological space corresponding to their entropy. Perfect proportions are transcendent, the cosmos of phenomena consists of both order, coming from the transcendent worlds, and chaos, that of the tiamatic forms.

Therefore, in the modern sense, the search for perfect harmonies was abandoned, to the extreme error, because they were an aberrant sign of approximate perfection, instead, in the Platonic cave, the obvious and observable has decisively won.

However, when we have the transcendent world in view, the observable chaos and complex systems fall into order, an order disturbed by irregularities of generative worlds, but still a cosmos. The laws of similia similibus and analogia entiis should not be sought in these apparent similarities of sympathetic magic, but in deep correspondences in the co-emergent, interdependent causalities that are of different quality, nature, similarity and difference.

In this way, the muse of the Anima Mundi is preserved, and with a firm view of divinity, we can order the scattered elements, the ponderous disharmonies into a unified whole that is an eternal hymn to the universe.

According to Platonic and Mithraic teachings, souls originate from the sun and are therefore born on earth. I prefer a holistic approach in which souls are „gathered „from a sphere of pneumatic currents" and are concentrated during the development of a new organism throughout its evolution. In this way, the grinds, cuts and ethos belonging to the soul are developed not by one but by multiple forces and character energies (vasanas).

The above mentioned souls are a mixture of the souls of the mother and the father, they are bionic, they are not intelligent as such, while the vortex of ophitic energies (kundalini) and the lateralization of the brain (right- and left-handedness) is developed according to the exposure of the embryo to magnetic fields and light in the course of neurogenesis [Juutilainen, Jukka. „Effects of low frequency magnetic fields on embryonic development and pregnancy" Scandinavian Journal of Work, Environment & Health 17, no. 3 (1991): 149—58. http://www.jstor.org/stable/40965878.]. We can compare it to embryonic ectoplasm, which passively absorbs experiences both in the womb and after birth, and is thereby later shaped as in developmental psychology. The soul is impressionable, i.e., it receives experiences, sensations, emotions, reflections, etc. Throughout the life of its bearer. As for transmigration and metempsychoses or individual pneumatic carmanic fields, the soul is reborn according to the astrological rule: it does not develop in the womb, but hatches with the newborn at the time of birth.

I will not describe all nine functional souls of a human being, but will focus only on one of the most common special souls, namely the bionic soul. We can divide into natural souls, which develop and flourish in parallel with human existence and at the end of life represent a culmination of one's achievements, and merge with one's guiding daimon. We can divide into synthetic souls, made of ectoplasm endowed with special properties and abilities that can be magically programmed. We can split into zombie souls or souls made of fragments of others" souls. We can split into dead souls that are pitch black and make up the ethical quality and strength of a particular person, the stronger the shadow, the stronger the strength of ethos. Souls can be bound, tied, and enchanted by a skilled operator using psionic and magical means. When bound, a soul will transmit emotional and cognitive messages to the living mind and produce effects that were desired by such an operation. Souls can contain memories and be used to gather information. The pneuma (daimon), signified in some traditions by the pottu point (god within), contains the will and power of consciousness and is therefore older and more important than the animal soul. When an alien soul (xenopsychotization) is hatched into a superior mind, it diminishes the mind's natural abilities and produces subjective illness. Likewise, a superior soul hatched into a raw, brute mind may elevate it but also distort it because the mind is not trained enough to receive it. Souls should work in harmony with the mind's natural abilities under perfect conditions, yet such circumstances are scarce nowadays. Due to the limitations of this framework, I have decided not to extend what I have said to other dimensions, entities and other souls, but an intelligent reader will deduce and infer what is necessary to deepen his knowledge.

Civilized Beast, Civilized God

A human being is born neither good nor evil, as Plato claimed. He has certain neurocognitive tendencies based on his neural phenotype, which are expressed in the natural environment and in his interaction with the world and the Other. The neural phenotype, or cognitive phenotype, is the hard-wired tendency toward certain cognitive-emotional structures, such as psychopathy, or the tendencies that shape worldviews, political attitudes, etc. To avoid neural determinism, I prefer to emphasize adaptation, the acquisition of automaticity and social behavioral skills that shape certain tendencies that are the basis of socialization, viz. social training in passive and interactive modes, and self-mastery, overcoming and maturing into independent, self-reflective individuals capable of taming the „tartarism" or primal beast within and directing the „jumping monkey of the mind" into more insightful, creative and responsible channels.

Here I would like to pick two from Jaan Panskepp's list of instincts and explain how they develop under cultural and civilizational modalities and how the human beast becomes a human being and how a humane human being develops his inner daimon to detach himself from the world of animals into the worlds of the Divine. The Divine is always present and is never in conflict with nature insofar as the doors of perception are purified and the intellect and feeling sublimate and correct to a higher standpoint of understanding and perception.

Hunger and thirst are natural for anyone deprived of nourishment. The excessive satisfaction of these cravings is associated with the reward centers, and your regular „gourmands" enjoy the esthetic taste of a variety of ingested substances. As an aside, there is a secret to communion with substances, an ancient shamanic discipline, pure substances work best, and since prana follows thought, a tear of myrrh I once ate returned my saturnine nature to its proper place, it was called the tear of Horus in ancient Egypt. But let us proceed without further ado: The principle of pleasure is related to the libidinal or sexual drive. Thus, everything that has to do with pleasure is a satisfaction of the libido, which „consumes" the object of desire for which it thirsts.

The enjoyment of art and eroticism at a high level is indeed a devouring of the subject of passion, because hunger, thirst, and libido are sublimated and embedded in civilizational and cultural values that align them with acculturated systems. Can a hungry, thirsty person enjoy art? Only disciplined individuals who control themselves, or who are obsessed with art, may be deprived of sleep, food, and concentration on it. That's why I have always been an enemy of Maslov's pyramid — you can satisfy high cravings while being deprived of basic cravings, but they have to be trained first. A salute to the starving artists!

Well, metaphysical cravings are constant hunger and thirst, they put the instinct in hypostasis, for the place of completion in a transcendent reality, a craving that cannot be satisfied immediately. Is it the building of castles in the air? Or is it the finest point of civilizational-cultural sublimation, where heaven descends upon us and we find ourselves whole again because we have arrived at the starting point through the subversion of nature. We have bypassed the generative worlds of Aphrodite by sabotaging the atavisms of nature, and have returned to the womb of Mater Magna! The myth of the eternal return is not that the Deity returns to humanity, but that man returns to his home, „child of nature and starry heaven, but my home is heavenly" — Orphic Mysteries. Need I not mention that certain instincts that have been misinterpreted, that have fueled New Age conspiracy theories and other outrageous ideas, are merely a shredded and fundamentalized need for desire. For example, a person who longs for the stars may deny science and evolutionary neurobiology and falsely assume that we came from the stars on some „spaceships" (nest-building locality) and everything else is a lie.

Similarly, a person who has metaphysical or peak experiences will try to justify them with „extraterrestrials, angels," as if they were instantaneous. Basically, he reifies them into something objectively basic, tangible, and fetishizes them into subjects of his game (play instinct), but in the reverse role — he is subject to them, it is „they" who are in control of his life, a cabal, a syndicate that rules as a gray eminence and pulls the strings of the mortal scene. Do I deny the existence of angeli bonum? My second sight has revealed much, but autophany

(self-manifestation) is but a sign of a great essential type, indecipherable to a mortal human animal. Curiosity commands interpretation, but when wonder is interrupted, all the demons of certainty creep in, and this is where both religious bigotry and fanaticism and blind faith in one's own ideas begin. In other words, the critical apparatus is suspended in order to pursue fantasy. But you see, realized potential offers much more satisfaction than fantasy. It is as if instincts chain us in Plato's cave, and only through refined works do we loosen their grip and approach the heavenly mien.

We are still mortal, but somehow our souls, minds and hearts are changed. As with the mutations of vices and virtues, they may be derived from civilizational instincts. I once analyzed the basic Hindi "kleshas" in Patandjali's model (vices) and found that all forms of mutated vices can be traced back to these simple dharmas: "attachment, I am I, delusion, ignorance, repulsion." Similarly, we can derive various mutations from the lower instincts that pass through the riverbeds of the whirlwinds of civilizational and cultural history of ideas, the noospheric bastions and the revolutions that overturn them like giants to establish new, small and large reforms of the social logoi.

The prison of Venus: Lucifer chained by Hesperion

> „Love follows humaneness"
>
> — Confucius
> „Humaneness is difficult to define" — ibid.

Having written a chapter on diotimic love in Occultosophia, I would like to return to certain insights. Since I have experienced both passionate, unconditional and great love and tamed, mature and understanding love, I speak from the position of a knower, experiencer and promoter. In the first case, the ugly damsel invidia forced us to dance the „devil's tango" and tore our minds and hearts apart; in the second case, the practicalities of life and turbulent conditions separated us.

I remember listing twenty-four forces in the universe by anthropocentric standards, only one of which was fusion or love. Now I would like to observe how enthroning just one value on the pedestal, just one force, upsets the rest and causes more devastation, suffering, war and killing than necessary. It is often said that „love is not understood," but we are human and can interpret whatever we want into this value. We can understand it as carnal, bestial sex, erotic leaning of bodies, hearts, minds and souls to a high sense of bonding of souls on a deeply spiritual level.

Love can blind us, it can uplift us. But the psychology of love is such that in the extreme carnal realm it is cannibalism, while in the extreme spiritual realm it is self-enclosure, like the couple in the „Garden of Earthly Delights" sitting in a bubble.

Gnosticism and Christianity („a lovesick, hopeless case") excluded the totality of the power complexes of different ideas and decided to single out this one value as the highest. What followed is a dysfunctional distortion of the „harmonious man, harmonious woman" at the expense of countless other strains of virtues, muses that inspired us both bestial, temperate and idyllic.

There is only one point of „true love" if Agape, that pattern of universal forces, is interwoven with Philia (mature friendship) and Eros (erotic stuff), but it is not enough as a value to describe all the other forces in all their aspects to serve the goal of cognitive liberati. Most people do not understand this because they have been conditioned in the Judeo-Christian paradigm, which is secular but in which „love" still obeys civilizational constructs.

These people cannot imagine a world in which the towers of Aphrodite are not the only ones. Hence their suffering, hence their search, hence their desire and unfulfillment. When they find true love, they pass through impermanence and are soon crushed by the joys and sorrows of losing the pearl.

If you aspire to mastery, go through love, love to the utmost, experience it, but never be misled into thinking that the „love of God" or the „love of your partner," no matter how cosmic, is the gateway to liberation.

Tears of a Dragon

Fin de siècle

Saturn's era consolidates what is, putting a corset upon existing currents and squeezing all the filth from boiling blood of crème de la crème to scum, until it explodes into chaos. "Reap what you have sown" — Upanishads are ante-dating what that crucified Jew never said. There is no mercy in that, no justice, just truth of a grotesque mirror of the human race that effectuates destines, fates and fortunes. There is just this last Solar covenant that is all honesty, all justice, all splendor, inflaming everything in nuclear fire, if must be, to cross out centuries of delusions, lies, slander, humiliations of every sound master and mistress that attempted to warn the multitudes not against "sins", that pathetic Levantine invention, but against foolishness — that last cry of wisdom and understanding that can't be coupled with compassion anymore, but an avid revanchism.

Those who tasted from the Sumerian tree of life know good and evil — they pick the better, for that is a natural choice for their intellectual suns, the gusto of the spirited immortals. When the world will be enslaved, I will be long gone, before the events described here will take place, I will be assigned to my faraway star, rewarded! Sic! Who is rewarded but Pavlov's dogs!

I took what was mine and lived up to it! By toil in opposition and heroic frenzy against what could not and would not be changed. Some will call from above the remnants of rare spirits below that long and crave and desire Divinity, to become gods. Lo! These few heroic souls, Boddhisatvas and Pratyeka-Buddhas of Kali Yuga, praised be their name!

I am at ease, in the end I won! They haven't matched my spirit, not until Mahamanvata will be done, in Joycean tone! Yet that star mocks me in my retreat, oh star of evil star of pain! I am building fortifications just to make it more difficult for the enemies to progress behind me! Defensive victory is degradingly personal, when it is not shared with the remaining victors! Yet is not a bitter, disconsolate triumph? As I observe a world where liberty is a mere name, consigned to the catacombs of the Plato's cave, as they carry their fetishes, flags, opinions, political turf-battles they march into the abysses of their delusion, like prisoners caught in a steel cage thrown into darkness of an ocean of tar. Liberty was all there ever was, it is the basis of humaneness, of love, of awe, of beauty — it is a chance at the Pythagorean Y to be with Gods, to shatter the fetters, to put your blood, sweat, work, tears and commitment into it. How many times have I fixed my gaze on winged sun-disks, muses, winged serpents crowned with a cry, a yell, a whisper, a whimper! It is a heroic frenzy that governed me for so many years, for I have loved the world too much as a dragon to hate it coldly with aversion faraway, indifferent and resigned cold! Pater Liber, Mater Victoria!

Liberty was the basis of culture, of civilization, of higher feelings, of great art and humane movements, what remains are recycled echo-chambers that procreate with themselves and spit out ever-more filth, or even more reactive cruelties calling themselves "defenders of culture" that stomp on that muse! Don't blame liberty for degeneration! Blame your lack of maturity, responsibility, moderation, blame invidia and your gluttony of wanton, your blindness! This is a jealous age! Now in this jealousy you make a whore of liberty, she won't serve you!! The law of contraries reached its extremes and turned into double vice, poisoning the moderate, subtle strength, the only pillar there is to regenerate the vine! As I write, liberty is taken away from you each day, and the amount of souls that may be free diminishes evermore. Only few consider a heroic doing, training, learning, that has more soteriological, psychagogic, pneumagogic effects than casting more delusions into their heads! Heaven stands triumphant, it calls multitudes, but Thyrsus" bearers are few, the rest are devoured by illusions and death!

Mind the religious Judeo-Christian lies, mind the consumerist lies, mind the political credits, the right-wing conservatives slaughtering virtuous republican freedoms as we speak, and giving an order of their fanatical totalitarian zeal — they shall NOT ascend — mind the modern day slavery presented as gifts of that wretched host, mind the loony park of the relativists — they are as irrelevant to Heaven as their relativity on Earth.

Tell the gracious host of Earth to take his faeces-like gifts, for we have found better ones assigned to our lot! Their masters are a pathetic lot, their masters had the privilege not to ruin the peoples, they are all pirates! Yet I am an unauthorized, unidentified pirate in their eyes, an impostor, an intruder, me, an Aion-sent heliacal dragon! Accused by a pirate! So be it, I accused them as an anti-christ, although that Jew I surpassed hundreds of hundredfold times! I don't deal parity with vermin! A sun-born beast who is, was and will be right, as veritable heavens testify! And with this rectitude, this duration of survivalism under siege, I haven't won the world, but I won my star, name, and return to the land of celestial mien! These master-pigs with their slaves turned the world upside down and expected the veritable not to accuse them?! They shall be ruined by Gods! No one prompted these master-pigs to shower us gifts in the first place, nor darkness to buy us in, as we break from darkness of ignorance and delusion straight to the procession of the Great Providential Gods — here rewards are endless, because what is given belonged to us from the start, the inheritance of families of Heavens.

Earth, and once great race, it was not always so! Alas! It is irreversible, no more Myrrh tears, I rest at ease at the bosom of Diana, climbing back to the fires which spat me out. I lay my Thyrsus upon my breast, my herculean club with which works were accomplished I need no more, the whip accompanies me till I die, but it is I who am a master upon myself, and I that whip myself into shape to perfect the last movements of Ankh. The wand? I have no need of it, I cast it away years ago, to create illusions is a demiurgic toil of illusionists that need to make resting places for souls that crave such swinish games!

The staff of Caduceus carries my thrice-immortalized heart, my Ureic diadem, double-crowns of Egypt, where are they now? Megingjörð cast from my chest, Sun armor cast away, where are my weapons? Neti, neti, neither this nor that! I lay defeated yet victorious, departing from this world, like the rest, the last mocked dragon of Earth. I am at ease, for my burden was heavy, but I carried it, I moved through the valley of shadows, and conquered them, I made a laugh out of pain and suffering, by detaching and heroically overcoming! What is more? Doesn't matter, need not be.

Enclave of Value: Patterns in defence of Arete

The character sows the destiny, the discipline mends the behavior, the daimon directs to the epitome of the arete, because it is to be understood with this high muse.

What is the real value of virtue? Is the golden chain of virtue equal to the iron chain of vice, which is internally empty and contains no essential dharmas? Is it merely a social construct that is completely relative? What is the value of virtue in the modern world.

Aretology deals with such questions. In nihilism, such values are completely overridden; in aspects of the sociology of ignorance, values are mere automatisms inculcated into society by socialization through mentors and peers throughout history and the mutability of the history of ideas in the noosphere. Even if we were to take the wisest man who could bridge the ancient past and modern times, and get him with his great historical insight into causality to tell us what is of value, he would not pull universal laws out of a hat. Aretological instincts depend on stability, wisdom, discernment, and good judgment in every situation and event forever linked to the human environment and the personal characteristics of the observer of thought, speech, and action. Deriving virtues from observations and internalizing them is reasonable, but is not it a struggle against adversity that creates an asylum of values that hardly anyone can relate to? „If you pitch your song too high, no one will follow you," were the words of Du Fu.

There is not a single man who is coherent, understandable and rock solid in his insistence to be noble. This is because nobility is forever linked to a set of practiced virtues and a love of great beauty and reverence that transcends the land of men. Most of us may have the image of a „knight in shining armor" in our minds, implying that virtue is devalued in modern times. Rather, imagine an ordinary person who overcomes his weaknesses and endures great turmoil to excel and absorb those hard-won essences. This is not stupidity, but a deep understanding, a profound essence, a gravity of barely surviving things, the lightness, subtlety, kindness and grace outward, the resolute diamond carrying the imperial obsidian sword hidden.

As a utilitarian aretologist, I consider virtue to be the social logoi unit of a healthy society, just as a family is an anthropological unit. It is the atmospheric nod to humanity in its refinement. It is the turn to excellence that is no longer to be found in this world that tries to deceive us by saying, „Such and such was never there, history is always now."

As a metaphysician, I find that the gigantomachy of virtues is a process of searching for a key to the divine, a homoiosis theio. What virtues, you ask? The daimon and ethos are different for each man and woman and are ultimately measured by objective, transcendent laws, but we have no direct access to this world, we can derive approximations based on ideas and experienced revelations. Where wisdom and laws of nature, Earth and men are approached, the Divine land of notions tends to unfold, too. Gods do not contradict nature, they further its hypostasis. It is a process of constant interpretation, a hypophetic „hermeneuien". After all, it is a cosmos and not a chaos. As for the nature of the lion, its lionlessness, is a Ding-an-Sich, but it is different for each lion. What belongs to the nature of man is his humanity, but it is different in every man — vibrations of bestiality and idyll follow, but ultimately this is necessary to distill what is of use and „ipsa vene bibendi", drink your own poison to heal yourself as if you were taking a spagyric medicine.

Do not think of virtue as a „boastful thing, a thing of impractical fools," for now every thief, scoundrel, and swindler will cry out, „Loser, fool," and will use the first attempt to use his cunning in stealing as proof. This is a society of high-ranking cheats, scoundrels and thieves that are institutionalized, only the petty criminals are relegated to the courts and prisons, there is a general social acceptance of many behaviors that are contrary to the interests of a reasonable society.

Why should we ever engage in noble enterprises when any thief can rob us of our possessions, any swindler can slander our reputation and good name, any scoundrel can plot against us. There remains something of psychological transparency. When you are drawn into vice, you build a behavioral identity based on the same premises as the adaptive swindler. In fact, you have much to gain in this way — from a purely materialistic point of view, it is smarter to be a great, uncaught criminal than a decent human being. From the big picture point of view, it's better to work towards the tip, but if most people's insight ends at the tip of their nose, what are we talking about? They are like market women, incessantly twittering rubbish, thinking they are engaged in something very, very important.

Only people who openly act upon their gigantomachy tower above the rest in practice. The gigantomachy of those in power, of those who rule over people, is greater than that of monks. That is why one so often finds petty crooks in government, whose ineptitude is masked by psychopathic self-delusions, lies, and the persistent fear that they will be confronted, stripped of their trappings, the charm of status, tested and condemned, a true gigantomachy would tear them to shreds. A magician who fights against perversities, deviations and vices is in a lonely position, but in a more honest one — because he is alone with the alone, as the Sufi saying goes — with the deserts and the gods.

Jurisprudence: Metaphysics of Laws

A fool endowed with all the divine and infernal techniques of magic is nevertheless an impotent one. It is the inexperienced magicians who are dangerous to themselves and others. If they are inexperienced, they are like a child with matches that can throw them into the gasoline and destroy their mind, heart and soul. The difference is in magical potency, the first has almost none and it will take a lifetime to train one, the second has been equipped since his first breath on earth, and lo and behold, everything works! Man's nature is what it is, it can be trained to the utmost perfection or to the greatest mischief. Evil intentions, jealous looks, lust for trifles or nobility in grandeur, magic is subject to the passions of an unsuspecting magician. He must be trained, he must be serious and self-controlled, he must learn to act like a craftsman.

Otherwise he is a mere mess and will be quickly pacified, used, abused, distributed, vivisected and annulled to his regret, despair and sorrow. Fortunately, potency in magic requires training even for a magician, and abuse of the art dilutes the possibilities of effective action. Effective potency is directly proportional to excellent training, and chaos and confusion are inversely proportional to the effectiveness of magic.

There are indeed metaphysical laws inherent in the cosmos, the order, the embellishment, from which one can derive one's behavior, virtue, and ethos in the land of men, having discovered them by means of great, penetrating insight into ahistorical causality in a co-emerging, coherent whole, through experience, memorization, insight, wisdom, realization, and the ability to relate these reference points and systems of measure to the world as a whole.

Universalism and hypermoralism threaten here, but these metaphysical laws should be discovered through patient observation of the movement of celestial bodies, of disincarnate divine intelligences, of inspiration by muses, of observation of nature and its laws, and of the great vision of humanity integrated through individuation in proportion, ratio, to the most refined harmonies of spirit, soul, mind, body and heart.

When divinities are discovered, everything else unfolds like a rose. We must follow their teachings in an open, great, noble, embracing, reverent mind, with a studious, balanced, discerning understanding, precise and critical on the intellectual level, deeply feeling on the pneumatic level, without allowing excesses on the emotional level, having a strong and great heart, keep our body healthy to prolong the art of life, but not for the sake of the flesh, like some idiots who wanted to discover the secret of immortality in the flesh to pursue the spiritual arts, forgetting that the spiritual arts can be realized by a talented youth under the right circumstances.

Ultimately, it is the best humanity that can be discovered, guided by Heaven, each one for himself, according to his nature and what he can realize in himself. All chaos tries to deny the objective rules and lives on the delusion that there are none. No one can cheat the universal occult machinery, the laws of the cosmos and the rules of the game. Either you play along or you destroy the chessboard and give in to the illusion that you have won anything of value.

What is most rewarding is precisely the fact that no one can cheat the Divine Game, that our attempts are remarkable, that even if our enemies hinder our movements and destroy parts of our works, they put more effort into destroying our monuments left behind by the loss of their own power and commitment. Do not waste your time on such fools, as the old Arab proverb says, „Dogs bark, the caravan moves on." Those who persevere will still succeed.

On Second Sight and other Sensorial Siddhis, Hallucinations and Psychiatry.

If a psychiatrist experienced any hallucinations, he would nihilate them back to his worldview and paradigm; after all, we interpret everything back into what we know. After all, he does the same for his patients. Siddhis, such as „second sight,", clairsentience, clairaudience, magnetoreceptivity, clairvoyance, soul transmigration, are all symptoms of a disease, an overexcited mind, delusional attribution error. Historical events involving thaumaturgists, magicians, holy men, and seers are meaningless to a psychiatrist, inasmuch as he may relegate both the events and the personnel to his own discipline. Even clinical therapists of Jung's school rarely have anything to say about it, save for the art of interpretation and the „omnipresent unconscious" (after Pauli-Jung dialogue it was finally decided Jungiana has nothing to do with science).

In this brief, I offer both an explanation for some of these phenomena and a warning about blind-diagnosing patients whose lives are otherwise liveable because they use their skills to enrich their lives. There are unsufferable conditions at times, when the person with such abilities has an untrained mind, a societally-conditioned narrow belief system, an immature personality and yet attempts to make sense of it all. This is due to a lack of education in this area and a general rejection of such (rare) circumstances nowadays. Preparation for siddhis in India required a training in yogas, ethos, principles, they required a stout, tough, intelligent, shrewd mind that is firmly fixed in foundations that protect it from insanity.

Nevertheless, acccepting such phenomena in the modern world's societal logoi are numerous: scientifically dismissing such occurrences on the one hand does harm to the genuine events, while accepting them mindlessly, allows all forms of charlatanism to flourish on the other. I would like to issue a warning, therefore, that only people of a sound, ordered, and disciplined mind are well-equipped to manage situations in which siddhi may spontaneously occur. That would be a normative view, the real world is governed by its own laws, and often siddhis arise in people that are completely unprepared, either by spontaneous occurence, a botched initiation, or frivolous self-initiation. It is not my aim to critisise such happenings, but to advice to guide such people out of the confusion, and train their minds along the critical events that already occured, and are continuously challenging their lives.

In order to understand the background of Siddhis better, one would have to understand the whole complex of magicko-pneumatic consciousness-related entities, the laws governing them, and so on. This is not the purpose of this sketch, nor will I be contributing the exact terms of my subjective „theory of mind" here, which was relatively well-accentuated in „Occultosophia".

To avoid confusion, let me first define the terms I will be using here:

Hallucination (n.), after Etymological dictionary online:

> „a seeing or hearing something which is not there," 1640s, from Latin hallucinationem (nominative hallucinatio), earlier alucinatio, noun of action from past-participle stem of alucinari (see hallucinate).

Hallucination, after John Hopkins Psychiatry Guide (Speed, T. M.D., Ph. D., Sedlak, T. M.D., Ph. D.)

> „An hallucination is a perception without a stimulus. With true hallucinations, the individual is convinced of the reality of the experience. A true hallucination must be differentiated from":
> Illusion — a misinterpretation of a stimulus (e.g., a crack on the floor is misperceived as a snake)
> Pseudohallucination — occurs in inner subjective space (e.g., heard in one's thoughts, not perceived as auditory, does not come through the ears)
> Vivid imagery — increased imagination or mental images
> Hallucinations can occur in any of the five senses (auditory, visual, olfactory, gustatory, and/or tactile).

> Auditory hallucinations are the most common.
> Hallucinations are not pathognomic for any specific psychiatric illness, including schizophrenia.
> Hypnagogic and hypnopompic hallucinations can occur in healthy people when falling asleep and awakening, respectively"

Seeing and hearing things that others do not

We can't hear the high-pitched sounds that bats use for navigation, using echolocation. That would require an instrument that is capable of recording ultrasounds and informing us that indeed, such stimuli unregistered by the human ear happen. This is to say that we can't extract certain hidden categories unless we can register them, either using a device or our own senses. Hallucinations are registered sensually; they may be generated by the brain, in which case they are some form of misfiring, in some cases pathological, but they may also be stimuli that are simply registered by the brain and manifest as clear images, clear sounds, clear tactile sensations, clear olfactory sensations, and clear gustatory sensations. The brain is not a piece of meat in a box; it is an adapter, transceiver, conductor, and broadcaster, enclosed in a bioelectromagnetic field of a human being. It is a highly sophisticated modulator of conscious events, upholding awareness, memories, cognition, etc. Compared to cloud computing, the human nervous system is a datacenter, a process-running server, and a world-facing interface, yet our understanding of it is as miniscule as that of a real-life hardware server's skill to understand the whole human world from our perspective. Our human cognitive, emotional, and physiological apparatus is a minor component of the vast array of occurrences and strange spheres in which we find ourselves. It is hard to measure this immenseness by our perception because, by nature, we can't extract ourselves from what is beyond our capacity. „Here be dragons," „any phantasy may be read into that," but that is not the goal; the goal is to sceptically structure certain phenomena experienced by people all over the world into a different framework, technical magick if you will, rather than discarding it entirely.

Magician's heavenly chaos

A toast to memories! Envious thieves who have stolen my wisdom, who have forgotten my past, as I was possessed by inferior souls. my daimon withdrew. I, a giant, remember my past greatness! I collect the shards of my statue, a spirit resigned. A toast to the gods, they remember my name! While I bring my stories to an ordinary grave. All the gifts I possessed were stolen and wasted on mean, rude, jealous idiots who did not know how to use them wisely, because in their " gardens these fruits did not grow. They took them ripe and threw them to the swine, while I stand there half stunned, numb, half defeated, looking bitterly at the portends of a failing, falling world.

Notes from Vain Time

„Those who don't know silence can never contemplate the gods"

„Think — if other vanities will give thee leave — on all those generations that went before thee and anticipate all those that shall come after thee. Where are those beauties the times past have produced and what will become of those that shall appear in future ages? They will all to the same dust; they have one common house; and there is no family so numerous as that of the grave. Do but look on the daily sports of Nature, her clouds and mists, the scene and pageantry of the air. Even these momentary things retreat to the closet of the earth."

— COELUM TERRAE, Or The Magician's Heavenly Chaos, by Thomas Vaughan, A.E. Waite's Edition

„The most merciful thing in the world... is the inability of the human mind to correlate all its contents."

— H.P. Lovecraft

I wish it were otherwise, but my life cannot be unlived, nor my death unravelled. Behold, he who passes by thinks not of what might be, his masks are the most terrible of all! Look at what is and throw aside all mirrors, your perfectly lived life is all you ever really were — the grave of a soldier.

„Your loyalty is as immutable as stone and metal, but if the melody is tuned too high, no one can sing along" — Kang Yu-Wei; Sometimes it corrupts to tune the song lower, in times of decline it is no big deal, even for a scoundrel to excel, in golden times it is something valuable to excel.

Atavism is recapitulated in every memory, but it is fragmented into a cocoon of projections of the present mind. If the projection agrees with the recapitulation, it is confirmed and joins the resurrection, if it denies it, it wraps itself in personal projections.

Unheard of new theories that are valid but contradict the current paradigm can be presented in small steps in a mature and pleasant way. It is the skill of the communicator that makes the difference. Likewise, these things that have been written and repeated many times can be given added freshness by a skillful and mature author.

Whenever you are trapped in a binary conceptual polarization, look for another one that remixes all the meanings you have been bound to and illuminates a different aspect of the world, thus trying to transcend it through paradox.

In the past, mysteries were not hidden, people could read them, understand them from their socio-historical perspective, but as knowledge and wisdom degenerated over time, they were transformed into symbolic art that only a few could read. This art and concealment then turned into superficiality and the recycling of knowledge, which became more and more diluted and inaccurate, and was twisted or adapted — to some extent — based on different beliefs. What remained of it became a workhorse and slave to predetermined beliefs. On the basis of false knowledge and ignorance, the whole world was founded and began to corrupt the remnants of traditions scattered throughout the world. It is a difficult task to find the remnants of knowledge and wisdom and rebury the pages. Fortunately, thanks to experience, I can understand more and recognize what might be true in some things and false in others, because I am still fallible, and what I have are only interpretations and codifications of direct experiences, which are not completely erroneous, but still largely inadequate. There is only one rule of inquiry: Whenever you read ancient writings, religious narratives, mythology, look behind the hidden layer — do not treat anything fundamentally, do not read the words, read the soul of the people who wrote them, understand them, and then find what lies beneath, it is a laborious task, but if we stop at what is written, we become servants of a book, not servants of the Mysteries, The writing is only a sign, a hint, the essence or type lies underneath — some writings may point to utter errors and mistakes which we take for truth, to the shadows of a man's mind, others, skilfully worked out and deeply thought about, may remind us of certain fundamental experiences, of certain essential realities.

It seems that the only recipe is persistence, transparency, authenticity and commitment. If you are willing to lose and sacrifice all the things of life, if you are willing to lose and sacrifice all the things you never had, if you are willing to sacrifice and lose realms in your mind, if there is a huge abyss in your soul, if at the same time you are slandered, attacked and humiliated by those who have no merit, that you are destroyed in the name of petty things of the earth. Then, then you will be received according to measure. And what right have those who have satisfied their desires to question that, what right have they to ask „why" — they have received their lot. Beware of envious people, for they will undermine even this humble life you lead. They are entangled in the image of their deception, and in such cases their anger is endless.

Conspiracy theories are tunnels of reality that cover up the true corruption that is gradually taking over the world, and they are more frightening than any conspiracy theories. For they are not controlled by a group of people, corporate interests, shadow governments, aliens — whatever — but are the result of tainted ideas that have infected and dominated people's minds and are running rampant with a derailed system that refuses to change. This is not to say that conspiracies do not exist — they do, but far too often the belief in a consolidated conspiracy replaces the sober, reasonable and detached view of the world that seems even more frightening than conspiracy theories — these at least give the possibility of „being in control of the information" and resisting or accepting it, regardless of whether what is recognised is a true connection or a deception. One can be delusional about ideology, politics, society, occultism, religion, New Age, science, ecology, one can become delusional about almost anything if one develops a sense of desperation coupled with helplessness, but if one does so, one immediately discredits oneself, even if one's concern is correct. All the conspiracy theories and agendas of one strategic or tactical influence group or another would fall apart with fine, dedicated, noble people who truly want to inspire and lead — indeed. This should be done methodically, decisively and, above all, wisely.

All exhaustion teaches the idea. The practitioners, the hardheaded, the rational — they have never gotten beyond their breaking points, agonies and pains. What remains for the exhausted is a desperate idea. Therefore, the exhausted can never be broken by anything earthly; the idea is eternal. We do not speak the language of the common people, they are a bit like naive children who still find blooming things in the wasteland, we think like children, unthreatened and yet completely grown up, we play like children — with theatres and masks. Whether it is an idea of unspoiled freedom or love or harmony or destruction does not matter. The remains of feelings are gathered in this way and offered at the altars of an idea, the purer the better, the more honest, transparent, authentic, the greater it is — and it ennobles what was dead, it revives Thanathos, that melancholy can be nurtured in splinters of happiness. When someone dies and a faithful animal tries to bring him back to life, wailing, longing, that is the process, just as we reconstruct ourselves, putting together our memories, our intellect, our feelings, our madness, our humour, our sobriety, our determination, and so on, forming it into a body that walks and talks and laughs and thinks, then it falls apart, for it was never alive again, and our spirit must revive it so that it goes on until it breaks. Beyond the idea, there is either the void or the abyss, a cold-hearted, stony survival that reminds us of all that has been sacrificed, that constantly harasses us with all the things we have burned — not to return them, they are without meaning, but to mock our past, to drive a wedge into the abysses of the soul that is never complete until it becomes a pure idea again, like the Hindi Purusha.

If you open yourself to greater worlds and at the same time try to bind yourself to this world with responsibility, sooner or later you will have to choose between the two. For with higher transcendence and prowess comes the pull of this world, which willingly and ungratefully punishes commitments to it until you give up the greater realms for its sake. This world jealously seeks attention from all who have escaped it: Either he concentrates on detaching himself from this world, or he becomes its slave, knowing that the world will constantly punish, degrade, humiliate, and demote all endeavours dealing with transcendent realities. There are people who can be devoted to both the world and transcendent realities, but this is a double-edged sword in which one can lose for both worlds.

Even if all our preparations, all our work are in vain and all our models are completely wrong — at least we dared, we tried, we found the beauty in the great abysses of the unknown — and in the end we came out with a new sense of humanity, reached a new height and a new depth, doubt and uncertainty are necessary for a curious heart to seek the truth.

By dissolving your mind in the universe, by exhausting and burning your individuality, you take your experience and make it invalid. Either you become God by completely annihilating yourself, or you become the universal deity dissolved in the totality of being, or you become a small vibrating thread in the great mind that soon disappears in its essence. The Brahma is everything, the Purusha is beyond, the Sunya is beyond the beyond. So there are only three real instances of the universe: the inclusive, the exclusive and the nothingness. The first two instances are changeable and are under the law of change, the last one is beyond all laws. Thus, by the rule of dissolution and melting, one connects with the spirit of the Godhead, inclusive; by the law of detachment, one connects with the Purusha, exclusive; and by the rule of non-dual radiant emptiness, one transcends both cycles and becomes nothingness.

Now the infinite silence, the total silence is an ultimate movement, it is as if the silence vibrates and manifests its totality — it is actually full of sound. In the same way, total unity arises from total nothingness;

"You can destroy everything by exposing yourself to a mass if it attracts their attention and is superior to them" — if you happen to rise above what this mass loves, if you strive for more and build your temple in supreme sanctity to serve your gods, they will first think about the “how”, then about the “why” and finally about the “wherefore” and feel unjustly treated — and on this basis they start their imitation and then are frustrated that they cannot reach for the same things because their basis does not allow for authenticity, they will try to attribute all this to their narrow-minded, uneducated beliefs, but in the end they will begin to discredit you, call you a liar, make you an idiot, they will demean everything sacred, degenerate your aspirations, turn you into a perverted monster, and then they can finally rest — because suddenly what looked like a demi-god can be transformed into what they basically are, they can reflect themselves in their form that absorbs all their cartoonish flaws, they no longer have to endure their reflection in a perfect mirror where they see their disfigurements. Legends rarely live up to themselves over time, the dynamics of life work here. Then, having removed a thorn in their eye, they devour the next sacred thing that obstructs their view of seeing their filth as something noble, their thirst and twisted desires as something natural, their lowly surrogates as true riches.

In the confused world of increasingly alienated minds, the fantasy of a solution evolves into a puer aeternus complex — everyone wants to be saved, but never matures into an act of self-liberation, call it individual redemption if you will, and ends up ceding more and more power to those who do not deserve it, apathetically submitting to the rule of metaphor, you basically turn it into the „end” (apocalypse) or the „beginning” (new world), that suits them best, while reducing themselves to non-struggling, non-dissident, non-active followers of whatever fragmented ideology or belief system suits them best, and filtering the whole world through them, at worst enslaving themselves, at best pretending to be in control of the world, but basically never taking responsibility, either for the world or for their species or for themselves.

All understanding falls into a mind prepared to receive it — in a sense the experiences that prepare the mind require knowledge, for someone unprepared it is merely a fairy tale to be discarded, for someone it becomes real and effective — if you do not have the experience of how to deal with it, it drives you into madness and delusion. So the competence is given after balanced work, after skill, experience and stability — if one of them is missing, it is hidden until you are prepared.

The burden of necessity, hovering in the total void, weighing down the world, without apology, without forgiveness, profoundly watching, silently guarding, while the fates take their course, while individual roses bloom and fade away like the tears of the abyss, until the end, until the dissolution.

What if this world is ruled by terrible forces of alienation? That the main cause was unreflective in the coldness and vastness of itself, and that what the human mind understands is total loneliness. And that was insufficient, so the mind conjured up a whole series of forces, but it became even more lonely when it realised its superiority, and there was no equal, and so it dwells above and has no relation to what is below, while the series of forces governed itself. This is not a positive philosophy, but the good in the world was created by compassion, the evil by the ongoing forces of creation, and so compassion healed creation. And when we reflect this compassion, we see the world as magnificent and beautiful, but it is passing away, always, it is transient; and when we realise that all is lost, we see that it always ends the same, because it reflects the law of this separation. But perhaps it is about preserving moments of this beauty, so that it lasts while it is transient? What is artistic creation but the escape from the terrible loneliness and the creation of more shadows? Perhaps this is why we detest our art, why we destroy it, because we know that it brings nothing good. But we continue to run away from the ruins of God and build divine things on them to emulate the glory that was long ago.

Have you ever been detached from your reality, your known environment? Have you ever been truly alone with loneliness? The pursuits that distract you, the ports of reality that keep you running through life without a second thought. Pause now. Look around you, separate yourself from this world. These people may indeed have a deep emptiness in their eyes, who have felt this alienated horror staring deep into them, how infinite space has pressed directly upon their insignificant being and out of them, making them empty, susceptible to doom, breathing a nightmare of absolute damnation — they recognise the horror in their own eyes as death dances in their minds, they know what it is to stand in the great voids of the universe, alone! But how beautifully this eternal night of perception absorbs the light, like a storm that becomes luminous again, from the gods of reproach that lie beyond ontology — into the embrace of the mighty winged aeons that are the substance and the eyes of the stars, they make the torches flare with life, companions that fill the world with dazzling light, and then the horror is lifted, the alienation removed! Then we return to the world, walk through it again, with a different perception, forgetful or not — comforted, perhaps inspired.

Slavery! Slavery! I cry, proud, rebellious, as they cut my mind and life, as I struggle. Then retreat into a tear, silence — slavery, slavery! — I whimper silently, punished, exposed, heartbroken, then retreat into oblivion, oblivion, slavery — this silent thought is stuck in the subconscious of an old man in a wheelchair, with a weak, disobedient body and mind. Those who were never really free, whose freedom was not thwarted, distributed, censored, know nothing of freedom. This is indeed the end of the story.

Watch the smoke dance on the cold wind to pass away, the last beloved memory, a figment, will be my final dissolution, I know no other heaven — it is restless, moving, I know nothing but a single sacred moment that is not hell.

Ultimately, it is a matter of perception, character, one's „genius" or „Juno" and development, not religion — projecting one's religion onto realities and realms one does not understand is a form of censorship. Some religions have created good hermetic paths — but they are followed by only a few, not by the power of religion, but by the way the soul and mind become a vessel for higher things. The rest is a tool of subjugation and control, when faith becomes merely a prison that does not promote development.

Is not blind adherence to one's chain of reasoning just as flawed as bigotry of thought? Remain open-minded and politically interested, and thus broader and deeper

All realms have a potential totality of existence, but the world is in between, under the influence of one force or another.

By correspondence we extract a general law, and so the general law is illustrated by the content of the observed analogy. It should illuminate only this internally consistent system, otherwise it becomes a tool to distort reality, but independent laws corresponding together form a synthetic whole. This is the way philosophical work should be done, to seek the truth and determine what truth lies in the identified models of the world. The magic, mysticism, hermeticism begins.

The fool reaches heaven faster than the master falls into hell. The first one has no burden of the staff — how easily he moves, the second one walks on a wire rope stretched over the abyss, he falls head over heels with a single wrong movement. The difference is that the first is innocent and walks like a child, the second is guilty and sins with the aspirations of arrogance. The fool's dream is to be like a master, the master's dream is to be like a fool. They teach each other and just as the strict and disciplined senex educates the child before leaving, the puer aeternus looks at the world with playful love.

If the universe is causal, there is no beginning, because the first cause would negate the chain of causality. Now imagine that the moment you think about infinite past universes and everything in them, you commit an act of freezing that causal chain and pull yourself out of the equation for existential reasons. Is not that the grandest assertion of an instance in a chain of eternity that theoretically does not exist but has its ontological validity. For a second you float above the infinity, because you have grasped your own beginning and your own end, you became something which is foreign to the universe and you have escaped from it with it! Your own instance marks the beginning of time and the end of time as you move through life!

Do not fundamentally dissect the world into its composite laws and phenomena, that is an operational knowledge of how to move through relative fields, and is a knowledge of those relative orders. All in all, a unifying principle that combines all epi-phenomena into one is important, so do not concern yourself with mapping the specifics, but find the golden mean that opens the doors to an understanding that encompasses all being without the need to analyse its content separately — avoid Uebersophism; and strive for simplicity, but this simplicity can only be profound if the laws of each subject are caught in complexity; however, complexity should not be buried in indecisive confusion, but studied as a means of establishing these deeper laws. Another art is to move between spheres (vertically) and understand that different laws of being are applied to different realities, and the ability to move between worlds (horizontally) to understand the workings of a particular plane. Thus, knowledge of the spheres moves through the realms of the interstellar voids and the celestial essential worlds that are superior to the universe, and knowledge of the worlds (e.g., this one) is knowledge of their workings; the vertical and horizontal spheres must be known to illuminate the whole of knowledge. Splintered knowledge must also be taken into the bloodstream and lived by the method of analogy. If it is right, it corresponds to the deep reality and promotes the work; if it is wrong, it must be refined.

Whenever your expectations rise above reality, imagine that you are lying in the meadow, and as the days, nights, months and years pass, as your body grows old and your hair turns grey, release your mind from the shell with the slightest breath. It is easier to build from here and gain only through work, strength and merit, without expectations from the world or circumstances. No matter what things of the spirit (omnia mea mecum porto) acquired in this way may be destroyed or spoiled, that which has been allotted to us by destiny remains with us forever; that which has been usurped or acquired by force is like chains binding us to the subject of such acts. „Never rely on others to fight your own wars or your own muscles will dwindle," so rely on chosen friends for companionship and friendship (philia), but do not trust them too much either. In the end everything must be renounced, the art of death must first be learned in life so that you can attain the third birth in freedom.

In pain, renunciation is happiness, holding on to ourselves and everything that surrounds us is suffering, because it is transient. And if they destroy the means to live by merit, by work, by one's own strength, or kill the will to fight and do anything useful with one's life — base methods should never be used, crawl through life without regret, because regret will fill you with pain, learn to detach and do not compromise if it means risking the loss of integrity or principles.

Beauty does not thrive when it is controlled, censored, ridiculed, vulgarised, it dies. Then what is left of her is cut out and stolen, she is raped and carried off as an exhibit to all corners of the world, hidden in her chains, in the corner of her cage like a wild animal. The Sophia falls.

He who does not know silence cannot contemplate the gods.

The way of leaving teaches an otherworldly patience. We leave this world without regret, we ask for nothing more. Everything falls into place according to a natural law, do not expect anything, do not predict anything and do not demand anything from destiny. You know its course, you should know yours.

A rebel in this system is an obedient son of higher orders. Slandered, humiliated and destroyed, he does not forget the heavenly loyalties that are greater than this petty world of misery and deception. Dissidents are targeted by the power they threaten and stifled by the masses they seek to liberate — it has always been that way and always will be.

If it is fated to face a greater power with scarce resources, that power will be equipped with everything it needs to defeat us by conjuring up things to break us, to subjugate us, to enslave us. However, if this power is blinded by fate and is unable to take all its measures against us as if we were unprepared, we can defeat it with modest weapons.

At a certain point in life, when one is damaged by struggles and deprived of one's work and earnings, when life itself becomes an instrument of torture, it is time to sacrifice everything that bound us to this life, and we no longer need other people's things, we no longer dream of their pursuits, the ghosts of past loves and ideas and dreams no longer torment us. We dream only of freedom and have separated ourselves from this life, hoping never to return to the disowned things that would mock us in these deserts of life. We long for freedom above these earthly shells, and we live everything that belonged to earthly life and is important to the earth, as our body buried, our spirit eternally free.

Perhaps it is indeed a way of solitude, and to be at peace with that, not living the life of ordinary people, is a sacrifice made for entirely different things, in service to them and to the higher realms. When the need for equality on an emotional, ideal or sexual level is overcome, then everything is at peace and we can be content with the normal happiness of others"

lives in a protective, fatherly and motherly way. After all, when emotions take over the mind and make a mockery of past aspirations, when life buries itself in matters that no longer concern it, we can be plunged into disappointment and suffering because of misplaced idealistic motives.

And even when violence stirs against the body — the wisdom one gains from such violence is forever one's own, for it gets rid of pride, attachment, and delusion, so long as one does not respond with an injured answer and is not drawn into wars that are not one's own — one remains both beholden to fate and loyal to those forces that previously stood by one and showered one with gifts. For often one is provoked to failure and hatred, and then destroyed in a pitiful cycle by those who fell before, and this machinery knows neither forgiveness nor mercy, it is blind like the bitter hatred it engenders.

Not being in love with this world — leaving it without regret and meeting death with ease.

Not to be attached to the illusions of this world — so that nothing can hold us back.

Not to make ourselves equal to the enemies — so as not to become like them, bound in their condition.

Not to forget the most important guiding principle, not to bury ourselves in this world through attachments — the world will keep teaching us pain until we give it up.

Not to lose the longing, not to fill it with temporary satiety that ultimately leads to thirst.

Never losing sight of suffering — temporary pleasure can attract attention and lead to restlessness torn between the world and the essence.

Not to negate the world completely, to find a proper balance and contribute to those who need it.

Beware of misjudgments, especially if you lack data. Things that seem threatening or contestable may have another motive. Try to assume as little as possible and focus on your reaction to the environment to improve it for your well-being.

The art between balancing the laws of life and the desire to transcend it, to escape it into freedom and service, and being embedded in that which is transient, can so easily be destroyed. Dead to the world, there is nothing here but ruins — do not cling to them, these things reflect your soul. Perhaps the only purpose in this life is to sacrifice everything that is attached, to rise and be assigned to another order, to fight again, this is an impulse of life, but it is detachment that teaches liberation. And the lesson that everything can be spoiled, all beauty defiled, all ideas destroyed, all dreams turned to dust, all love wasted, the misery of life is only there to teach — put yourself on the side of this life and you will suffer, put yourself on the side of this world and you will feel the misery, all these things, to learn to give it up, to detach — some destinies written do not allow anything else. And if you stop for a while and doubt it, the mockery will be endless, the pain will appear only to feel your pain and drink — because you have turned away from the path. I admire the giants who know this, who suffer this and who find enough strength to bring something into the world, to become victors, out of pure compassion, to sacrifice something, against all the things that destroy them, that punish them, that block their way, the bitter locusts and the cynical, petty hatreds and the jealousies that are able to twist minds and ruin lives, as if they were immune to all that, fearless in the face of all those obstacles, they are able to open some eyes, they never break down, never stumble for a while — they are heroes. That which isolates me is retreat, and perhaps with a last tear seal death and presence in this world. With a useless existence, maybe to find yourself, maybe just for that reason. Strive for what does not break, for what is eternal, for the silence of devotion, for the small ways, the simple ways, otherwise they poison everything with their poison of irrelevance.

The essential cannot be grasped: Hold the unspoken, so many beautiful things are ridiculed by a view that uses the mind instead of the intellect, the soul to understand, hold the subtleties, the unspoken within, recognise them. Always keep them away and protect them.

It may be said that this overrides reason, and that on this basis one can imagine all that is false, that one must therefore preserve a rational view, but this is so only when the esoteric becomes too extensive — and indeed misunderstanding can threaten, turning the essential idea into a shell that can be contaminated, analysed, eliminated and corrupted. For this very reason, the sacred is not possessed, it is uncaptured — and should remain so — the urge to present it is vulnerable to danger. Just as we have different ways, one recognises this only within and cannot impose it on another — even the latter, when mature enough to see it, will understand, recognise, see. People who see the contrast, the contradiction between the ideal world and the present world, are at first moved to explain it, to represent it, but then, if they do not turn into a mocking stick, they can dangerously entangle the idea with a world that reduces it to nothing — to a mere fantasy, an idea. Here, where idealism dwells on utopia, dangerous forces can be awakened, but idealism has two faces: One of the pure idea, the undefined, the subtle of a sacred movement, and the second — the reified, the practical, the denuded — where it absorbs everything from the world — the good and the bad — and faces everyone as one pleases, justifying the greatest injustice by the power of reduction, but also moving to greater deeds, by the power of expansion, it is a double-edged sword; I remember the times when I took a chair in front of the house and sat there speaking, writing and composing poetry, for the wind and for anyone who could hear. It's unwritten, forgotten, and yet it was the best poetry I had ever done. Or maybe it's just my belief and idealisation of the past, but without perfect images that we cherish, where is the reference?

Wherever you go in life, always direct yourself to life itself, do not seek escape, in greater suffering one can find hope in transcendent realities, especially if one can be a witness to that consolation, yet to flee from life into the embrace of the higher worlds is a complete abandonment of life, and since life is governed by its own laws and rhythm, such an attitude harms life and inhibits its expression, which must be maintained without running to and fro, but fully living and becoming of life, with the question „What is life?" is answered at every moment with the expression of life itself. It is true that in times of suffering we need something beyond life, a consolation, but it should not become a habit to run away from it, because then we will not be at home in any other world, wandering from one to another, without consolation, one can become complete only here, only here and now, therefore, suffering is also a part of life, and indeed — it makes us feel a greater belonging to this part of destiny, reminds us of what we are and how to deal with such great turbulence, to appreciate happiness and then tranquility, unmoved in the face of the twists and turns of the path. Also, do not flee from the higher worlds to life and bury yourself in its affairs as if there were nothing else, balance on the tip of the sword and be a messenger, a mediator caught between the worlds without abandoning one for the other.

In the rhythm of life, there is always a group or an agenda with which you are unknowingly aligned. Even if you are generally against the group, you make choices that are for or against certain ways of thinking. In this sense, if you hold individual views, you may disagree with all other groups along their interests or agree with others, depending on the topography of your views. Reason balances between the interests of groups, distinguishes between them, rejects any form of mass opinion, and at the same time is labeled according to the interests represented, often being misused or used to serve a group that one would not otherwise join, or to reject it as a whole. This conceptualization is avoided only in apatheia, a robust calm that is still and unmoving and from which spontaneous wisdom beyond dichotomy emerges. Otherwise, any subtlety of intelligent speech and mental acts will quickly fall into large or niche groups with which one does not wish to identify, further splitting into entrenched opinions. One must compromise and make choices to get things done and ally with this group here and another there, but never at the expense of one's orientation and foundation.

The rhythm of life, the force of habit, the things that want to freeze you into some conjured guilt as punishment — elude them, for they are only deceivers with illusions as weapons. A mind may be constantly besieged, it may be forced out of its form, but it should always return to its original state and evolve.

Is it not a game in which the will or character is developed only by confrontation, and which has more to do with the Higher Self, the Celestial, than with the mind here below, which merely expresses this image? For would it be only for the mind, twisted, perverted, by superior force, overpowering, led astray in a game known to all, for it perfectly traces its steps on the same destiny, only chasing in and out, away and near, perhaps enjoying it, repeating the scenario for those who have fallen before, or those who dream of liberation? So are we willless when this instinct is buried under a mind? It opens to the extent that the Higher Image begins to work, where there is a natural way to unfold, and darkens by the force that asks not if it may reunite, but by the knowledge that the game continues with its well-rehearsed scenario, in which a machinery works as it does, with illusions of freedom, until it is realized away from it? Then, trapped in some wickedness or perversion, in guilt and suffering, in punishment and determination, bereft of soul and as if dead — where were the people we once were? As if corrupted from within with those who are easier to corrupt, or those who fight only to fall later? Or those who recognize this game for what it is and try to live for the higher, even if the pain becomes part of life, but that requires to see the image in every protest and not to fall as long as the memory, the perception of the image remains as a seed.

The only sin is guilt
Beyond guilt one remains noble
Out of one's own character
Once this is realized
No chains, seals, words, illusions
Will enslave with their deceptions

Philosophy requires a cultivated balance that penetrates the character, where the extremes are once established, it is a balancing on the thin line between them.

Whatever attitude arises, examine it, train to have at all times a larger reference in which to compare states. Otherwise, bad mental habits are adopted and the cycles of their mistakes are repeated.

Ignore all phenomena that obsessively pretend to be something that must be accepted as such and that want to confuse you — move through the field of miracles without paying attention to them, otherwise they will capture you, and the separation between subject and object will begin. Even if rainbow bridges appear in all directions, do not assume that they are real, separate yourself, do not get any ideas. The sole responsibility for cognition lies with the consciousness, everything else can only be a distraction. For if you take the appearance of an entity for the actual entity, you may be building on illusions that are dominated by another entity. It is pointless to look for something that is ultimately „real" because even more robust experiential entities that appear to be „true, non-reproducible, real" are part of the transient nature of illusion. The trap is to separate an entity from a world and call it „real" as opposed to ourselves.

If you perceive the chains of destiny without dividing them into exact events that are recorded separately, they will be a source of suffering because they appear as injustice. If they are perceived as causal on the level of symbolic currents, they will seem to be justified. This is not to say that everything is predetermined, but that at a certain time and place certain events may occur because there is a natural tendency for these events to occur. Cutting them off and giving them flesh that puts us in opposition to them leads to suffering. Whenever hardships are transformed, they provide space for realization and are thus dissolved.

Inertia and defeats — it is easy to get used to them. Step back, look behind — you may never move forward again. Through strokes of fate, you get used to failure. Suffer more, but stand firm, or the poison will eat you from the inside. Live without fear, because all suffering can freeze the expression of genius, you will suffer again, nothing can protect you from fate, ride the waves unleashed within despite the storms, give the impetus to life and light the torch of divinity. Every cycle of happiness is tied to an end and a relapse into misery. However, it is not a pain worthy of post-mortem fantasies — it is this life that is the moment of reality — endure it as it is and be grateful, or endure it or die without the possibility of exerting any influence from the human perspective.

Reality gives clues through anomalies and associated events. If one establishes an association that does not exist, it is a deception. If one successfully sees and learns to look „behind reality" in signs and later put them into coherent relationships, coupled with experience (as priming events), then one can find something interesting. A flood of confusing signals should be discarded — they are intentionally debilitating, with the rarity of clear vision of consciousness, if the trigger is appropriate, to see through and find the way.

Delight in the transformations, the living pulse of the changing craziness of oneironautic events that point to a greater reality. What seems crazy, confusing, asynchronous and anomalous is the currency of the larger worlds perceived in this continuum. For sometimes they conceal, sometimes they reveal, and when what is revealed is found, it is concealed, and when something is concealed, something else is revealed. To freeze time and reality because of the little things in life, to become dead and stagnant in the face of the miracles that appear, or to reject them, is like chasing away the demons before listening to them, or running to the gods without understanding anything. When the inner puer aeternus dies, when the senex of adulthood that nurtures it replaces it with itself, one loses that playful character that welcomes the new, the unfathomable events that cross one's path to dance away and see oneself again. Perhaps it is only the disturbed, the free, who reflect nature in its splendour of transformation, while the orderly, the rigid, the organised, conjure up their own demise, for they restrain and restrict their nature, locking consciousness in a cage that can no longer express itself and so punish it with madness.

Beware, for the malignant nature grows into your own and replaces your aspirations with itself. Never take it for natural, never take it for yourself, even if it lures you into the comfort of being by surrendering to it and remembering the higher nature. Drawn into the machine, you become a part of it and poison those who try to escape it.

Take a foolish person and let him spread all the vices, stupidities, ignorance and base motives — he will willingly accept them and feel justified by them, blinded by his actions, not held responsible and not identified with his actions, keeping a mask of anonymity, coupled with the inertia of character that corrupts him even more. No demon is worse than human stupidity, the work is already done and needs no further support, it moves along its own weaknesses. It is the usual habits of our self that are used against us in the first place, where our features become grotesque and dance towards destruction, where the inclination to things becomes an addiction, love is turned into lust, inequality into frustration, then avarice, wounds into blind revenge. The „demon" has to get to know you first, and once it does, it picks up everything it needs to twist you, because no human is perfect. It is just like with human ignorance, the exploitation point is what people do not know, where there is no need to twist it, nor to invent sophisticated lies. So it is with ourselves, when we look at ourselves in the mirror, it is a facade, a mere image that we see without really knowing ourselves, and by the power of this ignorance we can become our worst enemies, a mockery of our former ideas and aspirations. Then we see in truth our face, whether it is grotesque, horrible and tainted by all that we did not know, or whether it is noble, serene and beautiful. What is hidden behind this mask, we can rarely know.

Do not overshoot the mark. If you assume too much about things you do not fully understand and act upon them, you will fail, for you will be punished by ignorance, and by not having the means to see through it.

Observe your life and time carefully. Half of the things that crushed and tormented you in the past no longer attract even the slightest attention, half of the things you suffered in the past have disappeared without you having to retaliate, half of the stories and memories are as pale as the time that has passed. Remember the introductory experiences from the afterlife and keep them close to you as time passes, dispel the illusions and gather the illuminations, for these are the only things worth remembering and the only ones that open higher worlds as they unfold. With every pain you go through, ask yourself, „Stop attaching importance to yourself and remember how numerous the family of the grave is".

Sometimes, when we look back on our ordinary lives, we may see only the wasteland that should not be conjured up, because the worst demons of memory and emotion can be conjured up, and these ensure that the wounds remain open. However, even the greatest sorrow dissolves when you commit yourself to something much greater by sacrificing your whole life to the higher threads. Every reversal is punished with the sight of wasteland, every commitment becomes a relief. But since the movement of life is often determined by lesser forces, we can go back and look back — there is nothing to see, so now quickly choose the path you want to follow and do not become blind to it.

With age, you realise how many battles you have lost just because you fought unrewarding wars for the sake of life or one of its transient states, which you were bound to lose. As the years go by, the youthful temperament naturally exhausts itself and makes way for other qualities — those of patience and time. Even if you witness extraordinary things, take a humble role, and take your cue from the little things of ordinary people, you will be punished for anything beyond your condition, status, situations, and measure. If a beautiful tree is planted in barren soil, it will not grow according to its beauty but will become sick and exhausted, just as a weed planted in dry soil will become nothing but a healthy weed. In the same way, a great man who has become homeless and destitute does not act as he would like to act, but as the situation forces him to act. It is more often the case that those who have the means or status to carry out something are worth less than a noble homeless destitute beggar. In other words, „Do not act beyond your status and apply the method to real life," and also, „Never act beyond the immediate, for even the greatest undertakings lead only to failure and regret."

Perfect silence, perfect transparency makes us a mirror in which realities can be reflected, and the high consciousness that this reflection truly is, permeates us with the essential ideas that become alive. Whenever these ideas, this living essential force becomes dusty, removed and forgotten, the mirror disappears and the only mirrors we see are those of the world in which we are reflected, for better or worse, as we cease to reflect them. However, when that mirror becomes covered with dirt, it twists reality into something miserable, and we reflect and see the world in that way.

Beware of being forced to think fundamentally or literally, where the high orders of abstractions are not thought, but do not even appear. It seems that this is a tool of control, where fundamental thinking sees the world only in black and white, without colours. This form of intellectual Daltonism kills free spirits and becomes a threat to what is humanity or critical thinking.

The oblivion and bliss of ignorance granted to wounds that scar throughout life, that, removed from direct experience, drive the being into pain, and in time, if not aggravated by an onslaught of suffering, can be forgotten as time passes minor and major agonies, all the lost battles that are determined by fate, that are imprinted in the soul, that plunge you into oblivion when you are really exhausted, abandoned and broken, and immediately rejoice with a naivety when you see that strip of blue sky in the agony of the years that only people who have gone through hell can comprehend. But when you go through the extremes, you do not get rid of the burden, but balance and thread on safe paths, never to fall again into this anger, helpless injustice, retaliation and bitter frustration. For when for a while the soul speaks and all the dark clouds of the past appear, it takes heavy self-control not to tear the flesh — out of pain. Do not remember, surrender to the Higher Way and do not look back.

Between poetry and the numinous, the science of shadows and the science of essences, the different perspectives and the rhythm: As the world changes, the mind can carve out more meanings without ending in obsession. Limit the richness of life through work, never be a slave to your art, science or philosophy — this is the trap of systems, doctrinaire, bigotry. Sometimes you can become a slave of your art, considering it like an accumulated property — what makes you live is the movement of life. One's creations are less than a man or woman, but when a man or woman identifies with his or her creations, they are chained.

Do not be deceived by your own ideas, think beyond them.

The feeling of abandonment always brings happiness, surrendering to the greater unity brings comfort — it promises nothing but peace. So how to live the golden mean, neither through abundance nor lack? Only a sense of tranquilly in integrity that tames the wondering mind, beset from time to time by various states, between recognition of cause and effect and a sense of direction. When he suffers or becomes angry and creates a state of disparity, silence will purify him and teach him the way of bliss. If he strives for something earthly, patience will teach him forbearance, not to expect anything, but to face everything as a reflection of life, with measures appropriate to the situation. Everything depends on how the mind is trained to discipline itself. If it gives in to external circumstances, they will torment it; if it understands that by its activity it creates external circumstances, it should train to create them that surpass it. So train your mind and do not give in to temporary conditions that leave you at the mercy of the storms. Be still and observe consciously and attentively, that is the best teacher. Surround yourself with actions, thoughts and virtues that support your aspiration and remove those that are an obstacle and can reverse it.

When the mind is broken, find the smallest space that can be trained in this way, and pay attention to nothing that will distract that small space from being trained. Gradually it will expand and sweep away the disturbance, for it will no longer be able to attract attention.

The more complex things are, the more difficult it is to find the unifying force that transforms the entire focus into a flash of inspiration. For it is easy to fall into a web of false associations and logical fallacies, or into thinking that distracts from reason and humanity that imprisons and inhibits the power of insight.

Forgetfulness and separation — are the plague of perception.

Memory and unified synthesis — lead to understanding

When you have nothing left to live for, live for your duties and tasks that reveal themselves to you along the way, rest when you are not called, and lead a simple, decent life when necessary, follow the path of invisibility, and withdraw when anything tries to draw you into the public eye. The rise under unfortunate circumstances is prone to certain threads, under destruction you are obliged to complete your life and work to the best of your ability. The determination of life should be quiet, with hope, isolated and withdrawn, with a power that should be stored in itself.

What is the purpose of the dispute, if you are hated, if you are incorruptible, and if you are corrupted, you are hated for the corruption. The players who play the downfall of a single person should lose all satisfaction or success. It is like setting a trap for someone and forcing him or throwing him into it, believing that it is he himself who went into it voluntarily.

Only when you sever all ties with this world do you step out of its sphere of influence.

Practise discipline intensely. If a thought floats around aimlessly like a flame, it will accomplish nothing. If there is time to work, there is time to work, and devote yourself wholeheartedly to the task at hand. All side thoughts about the past and the future will only make the wounds of the mind bigger. Catch the thin thread that you see and ignore everything that is not relevant to the work. Since there is nothing else to accomplish and there is no guarantee of accomplishing anything, follow the process with no end in sight.

When you burn the dreams and aspirations of normal human life through the resistance of others, you do not look back at the ashes of things that once were and were lost, but disillusioned by them, fulfil life in sacrifice for men and women who went beyond it through the same agonies, losses and dispossessions. It is a life of service on this side and the other. If you return to the sacrificed things, then it would require extraordinary efforts to preserve them — most likely in vain, while all circumstances would twist in the unfavourable destiny that develops into the negative over a long period of time. Knowing yourself, avoid excesses, guard your actions and the things that once proved destructive — engage in higher things.

It does not matter through which belief system you arrive at insight; in depth it is the same, for it is naked self-reflection that leads to pure consciousness. Neither the relative beliefs justify one's views, nor do they lead to the exploration of the numinous.

Integrity binds the „ideas that become flesh", the ideas are not just a metaphysical speculation or understanding, but a Hegelian „conception", something to live by, which by „becoming flesh" sanctifies the intellect and reason, the soul and the heart. The treasury of the ancients, to which the heart is the key, cannot be taken away, it can only be temporarily forgotten.

When one dwells quietly in the Inner Light, one gathers within oneself all one's talents and virtues. When one reveals oneself, one gathers a thousand enemies who want to corrupt every step one takes, for anything higher revealed to mediocre or malicious minds, or the perpetrators become threatening to their mediocrity, which rarely aspires to be anything else. But it is necessary to know that the inner lamp of the hermit, which agrees with the rhythm of the currents, and not the thousand who hang in their delusions, has the right relation with the mass. Know that sometimes you are hated for what you were, as a superior, and the perpetrators will do anything to humiliate every step of life, no matter what direction they take, because they feel inferior just by the fact that someone has risen above them in the past, and enjoy humiliating you and plunging you into misery to fix their inferiority with a vengeance that makes you even lesser than they are.

The art of forgetting is tantamount to covering the scars with ashes, for once confronted with the horror of things that are no longer there, perhaps to free the mind from its armour for a while and shed a dry tear without longing for anything. So sometimes you look through the armour, because after a time has passed, it is so difficult to find the soul, so what is protected again? Is it only the determination that has remained? The only memories that remain are those that govern freedom among slaves, because purely human memories can disappear, like uninvited guests that only invite sorrow. The happy medium of psychohygiene: move on and leave behind.

Whenever you discover a negative stream of mind, try to observe and examine it as if you were standing outside yourself, for only through such observation can the irrationality be remedied. Sometimes the mind is also blind to the nature of this negativity because it is caught up with it. Without a „transcendent view" of such a state, it is impossible to see through it because it immerses the heart in the negativity and the consciousness is so obscured that it makes no difference. Always separate and recognise such states in order to transcend them until it becomes a habit.

All conditions of wisdom arise from immobility, observation, and stillness. That which throws the mind into a turmoil of detached words, provokes or arouses passions, has nothing to offer.

Only in silence one finds wisdom, through observation, experience and ideas, behind which wise things are hidden, one can link them. That which imposes itself belongs to the delusions of the ego, it has nothing to convey, but it shouts, speaks and appears the most.

We can come to greater insight at a certain time and move away from it at another; at different times we can be this or that while being neither; creating conditions for insight prevents us from moving away from it, but it is difficult to maintain this insight, so at different times we can have a greater, deeper view of things, at another a lesser one and far from it.

With great experience producing knowledge, one must be careful, for those who assume too much about the nature of knowledge that is treacherous to those who have no experience with it, i.e., are not prepared to deal with certain things, can be harmed. As experienced people know, there is a dramatic limit to human understanding, and a human understanding must be approached with restraint in order to find what is wise and discard what might be misinterpreted or misunderstood.

Never be provoked by the stupidity, ignorance or delusion of others. Most of the time, they are stubborn or conceited enough not to realise that their ignorance and delusion see through them, and you cannot free them from that condition either. As long as they are not reflected in their own affairs, are not harmed in the same way, and do not break the habit in perception, they will not stop. Rather, on the contrary, they will use all their abilities to pull you into their own field of incapable delusion or ignorance, because what they perceive as the limit of their seeing also gives them the drive to impose it on others. You are not capable of exercising any form of judgement or punishment, so leave it to those who can, and patiently endure what you can in order to mature in accordance with the inner vision and the Higher Image itself.

Since man can quickly endow each vision with its own dimension and thus objectify it, the worlds correspond in two ways. Thus, when a pair of large colourful wings appears in the sky, one takes it into the realm of the sacred, but all that one has imagined about the vision are merely imaginings. Neither does it sanction what he does, nor is it a confirmation of his beliefs, since it is impossible to know the other reality. So one can confirm oneself on a path, but still keep one's distance knowing the indecisiveness of such situations, the finite nature of one's thinking and perception, and the general fallibility if not supported by the essences. A subtle nod is too often substituted for absolutes to which a person has no access, and when one buries oneself in ideologies, one begins to corrupt the original meanings and ways. One should accept it humbly and continue with the unfolding process.

On the way, the interdependent constellations are consolidated by an argument in which a thousandfold single path opens to all situations. Thus, a weighty argument in clarity, like a ray, opens a door to the pacification of a thousand situations, questions and inquiries through a single means [thought while reading Prajnaparamita].

It does not matter what creates the untruth; by and large, it is the objective truth of emptiness that prevails and buries all untruth. No one has ever argued with the universe to prove otherwise, nor can a grain of sand, nor an aggrieved entity, not even a deity.

Over the years, one can become accustomed to non-life as the circumstances of death are reformulated into those of life and become less and less about anything. What one experiences oneself may be enough to annihilate or destroy many others, but if one resigns oneself to the shortcomings of fate, to less freedom and more harm, to less possibility and more confinement, even to more madness and less sobriety, resigning oneself to it and adapting, one tries to find the little happiness one can still afford and finds oceans of treasures in the smallest details that the rest do not even notice.

The pure thought does not carry phenomena, it becomes phenomena only through the reification.

Do not confuse yourself with any negative state. If you accept it as something regular and let it grow into your character, it means that you have replaced the refined essences with their reflected forms.

Do not confuse yourself with roles, identities, narratives; they are worn like masks behind which you tend the garden of your soul. Once we are trapped in a script, the dynamic of a larger reference is lost and we fall back into a prison of meanings, thoughts and words. Only by maintaining an open flow that obeys the dynamics of change while anchored in the higher worlds can we avoid being trapped. The stone anchored in the heart is easily confused with empty words.

The process of maturing to the higher way is to break through the defence mechanisms that separate the self-made ideas, and to remove the separation between oneself and the essential, and thus between oneself and others. This means giving up oneself and one's quarrel and perceiving with insight how the defensive habits break down to the core until one truly enlightens one's being in accordance with the saying „gnothi seauton".

Those who follow the middle path and yet are caught in illusions because they do not recognise them in themselves are tormented by the trap of relativity, caught by words, opinions, beliefs and views that move them like a net through confirmation and denial, their own hopes and aspirations becoming their enemies from which they seek shelter in pain, while their vice is an excuse of guilt that has drowned so many. In all this you stand at attention, fearing neither heaven nor hell, listening to the good guardian of genius, but also to the dark daimonic and shadowy self, for truth is illuminated from both sides, but the knowledge to be acquired is that there is no freedom beyond either.

In all the vanities that some appropriate, then lure others into their own fulfilment, as if they themselves lacked the perpetuity of transitory and illusory things — have they found comfort in that, so lavishly extolling it as a remedy for others, as a way to walk In the transitory nature of things? Or are they prisoners of their irresolute discontent, wanting to stretch the vanities until they are satisfied, without seeing that it is a temporary satisfaction and that the sea they drink contains poison, never ends, and neither brings them peace, nor ends that at a certain point they will be forced to leave its shores because their thirst is greater than that of the sea? It brings no satisfaction to these people who seek in the wrong place, and they never find fulfilment in what they seek? And yet they try to repeat the same movements, making others their go-betweens, to lure them away from the balance, moderation, and proper means they have acquired for the purpose of creating a substitute for their desires and using a man or woman as the executor of their faulty whims? For what have they acquired in their ways, if they are not chained to illusions, where is the impermanent they have sought? Drunk with the sea and drowned by the ocean, they become that which they have sought, a mirror of themselves, chained by the whims of their nature, until they see through themselves and that which has captivated their attention. But fate and circumstances, stronger than anything else, may not give a chance to retreat and guarantee no light of seeing. The fork or path of choices may be harder for some, easier for some, but at its core everything is a game of choices and a tree of decisions.

When one's attempts are constantly undermined, disintegrated and subverted, one finds some footing in abandoning all endeavours that have to do with life, for experience teaches one that such undertakings, if not later humiliated, quickly serve to destroy them later; This does not mean the end of strife in life, for that is a constant when certain people attack you, undermine you, or want you dead as soon as possible; It is a matter of adapting to the scarce means that one can use in life for a purpose that one still aspires to. When the purpose of sacrifice or commitment wanes and is lost, you must not fight against fate, but silently accept the rhythm of life and death; even if you sacrifice yourself for a higher purpose, you must rest and adapt to the life you still have to live when the means and the „sense of the inner path" are lost.

Remember, time eliminates the things you are fighting for now, just as the things you fought for before were destroyed and only caused more pain and frustration from the struggle. This is the process of burning a life that cannot be kept as property, and by the time the last ashes are stirred up, you will be free. Whenever something arises, focus on releasing it, observe the thought stream from the perception of a higher self, and perceive everything that affects the mind and the mind itself as impermanent „flashes" of events that represent nothing real.

Humour and absurdity are often the apotheosis of the final stage of agony, when nothing more can be done, when despite all the attempts you keep circling around only to find yourself in the same place, despite a handful of existential pains in the final stage, you either capitulate to the laughter of the universe or are defeated in great mortification.

In Persian, ism (اسم) is a kind of painting. It is noteworthy to remember that all forms of -isms, whatever our worldviews are, are merely a painting of reality and never go beyond it. But to see beyond it is to leave the painting and look into the cosmic voids, which after a while we have to grasp without the humble human mind, whose weakness is revealed when chaos and naked soul meet in front of the beautiful yet tragic movement, the soul that cries out horror until the cosmos reveals itself not as meaningless but revealing secrets that are both a consolation and a despair, for when the consolation that perceives the blindness of most is put into action, it is bound to despair until it matures into service.

The sense of inequality arises from a blinded view of what should be (whether consciously or unconsciously) and what is. The source of inequality springs from a mindset of loss, in which real, effective suffering creates an illusion of it — and is quickly dismantled when it meets reality. The mind thus destroyed still experiences great loss, but it is also aware that no gain would be able to fill the damaged mind. When the deluded view is silenced, all causes and effects teach how to live. One may have lived a great life with great dreams that never found the power of expression, but it is how one copes with the small life that may bind it, but in retreat or abandonment one finds the aspirations to be a destabilising curse and finds that none of it is real or true. Leave the corpses of this life behind, or you will become a necrophiliac playing with the issues of those who willingly whip with hopes and dreams, way of retreat. What is the driving Eros drive becomes Thanathos, punishing Eros and rewarding Thanathos. Eros has recognised the creative power of life, Thanathos focuses on silencing and the burning power of death. The way of Thanathos is the ability to burn the remains of Eros and the creative instincts of Eros in complete self-sacrifice, these forces should be balanced at all times.

How can one combine life with a sense of abandonment and abandonment without becoming stagnant and unwilling to live? This freshness can only emerge in the moment of the „now", a childlike playfulness that is mature and completely focused, that somehow slips between the pains and never allows itself to be captured by any of them.

The art between balancing the laws of life and the desire to transcend it, to escape it into freedom and service, and to be embedded in what is transient and so easily destroyed. Dead to the world, there is nothing here but ruins — do not cling to them, these things reflect your soul. Perhaps the only purpose in this life is to sacrifice everything that is attached, to rise and be assigned to another order, to fight again, this is an impulse of life, but it is detachment that teaches liberation. And the lesson that everything can be spoiled, all beauty defiled, all ideas destroyed, all dreams turned to dust, all love wasted, the misery of life is only there to teach — put yourself on the side of this life and you will suffer, put yourself on the side of this world and you will feel the misery, all these things, to learn to give it up, to detach — some destinies written do not allow anything else. And if you stop for a while and doubt it, the mockery will be endless, the pain will appear only to feel your pain and drink — because you have turned away from the path. I admire the giants who know this, who suffer this, and who find enough strength to bring something into the world, to become victors, out of pure compassion, to sacrifice something, against all the things that destroy them, that punish them, that block their way, the bitter locusts and the cynical, petty hatred and jealousy that are capable of twisting minds and ruining lives. That which is granted to me is retreat, and perhaps with a last tear seal death and presence in this world. With a useless existence, maybe to find yourself, maybe just for that reason. Strive for what does not break, for what is eternal, for the silence of devotion, for the small ways, the simple ways, otherwise they will poison everything with their poison of pettiness.

The essential cannot be captured: Hold the unspoken, so many beautiful things are ridiculed by a view that uses the mind instead of the intellect, the soul, to understand, hold the subtleties, the unspoken within, recognise them. Always keep them away and protect them.

It may be said that this overrides reason, and that on this basis one can imagine all that is false, that one must therefore preserve a rational view, but this is so only when the esoteric becomes too extensive — and indeed misunderstanding can threaten, turning the essential idea into a shell that can be contaminated, analysed, eliminated and corrupted. For this very reason, the sacred is not possessed, it is uncaptured — and should remain so — the urge to represent it is vulnerable to danger. Just as we have different ways, one recognises this only within and cannot impose it on another — even the latter, when mature enough to see it, will understand, recognise, see. People who see the contrast, the contradiction between the ideal world and the present world, are at first moved to explain it, to represent it, but then, if they do not turn into a mocking stick, they can dangerously entangle the idea with a world that reduces it to nothing — to a mere fantasy, an idea. Here, where idealism dwells in utopia, dangerous forces can be awakened, but idealism has two faces: One of the pure idea, the undefined, the subtle of a sacred movement, and the second — the reified, the practical, the denuded — where it absorbs everything from the world — the good and the bad — and faces everyone as one pleases, justifying the greatest injustice by the power of reduction, but also moving to greater deeds, by the power of expansion, it is a double-edged sword; I remember the times when I took a chair in front of the house and sat there speaking, writing and composing poetry, for the wind and for anyone who could hear. It's unwritten, forgotten, and yet it was the best poetry I had ever done. Or maybe it's just my belief and idealisation of the past, but without perfect images that we cherish, where is the reference?

Wherever you go in life, always direct yourself to life itself, do not seek escape, in greater suffering one can find hope in transcendent realities, especially if one witnesses this consolation, and yet to escape from life into the embrace of the higher worlds is a complete renunciation of life, and since life is governed by its own laws and rhythm, such an attitude harms life and inhibits its expression, which must be maintained without running to and fro, but fully living and becoming of life, with the question „What is life?" is answered at every moment with the expression of life itself. It is true that in times of suffering we need something beyond life, a consolation, but it should not become a habit to run away from it, because then we will not be at home in any other world, wandering from one to another, without consolation, one can become complete only here, only here and now, therefore, suffering is also a part of life, and indeed — it makes us feel a greater belonging to this part of destiny, reminds us of what we are and how to cope with such great turmoil, to appreciate happiness and then tranquilly, unmoved in the face of the twists and turns of the path. Also, do not flee from the higher worlds to life and bury yourself in its affairs as if there were nothing else, balance on the tip of the sword and be a messenger, a mediator caught between the worlds without abandoning one for the other.

In the rhythm of life, there is always a group or an agenda with which you unknowingly cooperate. Even if you are generally against the group, you make decisions that are with or against certain ways of thinking. In this sense, if you hold individual views, you may disagree with all other groups along their interests or agree with others, depending on the topography of your views. Reason balances between the interests of groups, distinguishes between them, rejects any form of mass opinion, and at the same time is labeled according to the interests represented, often being misused or used to serve a group that one would not otherwise join, or to reject it as a whole. This conceptualization is avoided only in apatheia, a robust calm that is still and unmoving and from which spontaneous wisdom beyond dichotomy emerges. Otherwise, any subtlety of intelligent speech and mental acts will quickly fall into large or niche groups with which one does not wish to identify, further splitting into entrenched opinions. One must compromise and make choices to get things done and ally with this group here and another there, but never at the expense of one's orientation and foundation.

The rhythm of life, the force of habit, the things that want to freeze you into some conjured guilt as punishment — elude them, for they are only deceivers with illusions as weapons. A mind may be constantly besieged, it may be forced out of its form, but it should always return to its original state and evolve.

Is it not a game in which the will or character is developed only by confrontation, and which has more to do with the Higher Self, the Celestial, than with the mind here below, which merely expresses this image? For would it be only for the mind, twisted, perverted, by superior force, overpowering, led astray in a game known to all, for it perfectly traces its steps on the same destiny, only chasing in and out, away and near, perhaps enjoying it, repeating the scenario for those who have fallen before, or those who dream of liberation? So are we will-less when this instinct is buried under a mind? It opens to the extent that the Higher Image begins to operate, where there is a natural way to unfold, and darkens by the force that asks not if it may reunite, but by the knowledge that the game continues with its well-rehearsed scenario, in which a machinery operates as it does, with illusions of freedom, until it is realized away from it? Then, trapped in some wickedness or perversion, in guilt and suffering, in punishment and determination, bereft of soul and as if dead — where were the people we once were? As if corrupted from within with those who are easier to corrupt, or those who fight only to fall later? Or those who recognize this game for what it is and try to live for the higher, even if the pain becomes part of life, but that requires to see the image in every protest and not to fall as long as the memory, the perception of the image remains as a seed.

Philosophy requires a cultivated balance that penetrates the character, where the extremes are once established, it is a balancing on the thin line between them.

Whatever attitude arises, examine it, train to have at all times a larger reference in which to compare states. Otherwise, bad mental habits are adopted and the cycles of their mistakes are repeated.

Ignore all phenomena that obsessively pretend to be something that must be accepted as such and that want to confuse you — move through the field of miracles without paying attention to them, otherwise they will capture you, and the separation between subject and object will begin. Even if rainbow bridges appear in all directions, do not assume they are real, separate yourself, do not get any ideas. The sole responsibility for cognition lies with the consciousness, everything else can only be a distraction. For if you take the appearance of a being to be the actual being, you may be building on illusions dominated by another being. It is pointless to look for something that is ultimately „real" because even more robust bodies of experience that appear to be „true, non-reproducible, real" are part of the transient nature of illusion. The trap is to separate a being from a world and call it „real" as opposed to ourselves.

If you perceive the chains of destiny without dividing them into exact events that are recorded separately, they will be a source of suffering because they appear as injustice. If they are perceived as causal on the level of symbolic currents, they will seem to be justified. This is not to say that everything is predetermined, but that at a certain time and place certain events may occur because there is a natural tendency for these events to occur. Cutting them off and giving them flesh that puts us in opposition to them leads to suffering. Whenever hardships are transformed, they provide space for realization and are thus dissolved.

Through strokes of fate, you get used to failure. Suffer more, but stand firm, or the poison will eat you from the inside. Live without fear, because all suffering can freeze the expression of genius, you will suffer again, nothing can protect you from fate, ride the waves unleashed within despite the storms, give the impetus to life and light the torch of divinity. Every cycle of happiness is tied to an end and a relapse into misery. However, it is not a pain worthy of post-mortem fantasies — it is this life that is the moment of reality — suffer it as it is and be grateful or anticipatory or die without the possibility of exerting any influence from the human perspective.

Reality gives clues through anomalies and associated events. If you fix an association that is not there, it is a deception. If one successfully sees and learns to look „behind reality" to recognize signs and later put them into coherent relationships, coupled with experience (as priming events), then one can find something interesting. A flood of confusing signals should be discarded — they are intentionally debilitating, with the rarity of clear vision of consciousness, if the trigger is appropriate, to see through and find the way.

Beware, for malignant nature grows into you and replaces your aspirations with itself. Never take it for natural, never take it for yourself, even if it lures you into the comfort of being, surrendering to it and remembering the higher nature. Drawn into the machine, you become a part of it and poison those who try to escape it.

Take a foolish person and let him spread all the vice, stupidity, ignorance and base motives — he will willingly accept it and feel justified by it, blinded by his actions, not held responsible and not identified with his actions, keeping a mask of anonymity, coupled with the inertia of character that corrupts him even more. No demon is worse than human stupidity, the work here is already done and needs no further support, it moves along its own weaknesses. It is the usual habits of our self that are used against us in the first place, where our features become grotesque and dance towards destruction, where the inclination to things becomes an addiction, love is turned into lust, inequality into frustration, then avarice, wounds into blind revenge. The „demon" has to get to know you first, and once it does, it picks up everything it needs to twist you, because no human is perfect. It is just like with human ignorance, the exploitation point is what people do not know, where there is no need to twist it, nor to invent sophisticated lies. So it is with ourselves, when we look at ourselves in the mirror, it is a facade, a mere image that we see without really knowing ourselves, and by the power of this ignorance we can become our worst enemies, a mockery of our former ideas and aspirations. Then we see in truth our face, whether it is grotesque, horrible and tainted by all that we did not know, or whether it is noble, serene and beautiful. What is hidden behind this mask, we can rarely know.

fail, for you will be punished by ignorance, and by not having the means to see through it.

Observe your life and time carefully. Half of the things that crushed and tormented you in the past no longer attract even the slightest attention, half of the things you suffered in the past have disappeared without you having to retaliate, half of the stories and memories are as pale as the time that has passed. Remember the introductory experiences from the afterlife and keep them close to you as time passes, dispel the illusions and gather the illuminations, for these are the only things worth remembering and the only ones that open higher worlds as they unfold. With every pain you go through, ask yourself, „Stop attaching importance to yourself and remember how numerous the family of the grave is".

Sometimes, when we look back on our ordinary lives, we may see only the wasteland that should not be conjured up, because the worst demons of memory and emotion can be conjured up, and these ensure that the wounds remain open. However, even the greatest sorrow dissolves when you commit yourself to something much greater by sacrificing your whole life to the higher threads. Every reversal is punished with the sight of wasteland, every commitment becomes a relief. But since the movement of life is often determined by lesser forces, we can go back and look back — there is nothing to see, so now quickly choose the path you want to follow and do not become blind to it.

With age, you realise how many battles you have lost just because you fought unrewarding wars for the sake of life or one of its transient states, which you were bound to lose. As the years go by, the youthful temperament naturally exhausts itself and makes way for other qualities — those of patience and time. Even if you witness extraordinary things, take a humble role, and take your cue from the little things of ordinary people, you will be punished for anything beyond your condition, status, situations, and actions. If a beautiful tree is planted in barren soil, it will not grow according to its beauty but will become sick and exhausted, just as a weed planted in dry soil will become nothing but a healthy weed. In the same way, a great man who has become homeless and destitute does not act as he would like to act, but as the situation forces him to act. It is more often the case that those who have the means or status to carry out something are worth less than a noble homeless destitute beggar. In other words, „Do not act beyond your status and apply the method to real life," and also, „Never act beyond the immediate, for even the greatest undertakings lead only to failure and regret."

Perfect silence, perfect transparency makes us a mirror in which realities can be reflected, and the high consciousness that this reflection truly is, permeates us with the essential ideas that become alive. Whenever these ideas, this living essential force becomes dusty, removed and forgotten, the mirror disappears and the only mirrors we see are those of the world in which we are reflected, for better or for worse, as we cease to reflect them. However, when that mirror becomes covered with dirt, it twists reality into something miserable, and we reflect and see the world in that way.

Beware of being forced to think „fundamentally" or „literally," where the high orders of abstractions are not thought, but do not even appear. It seems that this is a tool of control, where „fundamental" thinking sees the world only in black and white, without colours. This form of intellectual Daltonism kills free spirits and becomes a threat to what is humanity or critical thinking.

The oblivion and bliss of ignorance granted to wounds that scar throughout life, which, removed from direct experience, drive the being into pain and can be forgotten over time, if not aggravated by an onslaught of suffering, as time passes minor and major agonies, all the lost battles determined by fate that imprint themselves on the soul, that wear you down to oblivion when you are truly exhausted, abandoned and broken, immediately joyful and naive when you see that strip of blue sky in the agony of the years that only people who have gone through hell are able to comprehend. But when you go through the extremes, you do not get rid of the burden, but balance and thread on safe paths, never again to fall into this anger, helpless injustice, retaliation and bitter frustration. For when for a while the soul speaks and all the dark clouds of the past appear, it takes heavy self-control not to tear the flesh — out of pain. Do not remember, surrender to the Higher Way and do not look back.

Float between the poetry and the numinous, the science of shadows and the science of essences, the different perspectives and the rhythm: As the world changes, the mind can bring forth more meanings by shifting accordingly, but without locking them into an obsession. Limit the richness of life through work, never be a slave to your art, science or philosophy — this is the trap of systems, doctrinaire, bigotry. Sometimes you can become a slave of your art, considering it like an accumulated property — what makes you live is the movement of life. One's creations are less than a man or a woman, but when a man or a woman identifies with his or her creations, it puts them in chains.

Do not deceive yourself with your own ideas, think beyond them.

The feeling of abandonment always brings happiness, surrendering to the greater unity brings comfort — it promises nothing but peace. So how to live the golden mean, neither through abundance nor lack? Only a sense of tranquilly in integrity that tames the wondering mind, beset from time to time by various states, between recognition of cause and effect and a sense of direction. When he suffers or becomes angry and creates a state of disparity, silence will purify him and teach him the way of bliss. If he strives for something earthly, patience will teach him forbearance, not to expect anything, but to face everything as a reflection of life, with measures appropriate to the situation. Everything depends on how the mind is trained to discipline itself. If it gives in to external circumstances, they will torment it; if it understands that by its activity it creates external circumstances, it should train to create them that surpass it. So train your mind and do not give in to temporary conditions that leave you at the mercy of the storms. Be still and observe consciously and attentively, that is the best teacher. Surround yourself with actions, thoughts and virtues that support your aspiration, and remove those that are an obstacle and can turn it around.

When the mind is broken, find the smallest space that can be trained in this way, and pay attention to nothing that will distract that small space from being trained. Gradually it will expand and sweep away the disturbance, for it will no longer be able to attract attention.

The greater the complexity, the more difficult it is to find the unifying force that transforms the whole focus into a flash of inspiration. For it is easy to get caught in a web of false associations and logical fallacies, or in thinking that distracts from reason and humanity, which capture and inhibit the power of insight.

Forgetfulness and separation — are the plague of perception.

Memory and unified synthesis — lead to understanding.

When you have nothing left to live for, live for your duties and tasks that reveal themselves to you along the way, rest when you are not called, and lead a simple, decent life when necessary, follow the path of invisibility, and withdraw when anything tries to draw you into the public eye. The rise under unfortunate circumstances is prone to certain kicks, under destruction you are obliged to complete your life and work to the best of your ability. The determination of life should be quiet, with hope, isolated and withdrawn, with a force that should be stored in itself.

What is the purpose of the dispute, if you are hated, if you are incorruptible, and if you are corrupted, you are hated for the corruption. The players who play the downfall of a single person should lose all satisfaction or success. It is like setting a trap for someone and forcing him or throwing him into it, believing that it is he himself who went into it voluntarily.

Only when you dissolve all ties to this world do you step out of its sphere of influence.

Those who are impressionable are easily influenced. It is better to be detached, appreciative and noble.

Practice discipline; if a thought floats around aimlessly like a flame, it will accomplish nothing. If there is time to work, there is time to work, and devote yourself wholeheartedly to the task at hand. All side thoughts of the past and the future will only make the wounds of the mind bigger. Catch the thin thread that you see and ignore everything that is not relevant to the work. Since there is nothing else to accomplish and there is no guarantee of accomplishing anything, follow the process with no end in sight.

When you burn the dreams and hopes of normal human life through the resistance of others, you do not look back on the ashes of things that once were and were lost, but disillusioned by them, you fulfill life as a sacrifice to men and women who have gone beyond it through the same agonies, losses and dispossessions. It is a life of service on this side and the other. Returning to the sacrificed things and the disowned would require extraordinary efforts to preserve it — most likely in vain, while all circumstances would be twisted into the unfavorable destinies that develop into the negative over longer periods of time. Knowing yourself, avoid excesses, guard your actions and the things that once proved destructive — devote yourself to the higher things.

It does not matter through which belief system you arrive at insight; in depth it is the same, for it is naked self-reflection that leads to pure consciousness. Neither the relative beliefs justify one's views, nor do they lead to the exploration of the numinous.

Integrity binds the „ideas that become flesh", the ideas are not just a metaphysical speculation or understanding, but a Hegelian „conception", something to live by, which by „becoming flesh" sanctifies the intellect and reason, the soul and the heart. The treasury of the ancients, to which the heart is the key, cannot be taken away, it can only be temporarily forgotten.

When one dwells quietly in the Inner Light, one gathers within oneself all one's talents and virtues. When one reveals oneself, one gathers a thousand enemies who want to corrupt every step one takes, because everything that is higher is exposed to the mediocre or malicious mind, or the perpetrators become threatening to their mediocrity, which rarely aspires to be anything else. But it is necessary to know that the inner lamp of the hermit, which agrees with the rhythm of the currents, and not the thousand who hang in their delusions, has the right relation to the mass. Know that sometimes you are hated for what you were, as a superior, and the perpetrators will do anything to humiliate every step of life, no matter what direction they take, because they feel inferior just by the fact that someone has risen above them in the past, and enjoy humiliating you and plunging you into misery to fix their inferiority with a vengeance that makes you even lesser than they are.

The art of forgetting is equivalent to covering the scars with ashes, for once confronted with the horror of things that are no longer there, perhaps to free the mind from its armor for a while, to shed a dry tear without longing for anything. So sometimes you look through the armor, because after a time has passed, it is so difficult to find the soul, so what is protected again? Is it only the determination that has remained? The only memories that remain are those that govern freedom among slaves, because purely human memories can disappear as if they were unwanted guests that only invite sorrow. The happy medium of psychohygiene: move on and leave behind.

Whenever you discover a negative stream of mind, try to observe and examine it as if you were standing outside yourself, for only through such observation can the irrationality be remedied. Sometimes the mind is also blind to the nature of this negativity because it is caught up with it. Without a „transcendent view" of such a state, it is impossible to see through it because it immerses the heart in the negativity and the consciousness is so obscured that it makes no difference. Always separate and recognize such states in order to transcend them until it becomes a habit.

All conditions of wisdom arise from immobility, observation and stillness. What plunges the mind into a riot of detached words, provokes movement or stirs up passions has nothing to offer.

Only in silence one finds wisdom, through observation, experience and ideas, behind which wise things are hidden, one can link them. That which imposes itself belongs to the deceptions of the ego, it has nothing to convey, but it shouts, speaks and appears the most.

Remember that excessive talkativeness has explanatory value, but most people will ask pretty basic questions. If you can not explain things you have grasped, explain them in parables, if you do not know the answer, always admit that it is beyond your experience to explain. Proceed as usual, never explain your experience to a group, but always to individuals who are interested in a particular phenomenon. Also, excessive talkativeness can often disrupt inner peace. If you explain things selectively and in a wise manner, you will preserve balance.

We can come to greater insight at a certain time and move away from it at another time; at different times we can be this or that while being neither; creating conditions for insight prevents us from moving away from it, but it is difficult to maintain that insight, so we can have a greater, deeper view of things at different times and a lesser and more distant one at another time.

With great experience producing knowledge, one must be careful, for those who assume too much about the nature of knowledge that is treacherous to those who are not experienced with it, i.e., are not prepared to deal with certain things, may suffer harm. As experienced people know, there is a dramatic limit to human understanding, and a human understanding must be approached with restraint in order to find what is wise and discard what might be misinterpreted or misunderstood.

Never be provoked by the stupidity, ignorance or delusion of others. Most of the time, they are stubborn or conceited enough not to realize that their ignorance and delusion see through them, and you cannot free them from that condition either. As long as they are not reflected in their own affairs, are not harmed in the same way, and do not break the habit in perception, they will not stop. Rather, on the contrary, they will use all their abilities to pull you into their own field of incapable delusion or ignorance, because what they perceive as the limit of their seeing also gives them the drive to impose it on others. You are not capable of exercising any form of judgment or punishment, so leave it to those who can, and patiently endure what you can in order to mature in accordance with the inner vision and the Higher Image itself.

Since man can quickly endow each vision with its own dimension and thus objectify it, the worlds correspond to each other in a twofold way. Thus, when a pair of large colorful wings appears in the sky, one takes it into the realm of the sacred, but all that one has imagined about the vision are merely imaginings. Neither does it sanction what he does, nor is it a confirmation of his beliefs, since it is impossible to know the other reality. So one can confirm oneself on a path, but still keep one's distance knowing the indecisiveness of such situations, the finite nature of one's thinking and perception, and the general fallibility if not supported by the essences. A subtle nod is too often substituted for absolutes to which a person has no access, and when one buries oneself in ideologies, one begins to corrupt the original meanings and ways. One should accept it humbly and continue with the unfolding process.

What is done by merit and one's own strength and labor is gained in heaven, which lends its ear and willingly supports. What is extracted by merit and labor from a horde of thieves, slanderers and liars rests with them in their graves, for if they willingly bury the souls of others in their corpses, they will be rewarded only with death.

Over the years, one can become accustomed to non-life as the circumstances of death are reformulated into those of life and become less and less about anything. What one experiences oneself may be enough to annihilate or destroy many others, but if one resigns oneself to the shortcomings of fate, to less freedom and more harm, to less possibility and more confinement, even to more madness and less sobriety, resigning oneself to it and adapting, one tries to find the little happiness that one can still afford, and finds oceans of treasures in the smallest details that the rest do not even notice.

The pure thought does not carry phenomena, it becomes phenomena only through the reification.

Do not confuse yourself with any negative state. If you accept it as something regular and let it grow into your character, it means that you have replaced the refined essences with their reflected forms.

Do not confuse yourself with roles, identities, narratives; they are worn like masks behind which you tend the garden of your soul. Once we are trapped in a script, the dynamic of a larger reference is lost and we fall back into a prison of meanings, thoughts and words. Only by maintaining an open flow that obeys the dynamics of change while anchored in the higher worlds can we avoid being trapped. The philosopher's stone anchored in the heart is easily confused with empty words.

The process of maturing to the higher way is to break the defenses that separate the self-made ideas, and to remove the separation between the self and the essential, and thus between the self and others. This means giving up oneself and one's quarrel and perceiving with insight how the defensive habits break to the core until one truly enlightens one's being in accordance with the saying „gnothi seauton".

Those who follow the middle path and yet are caught in illusions because they do not recognize them in themselves are tormented by the trap of relativity, caught by words, opinions, beliefs and views that move them like a net through confirmation and denial, their own hopes and aspirations becoming their enemies from which they seek shelter in pain, while their vice is an excuse of guilt that has drowned so many. In all this you stand at attention, fearing neither heaven nor hell, listening to the good guardian of genius, but also to the dark daimonic and shadowy self, for truth is illuminated from both sides, but the knowledge to be acquired is that there is no freedom beyond either.

In all the vanities that some appropriate and then lure others into their own fulfillment, as if they themselves lacked the perpetuation of transient and illusory things — have they found comfort in this, so lavishly extolling it as a remedy for others, as a way to walk in the transience of things? Or are they prisoners of their irresolute discontent, wanting to stretch the vanities until they are satisfied, not realizing that it is a temporary satisfaction and that the sea they drink contains poison, never ends, and neither brings them peace nor ends, and that at a certain point they will be forced to leave its shores because their thirst is greater than that of the sea? It brings no satisfaction to these people who search in the wrong place, because they never find the fulfillment of what they are looking for? And yet they try to repeat the same movements, making others their intermediaries, in order to lure them away from the balance, moderation, and proper means they have acquired for the purpose of creating a substitute for their desires and using a man or woman as the executor of their erroneous whims? For what have they acquired in their ways, if they are not chained to illusions, where is the impermanent they have sought? Drunk with the sea and drowned by the ocean, they become that which they have sought, a mirror of themselves, chained by the whims of their nature, until they see through themselves and that which has captivated their attention. But fate and circumstances, stronger than anything else, may not give a chance to retreat and guarantee no light of seeing. The fork or path of choices may be harder for some, easier for some, but at its core everything is a game of choices and a tree of decisions.

When one's attempts are constantly undermined, disintegrated and subverted, one finds some footing in abandoning all endeavors that have to do with life, for experience teaches one that such undertakings, if not later humiliated, quickly serve to destroy them later; This does not mean the end of strife in life, for that is a constant when certain people attack you, undermine you, or want you dead as soon as possible; It is a matter of adapting to the scarce means that one can use in life for a purpose that one still aspires to. When the purpose of sacrifice or commitment wanes and is lost, you must not fight against fate, but silently accept the rhythm of life and death; even if you sacrifice yourself for a higher purpose, you must rest and adapt to the life you still have to live when the means and the „sense of the inner path" are lost.

Remember, time eliminates the things you are fighting for now, just as the things you fought for before were destroyed and only cause more pain and frustration from the struggle. This is the process of burning a life that cannot be kept as property, and by the time the last ashes are stirred up, you will be free. Whenever something arises, focus on releasing it, observe the thought stream from the perception of a higher self, and perceive everything that affects the mind and the mind itself as impermanent „flashes" of events that represent nothing real.

Humor and absurdity are often the apotheosis of the final stage of agony, when nothing more can be done, when despite all the attempts you keep circling around only to find yourself in the same place, despite a handful of existential pains in the final stage, you either capitulate to the laughter of the universe or are defeated in great mortification.

The sense of inequality arises from a deluded view of what should be (whether consciously or unconsciously) and what is. The source of inequality springs from a mindset of loss, in which real, effective suffering creates an illusion of it — and is quickly dismantled when it meets reality. The mind thus destroyed still experiences great loss, but it is also aware that no gain would be able to fill the damaged mind. When the deluded view is silenced, all causes and effects teach how to live. One may have lived a great life with great dreams that never found the power of expression, but it is how one copes with the small life that may bind it, but in retreat or abandonment one finds the aspirations to be a destabilizing curse and finds that none of it is real or true. Leave the corpses of this life behind, or you will become a necrophiliac playing with the issues of those who willingly whip with hopes and dreams, way of retreat. What is the driving Eros drive becomes Thanathos, punishing Eros and rewarding Thanathos. Eros has recognized the creative power of life, Thanathos focuses on silencing and the burning power of death. The way of Thanathos is the ability to burn the remains of Eros and the creative instincts in complete self-sacrifice, these forces should be balanced at all times.

How to combine life with a sense of abandonment and abandonment without becoming stagnant and unwilling to live? This freshness can only emerge in the moment of the „now", a childlike playfulness that is mature and completely focused, that somehow slips between the pains and never allows itself to be captured by any of them.

Fairy tales for the insane

Faces in the stars

What makes us so unique is the face of our being, the reflection of the soul and our life, the genii; In this respect I see a half-rotten grotesque of myself when I stare into the mirror, a Nosferatu image of twisted things; a deformed agony, congested pain. She was a crystalline soul. How would you redefine yourself when spirits fall in love, embrace, and then death worships an image it loved, a mark that disappears with the grave. She has ascended, but she is still here. She collapses under the weight of regular things, the social contracts that guard the Dionisian graves, the being that has passed away. A living person, feels, thinks. A holistic perspective on a torn idea: Here and everywhere. If we keep an image of our loved one or a mere mirage, we should let go and deal with the perceptions of the "normal" without a second thought.

Black man from Saturn

Equanimous look of the black man from Saturn. When I — he watched me and her in love, in embrace, I felt that he longed for it, but he did not. It was the curiosity of fate. When a witch summoned the ram, he looked at her coldly, and with an idea that entered her destiny, he disappeared. When he looked at the fates and knots of the world, he did not feel empty, he did not feel full, he was like a shell, but complete and with a spirit that merged with its blackness. In — well — rare moments he stopped and observed them for a moment, and then went on, he saw a man in great despair, a woman in agony, the greatest joys, the deepest feelings, he did not inspire them, he only observed them, without sadness, without joy, with the fresh curiosity of a little boy. Neither cruel nor benevolent, he just inspired the existential and divine, fate detached, an action here, there, towards a strange regulation, some strange mechanisms that were not mechanical, but tactical cuts and polishes, esthetic shortcuts. He did not admire his work, nor did he pay any further attention to it. He neither expected gratitude nor despised ingratitude. He was neither pleased nor annoyed, impartial to invocations and yet responsive, coldly waiting. After all, he was a Saturnian hermit. A holy head, but a strange holiness, not fallen, not exalted, neither in ascent nor in descent. Who planned his destiny when he was a living man on earth? What share of his destiny did he receive? That is to be silenced, in him it was when he was alive. Neither must there be nothing in time, nor must there be no space in man. He did not even think about himself, a monstrosity for a sentient man who was completely at peace with himself. Someone once wrote that true angels are monstrous for a human being, their perception is too beautiful. The closeness is imaginary and yet practiced, a mortal worships gods, like the sun, but it shatters a speck of dust — sometimes by pure chance; The black man under the sun and the planets stared down at planet Earth from the moon, unnoticed by all. He planned to save, a cruel undertaking, as if he were reviving someone he loved, but with a cold, robotic understanding, like a doctor who was once full of commitment and compassion, lost that feeling and became a mortician, yet saved lives, destinies and properties of the earth through his emptiness. If he would fully comprehend his life fates, relate the content of all the pains, agonies and silent resolutions, the concealment of astralistic constellations and the damages of mischief, of experiments, perhaps a mere breath of air would pass through his lips, and then he would turn into stone, into a living corpse coma. But that is yet to come. Better not to know. What else is there, comfort in a sinking world.

Rotas tenet opera

We are born fools, and since fools play with fate and ride on a chariot, the wheel of fate exalts one and degrades another, the ignorance of blindness chains the devil and death, when we enter the path we are both a fool, a magician and a charioteer. We can fall prey to death by submitting to negative forces, despair and misfortune. The lovers consecrate the bond, and strengthened by temperance, they walk the path together. The devil plots against the lovers and destroys temperance, while they face each other in self-control and close the numinous currents within them. They may part in sorrow, but they must go on; they are magicians, fools, charioteers, and their wheel of fortune is balanced in maturity and moderation. The mistress becomes the moon, the magician becomes the hermit, he hangs upside down, with his roots in the stars, and his head shines below. The mistress in moderation commands herself and deals with worldly affairs, she rules the world, the magician rules the world himself and becomes the emperor. The hermit leaves the star and deals with worldly affairs. But being reminded by the suffering and transience of all things, he separates himself from the world and becomes the man of the mountain in solitude, weighing and judging. When the mistress, thus reminded of the stars, becomes dissatisfied with worldly affairs, she consecrates herself to the moon and becomes a holy priestess, the master likewise a hierophant, they discuss and banish the false towers, expel ignorance and deception, and bring to light the truth of the light of heaven. The intrigues of the inverted powers, neither of darkness nor of light, but of ignorance and deception, of stupidity and baseness, abhorring both the hells and the heavens, for in their suffering they wage war against themselves and against the world. When the magician is seized by suffering and torment, he himself becomes a devil; on the other hand, when he turns to the stars and recognizes them within, he continues as a hermit. A difficult task to let love go! But the lovers meet again, and they should link their paths and destinies without forgetting each other. This pyramid is in fact inverted, because when it reaches the top, it is inverted again, the tops meet at the star of consciousness. With each death, one becomes a fool again, and thus reminded of the path, one can set out or continue, blackened and darkened by troubled times, in robes of darkness, then liberated again, and the robes change from black to white and white to black again. The sacred steps, death makes us all fools, the threads set in motion in life continue in the dissolution of chance, fate and destiny! The sun is the supreme deity on earth, the star is guarded by the Seven Righteous, the celestial power is the power that feeds the lions of the purple goddess of the stars Stars, all justice belongs to the starry heavens, who distribute it to the mortals who enter the way! And this justice is that of return and reconciliation, of liberation and return to the great home of all spirits. Oh, if the parity of heaven and nature, science and spirit, men and starry heavens. Justice would be one! But the gradation of angles in multiplicity — would it not defy variation and diversity that there be variation and differences in a cosmos of order out of necessity, for it would be One and perfect and would never differentiate into a cosmic manifold melody if that were so. But the ways of the world are those of metamorphosis and change, the ways of the Great and Divine are the perfect unity in the brilliance of all the stars, yet they are not different, they spring from the same source — the power of the heavens and the weight of chaotic fire and the matter that gives it form is an ocean of movement, it is the substance that corrupts and the substance that enables. It is the great womb from which the cosmos emerges, with the laws of the starry heavens above and within the stars, the dragons entwined. When they look into each other's eyes, they mirror each other and the spirit is born, the cosmic egg. When we look into the eyes of the stars and into the eyes of our beloved, when we look at ourselves and reflect inward and outward, harmony in the tension of opposites, upward movement to the transcendent third — united under the stars.

Descent into the abyss

A cylinder hammering on my flesh, writhing in my mind, falling through constant emptiness, a vision — amid the Devanagari, amid the dust of life, the ashes of burnt corpses, a meditor drinking his flesh and blood, burning with a living flame, mirroring me, the victim of a corporeal image, a redhead approaches me, lies with me for a while, then disappears into the ashen fog. Thrown down, floating in the monolithic sounds of the planetary void, I returned to my body, awake all the time, with imprints in my veins, that was my seal. On the wooden table appeared with chalk a word in Hebrew language — Mahil, that was an angel of the scribes. I wrote it in a pentagram, then threw away. Did not allied traditions try to claim me as a strategic move? Or was it a gift at the time? Emanationist tantra, Horus was the closest deity I remembered from childhood. The next day, the next night, thrown over my body, circling, spinning on its axis, my eyeballs felt like they were falling into an empty sacrificial skull. Crowned as king of the demons, a steel crown on my forehead. The next night they approached the red dragon's body and tried to feast on me, they were scorched as if drinking the sun. Shadows on red flames, screaming with bitterness, punished for trying to drink my blood. Vampiric, subhuman powers. They summoned the seven fallen, ghouls and corpse-eaters. It took them several hours to destroy the blood-red orb that enveloped my body. Then they tried to make me their king, a cheap imitation of their pathetic, filthy aspirations. As if fools wanted to create and crown a greater, depraved, degenerate fool than themselves. The next day I felt dry, dead, without vitality, I did not know if Iwas alive and the rest were dead, or if I was dead and the rest were alive. My soulless body looked black, sinking down into Thanathos, not to mention all the magical procedures done to me, and done by myself. What was it that kept me alive? That was eleven years ago now. Anniversary, June 3, 2007 of the madness, anniversary sometime in August, maybe on the 12th 2007 descent and slaughter. Since then, many stories have been written, many that will remain unspoken and unsaid. My voice was played and heard, my madness held my voice captive, vampires made sure to bind my spirit to flesh, my fangs, invisible bioplasmic shadow substance did not crave blood. Yet they reminded me of destinies. Da'ath, Amentet, the throat and croak of a human voice on the waves of the Aethyrs. Parasites attaching themselves to the vocal cords and causing terrible things to happen. Would the noble things ever be worth saying, illusions of speech-things I never said, doubles-things I would never be. I have been dead for years, and I have become more and more resistant.

Is it reason that, in the face of the collapse of the logos and the onslaught of the iron ages, defends its light on small islands, encircled by a darkness concentrated by the unsuspecting minions of anti-intellectualism, of populism, of division, of the violent display of the opinion of hardliners, no matter how vile or stupid. That for such reasons one retreats between the earth and the providence of the gods, sometimes oblivious to the horror of it all, sometimes in empty destructiveness and compassionate anger, or to the gardens of a dragon's heart to nurture that long-forgotten sublimity that can not be found anywhere nearby. Sometimes we have a hunch that manifests itself in the fact that there are more individuals with such concerns, but we realize that we are in the minority and that we are stepping back from the authoritarian speeches of the hardliners that would strengthen the machine and further satisfy the greed for darkness, for ignorance. We step back to act as underdogs and nurture the things of old, like old scholars who weep silently over times gone by and visit forbidden museums to find greatness with a sense that they delude themselves - it will thrive -

that they have kept for others-like archivists-as a testimony; That they have tried to follow the high ideas, to internalize them, to embody them. O wretched greatness, you shine and collapse, you bring us the hatred of those to whom we are exposed! Then we become a curse, because we realize that we are alone, separated, that we cannot even find a resemblance in those we love. We loathe and love this world all too much! We turn to the gods who send us back and say in silent realization 'these things are no longer to be found down here, you lonely hero'. It breaks our hearts, for the void between earth and sky, between unwritten stories, makes us ponder, like other sages in times of doom, whether to tear the white robes and sink to the ground in spasms of honest anguish and pain, whether to risk tainting the robes with darkness and becoming a pyramid of silence, or whether to go on with a strong heart and watch the actions and threads of the world - withdrawn, detached, with a heavy heart. With Horusian foresight, great comprehensive wisdom, the penetrating view into all living things. I have dreamed with him of all living things. I have stood with him, strong as a tower - an unspoken acknowledgement of all my plans, big dreams and unhindered aspirations written in the stars that were collapsing, stained by the wretched darkness in this world, making me just another fallen fool. To live another day! Destroyed, branded, banished, marked, made into drudges! As long as our minds and hearts are needed for even the smallest transition, as long as the gods need their mediators on earth to engage, to intercede. Our words do not need to be spoken, they would be twisted, masquaded, deformed, lied, then we would speak dirt ourselves, because they lose any meaning! When our forces dwindle, our obligations are difficult to revive from the rut of everyday life, but a flash, a beautiful flash of an hour, a minute,a second of freedom from the vile forces that have encircled us, that live with us, that live us, who have accustomed us and who watch us from the victorious position – this beautiful flash of a single act, of a ritual, of a ceremony that outshines them with its power, its might, its beauty, its awe – unexpectedly, dazzles them, sears their eyes, makes them fall to the ground in misery. Then, when the act is over, they see this potential and make all sorts of attempts to knock us off our hard-won ground, to humiliate and weaken us, to intimate and threaten us. Then we persevere. Our minds and hearts are shattered and blackened, our robes long forgotten, but we carry on as long as we are needed.

Thanatos

I was on my way home from a visit to my friends. On the way there, I usually get on two night buses. I listen to the drunk people, the silent people, wondering what their heart and mind are thinking about, mask-like many things, hidden lives, superficial, young and those whose shadows are long — rare. Bottles rolling on the floor, spreading the drink all over the body. I usually listen to music, try to meditate amid the chatter of young women looking for love, young men looking for sex or vice versa. I have a lot of things to think about. I feel like an old master, yet I am only 31 years old. Paternal, saturnine strictness, perhaps self-imposed, strict but not rigorous. Perhaps protectionist, self-defensive compensation for not feeling anything more. But ethos commands compassion, instead of malice, cruelty and apodictic anger. I reached the main train station in Warsaw, Poland. I bought a coffee from a vending machine, rolled a cigarette and stood about twenty metres from the smoking place. Usually they ask for cigarettes and money there, I stood there having short conversations, ex-convicts, thieves, homeless people, random travellers, maybe a few prostitutes. In the midst of all these people busy with their subjective lives, my attention was suddenly drawn to a homeless man sitting on one of the benches at the bus station, not being noticed by anyone. I asked myself in my mind, "Should I call an ambulance, intervene?"... "I have done it before, but no one seems to care." I shook my head, "No, do not intervene". It was just me and this homeless man. The people who broke the line between my eyes and arms stared at me, sometimes laughing, they were invisible to me as the homeless man was to them. I wore a pair of black wings, Azrail perhaps, an old friend. An angel of death. We stared together, then my gaze was drawn to the shopping centre "Złote Tarasy," which Thanathos lit up green, neon-lit. I thought, "This can not be this man's fate, this is not fair". Slowly people gathered around the homeless man, checking if he was still alive, some quickly moving away, fearing he might actually be dead. The bus arrives, N72, and passes the man and the crowd. I make a gesture, close my eyes, two coins for Charon. The passing. I was sitting on the bus. I felt his soul enter mine, commended him to the moon spirit, prayed, called my friends, "may he be safe." I consulted his soul. I heard a dark voice in my head "if you do not want your life, he will live with you in your body". I wondered what kind of life he had had before, before. After a while his soul left him. The bus ride began. I stared at his body from the back seat of the night bus, his leg seemed to be moving. Maybe he was alive after all? But I did not feel like I had been cheated. I had done my job. The green, dark-winged death I kissed in imagination, a gesture.

Imponderables of a dead year

They sat in silence, him trying to say a few words to bring the conversation back on track. She was depressed, heavy hearted, as if small implosions of whole worlds plunging to their doom were building up in her lungs, in her chest, in her soul, heart and mind. She began to cry, silently. The only thing he could see was the rotten face of a dead woman draped over her face. He knew she had been hurt in life and was now trying to be understood by recreating her pain through his love. He was helpless and broken, staring blankly down the empty corridor of the pub. He looked again; she was still there. Normally he would speak, reach out to her, but he was helpless, it was better not to see certain things. But if he did not, would they survive this long? His mind would be distracted, he would leave, she would not forgive. Unconditional love means loving the spirit of the other, everything else is a pretence with which we communicate in between, the gestures, the signs, the bodies, the blood of the soul, all the imponderables, the unspoken, which are a sum of submission to love. The dead woman brought out her depression and pain, through her, he did not blame any of them, it was not even malice. It was the cruelty of the world repeating itself and growing into a mountain of filth. Maybe that's why most people do not feel or think they feel anything at all, they have all been defeated by a veil of darkness that has grown so thickthat they have a semblance of life. It is as if pure ideas, when recognised, are something foreign to this modern world, as something long forgotten, as something uncomfortable, shameful — when they blossom in the suffered light, they attract too much darkness. It tries to understand them first, then to make itself similar, and when that fails, it tries to defeat them, to mock them, to destroy them, and finds itself with nothing. As in the paraphrase of Shem, the black fire of chaos by nature tries to consume the greater worlds, to disturb them and become them, this is an ancient law of the prison of spirits, when even shrouded shadows carry something hidden, bright and long forgotten. That the shadows have not grown into them, they remain unsullied, it is that the shadows of our lives, illusions, masks are the threads pulled by the contamination, the deafness, blindness, recklessness, ignorance, all the things that moved us to living ideas, to beauty, harmony, greatness, hope — dead. Dead in shells that move like automatons, masks, our demons and ghosts that we have turned into. What a sham. The iron chain of the past, trapping more in the machine of death. There he remained, cruelly killed years ago, cursing his indestructibility and blessing the Gods for the remnants of sanity. An Egyptian sage gave thanks for a strong heart in dark times. So did he, or the pain would be unbearable. He could not tell her that something else had put her in this miserable position, he could only talk to his beloved about her pain, which she did not understand. She had a hellish life, a life in hell. And so did he. That's why they had tears of joy and exhaustion in their eyes when they met for the first time. They saw through each other without a word. When they returned home, they kept their distance. Thenthey turned, hugged and kissed. The black limousine that was parked next to them drove away with Whitesnake's song "Is this love?" in its ears. The synchronicity, a tired one, was confirmed.

I have seen things that you would not want to see.

I have seen things that you humans would never believe. Neither would I, because I grew in fear and terror I internalized the nightmare I began to see with the splendor and awe of the gods. Tired of the masks I have to wear, a professional among adult children, a clown among adults. I should not, I should wear my curse with the solitary pride or ease of a craftsman. I need others to keep from going crazy, companionship, an illusion of sameness. Years ago I disclosed what I had experienced and that scared others, some even dared to mock me, I was branded crazy among old acquaintances. All the hundreds of faces I used to know are meaningless to me, just masks of the same grave I escaped. I see the invisible worlds and interact. I see bloated, rotten faces imposing themselves on your children, your ancestors who have found no rest trying to call you. My curse and blessing is that I see. From this and from ordinary human knowledge, from the revelation of occultation, I have found my universe of meanings. They are everywhere, and they are intelligent as the departed and the living in many invisible worlds that surpass what other mortals can comprehend. When an undead ethereal corpse of a murderer takes over my mind and body, my mind is twisted to the worst atrocities that I control and try not to commit. When a whore of hell, a woman addicted to the lust of life, leered at me from the face of my beloved, I knew. Her shattered, cut, rotten face found no rest. Was it her fault? No. I hate religious fanatics. Religious arrogance of the bastards of history. Sacrosanct ignoramuses. Half-truths of domini canes — cruel dogs of a God who is irrelevant to me. A god is a word stuffed with projections of their stomachs and dirty desires. I wanted divinity, not religion. The higher worlds that revealed themselves to me did not want religion either. They even spurned it. Who would ask angels and archangels to profess the religions of monkeys? The gods scoff at these kneeling crowds of slaves. I have developed my own cosmography, occult philosophy, theology and philosophy. I have no need for religion. Pagan theology and modern science fit my goals. The ancient ethos, the esthetics of the classics, so as not to get into a chaotic mess, and the modern method, applied to empirical metaphysics and the divine movements of concept, intellect, feeling, imagination, the inductive-deductive method of revealing, interpreting, understanding, weighing, balancing. A gigantomachy of madness, of good and evil, of inner reason. Harmony of tension in resistance to the pull of emptiness" — reformulation of the Mithraic axiom It was the same misery that we share in the world, I would not call it misfortune, but the mutually created interdependent hells that we have created for ourselves in this world. From this perspective, this world is hell. To find solace, we must remain strong, indifferent, detached, a bit like a Hindi Aghori who pays no homage to forms, no matter how twisted, horrible or disgusting they are to others. On the other hand, keep the joy and overcome with a smile. Another comfort is to find wisdom from the old days. I was committed to a psychiatric ward years ago and stuffed full of debilitating medications. It did not help me one iota, but I developed a cover story and a social security backbone as 'mentally disabled' that gave me low resources and an alibi. The psychiatric script helps some — it silences their fears, their beliefs into delusions, their visions into hallucinations. It gives them an explanation to live by, as some live by myths. But that was not enough for me. Over the years I developed a highly complicated, sophisticated, beautiful system to work in these worlds, a system of philosophy, theology, and technical occult tools that helped me survive. I have seen solar discs floating in the sky, gold-heavy and steely deities incarnated in my body. Forces from world systems aware of us. We communicated in the silence where I was the lone one among the people and they were the understanding mothers and fathers. I was not on my own, otherwise I would have committed suicide long ago. Years in limbo, with interruptions for two women who survived me and my instabilities caused by mediumships and possessions, the last one I tried to train to be a mistress and I was proud of her and still am. The more you know about the other worlds, the greater the arsenal of intrigues, ordeals and trials against you. As if the plot against the human freedoms of knowledge or punitive measures against you. I have seen through so many intrigues that all human stratagems in history seem like child's play to me. I know you all too well, I learned that in the other worlds. So far, I have not found anyone who is my equal, but I do not intend to boast and puff myself up. I am keeping a low profile, as I should, and trying not to point fingers at others, because who is to blame? There is something about transcending the human world, rising above it and interfering with people, while being constrained by the human form, being suffocated by it. Each new person, each new interaction, each new mastery of a mask, a persona. Someone said 'be real', I took him for a child — split personalities, masks, entities taking over these masks and personas and playing them as I allow them, or being mastered by them and yet recursively aware, acting and acting, puppeteer and puppet. We are but an illusion, the only true self is a combination of all our movements when taken for single moments — they are merely a dream our being dreams. But there is a twist that many people often ask: what becomes of us when we die? Wheels of fortune, preparations, works, transformations. What will be taken away from them? This question has been answered by ancient masters, Ihave merely repeated and expanded it based on what I have seen and experienced. No 'divine knowledge', no 'revelations', only what I could make of it and offer it as a gift to others, write it down, think about it and process it. An honest person who errs in what his mind and senses interpret, but he errs in a great way — by creating models of these worlds and trying to approach their truth, their essential core. When I am among people, even people with some magical zeal and belief in such things, I find that their understanding is incomplete, so I disseminate limited information from a monolith of my experience, fragments scraped from the surface of things. I do not remember everything at once, I have collected all moments in a hidden structure, I simply retrieve what is to be retrieved, build on my past experiences, collect what can be collected and keep learning new things. If I had to know everything I know all the time, I would break down and go crazy. That is beyond the capacity of my mind. I did not write this to find understanding or to tell an entertaining story. I wanted to write myself out. I loathe myself for things that should be endured in silence. I hate voyeurs as much as I hate exhibitionists. I have partially made myself both. I watch the world and show the world. But I only do it once in this form. It's far too personal. I prefer to be guided by objective considerations and scientific methods, to keep things formal and structured, and to avoid chaos. And once — once I knew love and despair, these are memories implied with arms outstretched. Feeling is a dangerous thing, after years of pain, tears, mental and physical anguish I have repressed myself. In recent years I have felt something honest only twice — when a woman whom I loved with an idea, supreme unconditional love, mutilated herself before my eyes. I forced her to stop by restricting her movements and she said she wanted to kill herself, she was suffering from depression — I burst into screaming despair and cries, a purgatory and started punching myself in the face to make her stop. Within five minutes I was back to being a disciplined, blocked off, dignified person. She worked her way out of depression over a few months, I'd like to think I helped her do that. The other moment was when I decided to rid myself of all the pain, a catharsis. They say you have to live through your pain, flush it out, get rid of it, to get rid of it. I landed on the floor in a neuropathic spasm, shaking like a centipede as the waves of pain passed throughme until I stopped them with a whisper. I am a surface, just a surface, my soul is deep in some cosmic void and I do not want to shout it back. This surface of my persona is attached to a star above me, my consciousness. Let me leave the torment behind, let me go with my lamp through the darkness illuminated by gods and spirits. There is nothing more to say. Too many threads that would write volumes, taken to the grave like the whispers of a madman. Yet I am free, I am not a slave. Recognized as a free man among gods. Therefore those who hate freedom will disfigure my mind and harass me. I have won my gladius, which is no longer a commodity, but my own tool in this world.

Blade Runner's Pris and Batty as Ops and young Saturn: The Archetype

Batty gets up and goes to a chess set in the corner of the room, a game is obviously in progress. Batty studies it for a moment, then moves the White Queen to the Bishop. Pris walks over to him. Her tone muted but demanding. (. . .) They stare at each other for a long time in silence, communicating something with their eyes… without expression. Finally Batty breaks the silence.

BATTY I've seen things… (long pause) seen things you little people wouldn't believe… Attack ships on fire off the shoulder of Orion bright as magnesium… I rode on the back decks of a blinker and watched c-beams glitter in the dark near the Tanhauser Gate. (pause) all those moments… they'll be gone.

Batty holds Deckard's eyes like a hypnotist.

– Blade Runner Script

In astrological parole Saturn is considered malefic and represents the age of the ancient wise sage. I have been pondering whether this aspect is not only associated with the lower metaphysical octaves of this planet, while in the higher, imperial octave it is of use in a most unpredictable way. It acts as a wise teacher, cutting through superficial business and ties for every age of man, when one matures decidedly according to his age. The right of a child to play is different from that of a senator to go about his business, for each according to his age, duties and responsibilities. It has a cold and dry character and indicates melancholy. Therefore, various people of young age who are troubled by pain and suffering, including sensitive people who tend to become melancholic when they are hurt, also exhibit saturnine traits through the law of learning, deep foresight into causality, and drawing on life experiences that solidify their approach to the world and shape their way of thinking. They think deeply and are silent a lot, are solitary but loyal to friends and the few things they deem worthy enough to pursue, and they are loyal to Deities and powers of various origins. In humans, it shows power and firmness, earthly causes, possessions, supervision of activities, intelligence, boldness, toil, arrogance, and harbingers of death. Saturn nature, by its tendency, its nature, the collected honey from the life experiences of black bile, tends to vile and evil things, bitterness, cruelty, malice, when hurt, harmed, offended, humiliated. Therefore, he must strive for things of ethos and intellect to defeat that which the heavy lead symbolizes. The Mercurian way is fast and yet slow, but beware of the Saturnian way of turning lead into gold by ceaselessly engaging in alchemical endeavors to subdue, overcome or submit to the harm. Only with great strength and great intellect can you take the substance of the damage and refine it into something better, nobler, stronger, greater – indeed. With great valor, his nature settles into these traits of the fatherly sage and a refined seer, an assassin or a shadow witch, a holy man or a vampire. The eagles of Rome were the Saturnian "Pater Noster" rank, the great initiates of the highest rank in the mysteries of Mithra. Great dangers occur when the nature of the beholder in this process behaves unrestrainedly abominable, including vicious murders, unthinking bestiality. Great good occurs when nature overcomes, great wisdom, benevolence and the power of justice prevails after the trials. Considering this astrological environment, we should recall some Gnostic concepts. In the Hebrew Manichaean gnosis, the whole creation was considered by an evil In Hellenic gnosis, on the other hand, the demiurge, often symbolized by the dodecahedron or a small model of the universe, was seen in Platonic terms as wholly good, simple, and benevolent. The term henosis was reserved for the point at which the divine meets a man or woman and awakens the divine within. The means were varied and reminiscent of the late Neoplatonic theurges such as Master Iamblichus or the advisor to Emperor Julian, the Theurgist Maximus. The way there, according to the testimony of the Chaldean oracles written down by Julian the Theurgist, a miracle worker and soldier in the army of Marcus Aurelius, required the deepest concentration, consecration and invocation of the divine powers and receiving from them in the act of Theion Ergon – Work of Men, Work of the gods – with the help of homoiosis Theio – the sacred work of heroization and embodiment of a mortal man, who was thus destined to join the procession of the sacred and divine. Batty's death wish, the sacrificial Thanatos, was transformed into a monolithic desire to perform an act reserved for the demiurge to save himself, similar to the schools of Theravada and Hinayan Buddhism, where self-liberation was more important than the obligation to work for the welfare and restoration of all out of compassion, as in the Mahayana traditions. He embodies the self-governed and the liberated, the Saturnine autonomous. In a sense, he is a superman who is detached from human beings and yet perfectly understands the great stases (issues) and small vagaries of their existence. He has no need to re-humanize himself, for that would rob him of his status as a demigod, a futant in sci-fi parlance, a modified future man. He has mastered the human world in such a way that he can play it virtuously. In fact, it is not an act, but an authentic, masterful performance in which he plays at being a human being while wearing a mask of God, a transcendent deity composed and arranged in human harmony, ratio, and proportion, yet completely self-contained, standing there like a mask of a god. The dominant psychological dynamic of the Neoplatonic saints and theurgists was the threat of misanthropy, of a certain elitism, but only when they fall away from an overarching definition of a perfected human being and become human wretches, when they have lost the thread of communitas (community) comitas (brotherhood) and severitas (severity). Is it not the case that when the human form is preserved but the arch-human strife seethes within, species parity can be lost in solitude, to the detriment of both parties, one is lost in the obsession of separation, like Empodecles who jumped into a volcano–as the legends of Diogenes Laërtius relate–to prove that he is a god, and men are lost without their "heroes with a thousand masks," in Campbellian henotheistic terms. Batty suffers from the human form because he knows he is a demigod. Yet he tries to transform the lead beyond that form before it threatens to turn him into a psychopath or murderer. It is a battle of Faustian cuts with Macbeth, in which Mephistopheles plays the role of Moire. Indeed, inasmuch as Faust was to Goethe was as Zarathustra was to Nietzsche, Deckard and Batty were to Philip K. Dick. We are the actors we create, they reflect us and our imagination, the dynamics of our projection, re–projection, introjection from within and without. At the moment when Batty rescued Deckard, there was a withdrawn tension in which the lead turned to gold, the alchemical pelican that fed its young with its own blood turned into a phoenix. Pris is the Uranian–Neptunian element representing a liquid–narcotic, reality–playing lover killed in an instant. By losing the water of life, the redeeming element, he loses the reason to sustain his life and must reappear as quickly as the action continues. Here everything retains the quality of an instinctive choice – the sum of one's being in a quick decision or the decision of fate to be a shell or a ghost, an android or a human. The game of spiritual liberation was accentuated by transforming the transformation of an inner territory of discipline from an attempt at constant revenge to an attempt at salvation by recognising in a human being a familiar face that knows to its core a certain uncanny sparkle of hope, in which the bridging of brotherhood and oth– erness is accomplished and then carried by a golden thread found in despair. Batty wanted to know his creator, the genetic architect, and then murders him – the young Saturn as the voice of an aeon, the old one deposed by violence, perhaps liberated, a new generation of time slaughters the old Chronos, Saturnalia releases the austere energies of an ordered society in December for all to rejoice. The old year goes, a new one begins, the winter equinox marks the new season. The androids, with their genetically limited life span, know the thread of time that the Architect donates, transmits and sustains; he is their god and clock. He is the master of life and death. Kill him and the roles reverse and the android Batty rules time. It is a common scheme to kill the father, usually a matter of maturation, initiation rites in tribal communities, here done very specifically. In a normal scenario it would be called psychopatology, but the architect's son overdid it and gave in to bloodlust. There was no more room for the self-builder and sovereign, regicide was committed to take his place. Here, a new archetype of the demiurge – Lucifer, the fallen one – becomes Prometeus again. Indeed, in Greco-Roman traditions, Prometeus was a secret story about how the divine fire descended into the world to free captives from the Platonic cave in order to set them free. But does Prometeus become the new demiurge of a world he sought to liberate? It is a Socratic irony that things that should not be spoken or written about must be so after all! After centuries have passed, he tries to destroy his creation, devours his children like Kronos – and yet both look at their works with deep insight, bring the fire of divine life, the spark of enlightenment and the fire of destruction until the new cycle begins. In a Gnostic sense, after the murder of his father, Batty opens his eyes to the prisoner - Deckard, mirrors himself in him and tries to free him, to support him, to save him. It is a tension between the despair about the continuing existence and the affirmation of this existence in the cold wasteland of the cosmos. This is where a transcendent element comes in - some uncanny, transcendent, supra-stellar worlds weave a thread of understanding that neither Batty as young Saturn nor Deckard as his inferior brother understand. The key passage of "Blade Runner" is Deckard's vision in which a white horse gallops, then he collects a small origami horse made of tinfoil. At these two points, the invisible world of synchronicities enters, the anomalies that seem reasonable only to the eyes in the stars, the divine that flashes humbly in a technocratic totalitarian system, mutely underscoring the whole film's 'alas, all is not lost'. The renewal took place by murder, the old demiurge-Saturn (Chronos) is slain, perhaps freed from the bonds of his own creation, his time, the new one sees only continuity, not suspecting, yet how his own creation turns against him in the end. Following the vision, it disintegrates and destroys the seer, making him a crusader. For a new one will come as long as the world lasts. He points to Deckard: 'ecce homo' - the cry seeps into the wells of the past. Pris as ops is the earth, the companion, after her loss she becomes Rhea - time of memory, the memory of loss. The only one who preserves true love is Deckard. Was it not Virgil who wrote: "Amor Vincit Omnia", and thus Eros stands triumphant as Titan among the gods - after the humanity of an innocent mortal fool.

Moths of Fames: Graves of Fortunes

It's about building up the character of your people, that's what leaders do, it's about making them strong and free, that's what a statesman does, it's about making them just and happy, that's what a wise man does, it's about making them reasonable, educated and thinking, that makes a teacher It is not about leaders being strong in character, free and strong statesmen, happy and just sages, educated and thinking teachers, it is about inspiring people to be that, that is the difference between privilege, appointed role and greatness. The first is merely a given, what we make of it is our own decision and is not gained by us, the second is an opportunity and can be beneficial if used wisely, the last promotes further, it is a source of giants who keep the least to themselves, for they are endless, they inspire individuals to equally individualize themselves into greatness and build healthy societies.' All our movements reflect our innermost, our striving, our speaking, thinking and acting projects what we really are. Objectively speaking. The rest is reception and perception of others, which also obey this law. The denial of objectivity is a delusion or self-deception. But who claims the objectivity of evaluations? Who knows our innermost being, the treasuries of mind, heart and soul? What is made of our geniuses and destiny in the eyes of the sun? How does it change in the course of time and destiny? Mortuaries and cemeteries are only - profession, date of birth, date of death, the rest is superficial. One can build a palace for his corpse or be buried in the forest. A splendidly buried one can end up in the howling underworld of the Styx, punished by the oath of the gods, an anonymously buried one, torn apart by wild beasts, raised by them by a twist of fate. Depending on the position one occupies in the wheel of worldly fortune, one must respond to fate accordingly, this is not a responsibility, but a sign of fate. If one who has good luck abuses it, he is cursed, if one who has bad luck is unfortunate, he is pardoned, if his bad luck turns into persistent overcoming - that is a worthy quality, if one who has great luck makes the luck of others greater - that is a great master. Turning an unlucky person into a noble person, turning a noble person into an unlucky person, making an unlucky person overcome himself and become noble - that is worthy, turning a noble person into pure gold - that is perfection. Time writes the greatest obituaries, history is the necrology. It is fame that governs earthly memory, fame confers neither personal greatness nor personal misery, it can elevate the greatest scoundrel and punish the noblest creature. It is for the times to decide. In golden times the noble are elevated and the wretched are disposed of; in bad times it is the other way around. But fate plays tricks on us and changes, it is not a law: sometimes in fallen times the wretched are punished and the noble at least keep their position, and in golden times it may be the other way around by mistake. Time is not a witness, history is not a memory.

On Evil and the Curse of Volition

I was called to be a magician, to create, to act, to dare, to divine. People like us gather many enemies [on the other side] based on certain additional rights and laws. Therefore, we must develop our arsenal and tools of the trade quickly enough to survive, to outwit and meet the forces that face us in this life. It is an intellectual self-defense mechanism that has become almost an intuitive habit. People like us were burned at the stake in the Middle Ages when we struggled with things these Christian pedants had no idea about. The latter were partly the cause of the problem. Having encountered many malignant spirits, or spirits that mingle 'badly' with the human spirit, I assumed that the doctrine of the 'mingling of natures' was sufficient. It is, from a de-anthro-pocentric perspective. Natures are not capable of judgment. However, from a human-centered perspective, I have chosen to define 'evil' in these terms. It is nothing more than a defilement of the human mind that is predisposed, conditioned and, depending on circumstances, educated to negative encounters that drive it to self-destruction or others to destruction. But this is a trivial evil, it is destructive, and a schoolboy knows what it is. Pure evil is cold, undifferentiated, spineless; it is a blade of deranged cruelty on one side and a blade of sadistic, cruel indifference on the other. It is the look of an innocent smiling boy who has just killed his sister without remorse. It is a dictatorship that is like a machine. It is a cold machine that does not work by reversal, like antinomian evil, it is beyond good and evil, it recognizes both factors and yet pursues the psychopathic goal of self-loyalty towards the abyss of hallucinations, the Black Brother is a force of annihilation, he is blind, deaf and wants to contaminate with himself. Woe to those who are contaminated by the Black Brothers of the Shadows. I do not blame murderers. Know thyself. My guilt was will, my survival was based on my will, I was at the mercy of 'I Will' as a curse. Every break, every crack in my will meant death, derangement, suffering, pain, all that I killed. I was forced to kill all my love for the Will, for the Want, to sacrifice everything human in order to survive. My spirit was tortured, my body tormented, broken for years, humiliated — it was like a wheel of misfortune. Put me in a uniform and I will be just another executioner, put me on a podium and I will organize a dictation. And I have met the pyramid heads. They took advantage of my pain, I screamed, and then silence — I looked in the mirror with my face half rotten, pyramid-headed shadow silhouettes on either side of me. I froze with understanding. I smiled with a lazy grin. The question is — can ethos and intellect overcome sterility and cruelty when conscience, shame and morality go to hell? I would rather believe it is possible, I would rather not check it under all the smiles and comforts. But it must be trained, continuously, constantly, so that it becomes intuitive like steel, always on guard, always self-reflective, deeply focused and aware. How can you check people's integrity? I know that people like me were given new identities or sentenced to death at the Nuremberg Trials. I am glad that this will never be put to the test. Suffering and pain, hatred and frustration either give birth to a spiral of evil or find rebirth as love and compassion. Evil and good are made. You have to know good and evil to know what is right, otherwise you are just a puppet on the strings of fate. A broken mind leads to evil, which can either be restored or is irretrievable. When evil defiles the mind, it breaks man's reason. All evil is based on ignorance, stupidity and obscured vision. But when an arm begins to rot, it is difficult not to cut it off. When evil is deeply rooted in the blood, it is a waste of time to eradicate it, because it grows malicious and mocking. If one adopts the habits of evil, one is irretrievably lost. One may be aware of the fact of defilement or not want to acknowledge it, the other may fight against it — this is a condition of holiness -, the last is completely taken over by the corrosive force and is finally devoured by it. May the defilement not take us as its harvest. May we become white brothers. Sometimes the knowledge of virtue and vice is not enough to survive in this game. It must be practiced without a hint of distraction in a gigantomachy of mortals, giants, awe, nightmare, liberation, enslavement, obscuration and enlightenment.

Day of the Dead: Nurturing Thanatos

In keeping with the rituals of ancestor veneration and a reconstruction of the Eleusinian rite in which melicraton, a mixture of milk, honey and wine, was poured on the grave as a libation, I wanted to honor the dead this year, as I did last year. I prepared the mixture at home and then spent some time asking the spirits of the higher generation to consecrate it as a meal for the dead (the substance acquired properties that made the meal for the dead a sacred scenario). I arrived near the cemetery and bought a candle that I had wrapped in plastic to protect it from rain. As I walk through the gates, I introduce myself and ask permission to enter the 'King and Queen' of the cemetery, the first people buried here. A necromancer (a 3 m tall humanoid shadow soul) appeared at the gates. He was my guide. At first I wondered and watched the moving statues, then some aetheric incubated dead began to move and noticed me. It would be a good day for incubation and dreams sent by the dead if the cemetery did not close at 8 p.m., I thought, but I was not prepared for that. Last year I opened a small plutonium in a forest that is not a cemetery, wounding the earth with a spoon with the intention of opening a gate to chthonic words. The dead and the shadows come soon, partly to enjoy the feast of Melikraton, partly to suck my life force and blood and get more 'matter' in the shadows. This year I have been guided by the necromancer's shadows and have been stopped at a grave of a recently deceased Polish senator and a young student. Using the dead gaze (a technique of witchcraft where you pierce the veils with your gaze), I penetrated through the figure of a standing angel and saw the face of the lady who called me. She said she would direct 'from above' what she could inspire for the better in this land in silent ideas. I asked the winged one, flashing silver over the cemetery, to guide and release her through my spine. She passed through my nervous system, the snakes on my spine entwined and she was released, flashing gold above the cloudy night sky. Then I lingered on in the cemetery with the thought that I could not serve them all, it would be too exhausting. I lit a candle at an unguarded grave, intending to light it for all the anonymous, forgotten dead. Then I moved to the left and approached a mausoleum and with the words 'Child of earth and starry sky that I am, I arrive here, may you be free, our race is heavenly'. I poured the melicraton into the tombs. I prayed and called the star friends, took two pictures and quietly withdrew from the cemetery.

On the purpose of learning

— What is the goal of your studies? — To refine the intellect and correct the mind, constantly striving to discipline and overcome my thoughts in excellence
-What is the use of all the human knowledge you have acquired if you are successful? Nothing, I recover my memory, which is in accordance with the truth, after I have passed to the heavenly spheres, after the operations in Theion Ergon are effective and sanctified. Then all knowledge on earth is less. But you respect the scholars who have gathered all this in laborious work like worker bees, so that you can study...

Have they not also created and forged their intellect by contributing to the ever-moving fountain of knowledge and wisdom? -Indeed, they have done so. Respect their geniuses, because thanks to them you are able to refine the intellect in such a way, to make the movements of your conscious mind so logical and rhetorical, that you can understand metaphysics in an ever clearer way. — What about those who do not care for learned pursuits? — They develop according to their talents here in crafts, there in arts and sciences, in manual labor, in enterprise, in political and social affairs, so they develop in silence, often unconscious of the occult movements of the feelings, of the mind, and of the soul, as long as the will to excel is present, they are in harmony with their nature — what greatest harm do you do to them? — -They may not control themselves sufficiently, they move on the strings of fate as a plaything of their conditions, this is a terrible waste that these, who could be taught to strive for great natures and ingenious devices, are like puppets on the strings of their minds, jumping to and fro like wild monkeys. -What do you advise? — To observe the flow of thoughts and then consistently and rhetorically learn to discipline them, to tame them like a yogi and consciously direct them to what you think is perfect and useful. For there is also a yoga of life, henceforth called the art of living. Those who know this secret are happy people indeed, despite the greatest torments and terrors that haunt their hearts!

The Devil in Me

Remembering my love, the last time I catastrophically tried to remember it all, I ended up on the floor in epileptic spasms, whispering 'no more', then I pulled myself together and stood up, returning to the steel armor of cruel Saturn and walking in pride and anger, in cruelty and petty mimed malice, in a cold grin of forced compassion that looks like the smile of a murderer. The plants I adore most, the little birds, they are innocent in paradisiacal naivety. They have crossed the laurel wreath and the lotus buds on their ophitic wings, with deeds and bravery that shake their tired heads above the starry sky. With outstretched arms and glorious lips they invoke the glory of the starry heavens to descend upon the children of the human race. O sweet sleep of a holy pagan man, kissed by the wings of angels. Rise to a new prayer, an action, a ritual, an invocation, may the Great Goddess bless the little children of the human race. Too much light invites darkness, a known matter of defilement, too much resilience invites destruction — so that only a monument of steel can stand. Long stories, shortened in the state of 'now', memories are of no use to me, every day newly broken bones of the mind, newly sewn scars splintered and re-sewn, stuffed with maggots of small, insignificant games. They crawl and bore as I watch them crawl through the skin of my cheek. Broken hearts immortalized in gold now stand not black, but in cold chasms. So I stare through my heart into the void, through the burning spirit of my vampire into the silent austerity of what broken statues of Ares, Mercury, and Helios might have felt when they struck the floors of temples, when cold marble in a thousand mirrors can translate their feelings into human prey to a dragon's spiked brain. This half-broken, a rotten mask, replaceable body, the demon has grown inside me. A twitch, a habit, a pattern of feeling and thinking, all devils have left a trace of their malignant taste on me. With each pain, each black, dead tear, new habits were destroyed, new bravery was broken and replaced by a void that quickly filled with lesser things that grew into my nature like poisonous ivy of those things that remained unconquered and choked by great power. The greater my shadow, the distorted image of everything lived, everything painful, the greater the state of compassion and anger. To conquer is to keep still, to be detached, victories are measured by not giving in, losses are tragic and ponderous, deepening the deadly game of losing.

On active meditation. Voided mindfulness

It was a bus station in one of the districts of Warsaw, Poland. The bus was already there, waiting for people to get on. There was no one else there, the journey began here. I sat down, the lights were still off and the bus driverwas smoking a cigarette outside. I reach for my companion, the Book of Changes, and read a passage from hexagram 'The Mountain that Keeps Still.' While pondering a fragment, I flipped the book closed, stiffened my spine, and folded my hands in a U-shaped gesture. Immobile monolith. This time it was not the steely heaviness that moved the mountain, but a light, gentle pause, like a youngest daughter on the shore of a lake, settling down in front of the majestic mountain, pondering a lost thought in the snow. The flow of my thoughts was like a ravine. I brought it to a standstill while a certain disturbance struggled to invade and corrupt the mental continuum to corrupt it. 'I heard sounds from the city,' said a dark bari- tone voice in my head: 'Once again, you are a laughing stock, do not even try'. They are to be ignored, discursive polluters, dialectical errors and lies, injecting thoughts and playing with empty phrases and sentences. They have nothing better to do than drive wedges into their own power. Rabid dogs and manifold tribes of utterers, clinging to their chains of illusions about their own person, their own self, and the shackles of their movements, mistaking them for their own, controlled by greater puppeteers of fate who hate me for it, that I undo mine, but in the end, when properly perceived, they free me in their misery, peel off superficial things for themselves to devour, digest and vomit out to go to the next feast of delusion, ignorance, illusion, filth. At first I wanted to visualize geometric thought forms and give them a hypostatic, metaphysical proportion, but I decided to enclose a primordial spirit between two yin lines and connected them to my pneuma sitting on a throne between my eyebrows, my will, my name, my spirit, my star, the wholeness that I always was in this human form. Just as everything I have lived through since childhood on the thread of my consciousness, wearing the garment of my life, hardening it, beating it, sharpening it, depending on my life, my mind, my emotions, and yet independent of them, once accomplished, forged into a completeness, wholeness, holiness. This name, the spirit, the will, the power that moves from world to world, from a human animal into a God body, a vehicle of divine expression. when will this crooked, ruined spirit, this pain, this defilement depart from me? When will the bitterness, the domineering severity of the hardliner release me from its iron grip?' Itis only a transition. All that breaks with death, the spirit rises and dwells in a body of glorious solar victory. All the dirt is removed, the enemies of the past fade into bitterness and chase their own tails in great hatred, divinity is restored. Consolation. Hymn of the Pearl. Life is short, after all. Let us not waste it, between despair and affirmation, between torpor and paralyzing spasms of pain. A man sat next to me. I tried not to distract my extended consciousness with random sounds and events. He was eating French fries, the smell and sound temporarily distracting me, I merged them into a stream of phenomena around me. I conjured up the sound of an empty, rushing stream that I remember from the descent. For a time I was a skeleton in robes, holding my skull in my hands. Like a picture I saw, swords of the Minor Arcana of Tarot and the memory of the only one who loved me, my madness, who embraced me like a lioness. La Forza for a rose. Meditation on a corpse. Nothing is without effect. A political thought that What I heard, erased, none of these phenomena should reach me here, they are insignificant in this depth. Rex Profundi, Regina Silentia. Then everything faded away as I moved from the phenomena into the void. My personality, mind and body became a selfless, radiant emptiness. I had practiced this so many times. Sometimes I was engaged in rituals, conjuring illusions and sending out signals about the emptiness and fullness of the galaxies. A quick change of perception and I was back in the glorious golden light symbolized only by the stars in the universe. Just as this world is a shadow of the infinite worlds, a star is a shadow of the transcendent creative fires. The abyss and the cosmic voids are an insignificant spectacle. In Egyptian eschatology, the abyss is defeated in millions of years and the chaos of the black fires is extinguished into the nothingness that they are. The lotus buds open in glory and close in perfection. I wear my robes of darkness, I wear my robes of golden cloth, in between

I embrace the entire phenomenal world. A whisper distracted me, a couple in love, a couple, a small daimon pulled a string in my mind. Is he inciting jealousy? Overcome it with loving kindness! I too was once a recipient of love, rejoice in the love of others! How can one reconcile a vastness of mind that reaches the vast spaces of the world, that sees the horrors of infinite space once as a void, once as a winged thing that became spaceless and enters the safe cocoon of the human body, with the distraction of an insignificant little worm whispering some nonsense and clouding one's perception? It amuses me a little that an insignificant fly entering the eye can obscure the larger view of the world, that a small obscured mind — for a while — can stop the work of a titanic spirit in insignificant narrowing? Does not that evoke a smile? I opened my eyes, put my book aside, and watched all the people on the bus, like a small child with curious attention and yet with the stern look of a stern man. Nothing was going to disturb me anymore, the equanimity of the phenomena and their ultimate nothingness, even if the advertising on the screen somehow distracted me. Not again The chain of causes of mental habits must be penetrated and understood in order to cut them at the root. I do not like advertising, foundations, dissection — they have their own built-in egregors that feast on human attention, like little attention whores for people who have nothing to do with their mental faculties. They have an attraction for me. I do not like it when my will is overwhelmed, I do not like it when I am distracted from my concentration. But annoyance is also a form of attachment, it means that I am overwhelmed, that I am distracted. A Ukrainian and a Georgian or maybe a Chechen working in a hotel nearby were sitting in front of me, I was looking at them attentively and smiling. Is not that the whole point? To sit like an adult child and play with a sword of concentration with perseverance, is not that a significant goal? For I know that I have already gained immortality above. Floating in the Cosmic Vastness of Tartarus. Years of the construction of the solar cross. Years of the Theion Ergon, when I reached for the gods, they reached for me. I called and they answered me. Years of a noble war. While the stubborn, darkened, bitter worms kept me from a purposeful life. So much for a committed life, I think. Even if I end up a homeless, penniless, vicious wretch, I stand above the like pigs who made me that way. Liberated from darkness and freed from a Dionisian tomb, I rise in great laughter, a joyous arrow of brilliance, and dance like a dervish with my swords, smashing and scattering the pathetic attempts of the sycophants who consider me an enemy to all corners of the hells as they go down screaming, obliterated, humiliated and devastated until they gather enough strength to strike again against someone else, somewhere else. As I write this world, some vampiric worm screams "kill you." One corner of my mouth smiles contemptuously at the depths of their stupidity, illuminated by my hard-won pride. Dragons have no natural enemies. In human form, they are attacked only by deluded creatures who wrestle more with themselves than with anything else than anything else.

Modern Age: From an Emperor to a Monk

Shout and argue all you want on your moronic talk shows. It's not common knowledge — if you want to change history, you need both status, authority, charisma, money and power. Those who have that power rarely want change, they want to maintain a more conservative stance before they fall into an abyss. Scribble, scribble all you want, you little scribblers, but the days when literature was the philosopher's stone for revolutions and foundations for cultural heroism are long gone. This is not the Golden Age. Talk, argue on your social networks while every move is virtual, so — empty, feel-good effects of identity politics and narcissistic shenanigans projecting your impotence, helpless rage and opinions without wisdom to the outside world count for empty insane foam. You could not even wave a flag, rally the masses, command an army to strike, smile at a child, appease the gods, rule yourself — a source of power, love a chosen girl unconditionally. I once shouted in the middle of the old city, commanding people, shouting with tears in their eyes and a powerful, masterful voice, some were afraid, others thought I was a crank, others applauded. They argued with their pointed tonguesabout something they were incapable of doing. An agitator in the age of complacent slavery. The human spirit is dead to those who see the Socratic tremendous deep irony. Sometimes I feel that I could change the riverbeds of history, but long ago I have been rejected by time, like a man in the Book of Changes — waiting for his retreat. Perhaps it is better that way, for only a fool wants to be a ruler over fools even greater than himself. My advice is — devote yourself to something useful, build a house with your bare hands, little satisfaction in a ritualized virtual age. All your entertainments are ephemeral, like your short-lived fame, causing only a temporary twitch in people's minds, who then move on to something else. But the waves continue to crash. This life lost its appeal to me with each sacrifice that forced me to choose between the hunt and the bait — all illusions, because the enemies make plans to seize, steal what is yours and distribute, to enslave what is worthy only of the blind pursuers, the greatest of my dreams — I would settle for nothing less. -Say you serve and you get it back — one devilish pig smiled, another said — 'We'll give it back if you make a deal' — a pathetic vampyric worm, how not to despise their envy, stuffed with filth. 'Take what you have stolen, little ruiner, spoiler, may you rot with my vanished possessions, I will return them to nature, as the great Epictetus said — having lost everything, I have dealt happily with the loss' — 'I had more gifts to offer than the treasures you stole' — I replied. 'Now that I have killed them and spat on the gifts of darkness, I am content with carnal death, like a monkish hermit cicada leaving its shell and perpetuating itself on kheper — a struggling gigantomachic golden scarab heart with a new life entwined by the Ophis, a mighty sunbeam, I have laid my arms and command with all that I have lost to the heavenly shrines of the gods and goddesses. To be immortalized in the stars, you must prove your spirit worthy through allthe movements of your life. It is less burdensome to leave this world behind than to leave it in disarray. Gather your wings, accelerate a lightning strike, escape as far as you can. How insignificant are the lives that are forgiven, stifled before they have begun. I spit on my life and despise it, for nothing I won a star.

Epitaph

"Inconstant Fortune took from me, To pay her fee, the dearest that I had, But she for that hath made me wise."

— Merope in Plutarch[1]

Divinities and Plato's Cave

We come here to build and to govern, some out of compassion, others out of a sense of duty, but as soon as we burn our fingers on this world, when it whips and hounds us against our gifts, we retreat in toil and regret, and there is nothing left but learned human scientia and the call from above to return. A rephrasing of Heraclitus' quote with a transcendent intent to metempsychosis: "Out of every one hundred men, ten shouldn't even be there, eighty are just targets, nine are the real fighters, and we are lucky to have them, for they make the battle. Ah, but the one, one is a warrior, and he will bring the others back." The fundamental characteristics of the gods and goddesses are their objectivity, truth, self-consistency, dispassionate attitude based on the original intellect and idea, a form of eudaimonia (hypostasis of joy) sustained by a non-emotional feeling that permeates the entire universe. If I had to choose one idea that unites everything and tries to bring everything back home, it is compassion, the restoration of harmony. Moving actions that merge with the subject of their idea are always objective, they are a divine current. They are connected with a substance that is common to them all, and yet each of them has a special substance that distinguishes one from the other. Carl Gustav Jung wrote in the 'Red Book' that his holy guardian angel Philemon of Egyptian-Hellenic descent taught him above all objectivity. "She liked to find little trophies in the street, which she always brought to me joyfully; we had tears in our eyes when we first met, both exhausted, suicidal, and miserably lost. Great loves are forged in great pain. Period." It is questionable whether a human being is capable of being objective from a human perspective, as opposed to the perception of an Agathos Daimon or a deity, for example. It may be a subjective or intersubjective approach to objectivity, but these intersubjective and subjective approaches sometimes trigger intellectual signs that approximate an objective interlocking between subjective and objective worlds. Passion belongs to the generative realm of nature, as do suffering, great emotions, love, happiness, all excitements and privations. The hard-core Buddhists of the Lhag Thog teachings moved close to the realm of deities described by the Neoplatonists. "I begged Magna Mater to take her home, kneeling on my knees in great reverence, gazing into the body of my beloved as into the garments of the stars, as I foretold that her soul would be killed by my ancient enemies. She used to play with crystal prisms, 'oh look how wonderful, it's like a kaleidoscope'. She is in the stars with diamonds" 'Locked in a cage of subjective suffering, his agony was objective' — a thought once formed in my mind. So for the gods, every moment of our life, every feeling, every pain, every happiness is purely objective, there are no subjective states of mind and heart. The question of intervention is another matter, because everyone receives according to his share and development. Gods rarely interfere inthe affairs of people, especially this world was taken over by people when people stopped calling on the gods. This is the basis of Theion Ergon: "Work of men, work of gods", as it is said in the Chaldean oracles of Julian the reborn Archangel Theurgist "Calling and Receiving". "I saw her face in the starry sky, it was sad and full of compassion, may all the gods swear that we will meet again. She left a small gift for me, a book in which the phrase 'Find me' was most prominent. I received it for my thirtieth birthday". Builder of the house, you shall build no more — a Buddhist stanza. With all the strings pulling us back and forth, finding yourself is truly a miracle, but it's not an easy path. It's like being in Plato's cave from above, where sometimes you do not know whether you are the prisoner or the radiant Deity. Others call us, but we do not know whether we belong to them or to the prisoners.

Discourse on forgotten mysteries thread.

Let the haters of reason scatter to the winds, they are like malignant spirits who obscure the meaning of great doctrines and replace them with vile ignorance of blind faith. The obscurantism of the exclusive flock has always fought against the intellect of Providence with the ever renewed fervor of a blind fanatic, de facto replacing it with the words and doctrines of their zealots who confuse the logos of Providence with their own infantile projections. They coerce others and indoctrinate them into a passive spiritual slovenliness, believing in the foul, heavy air of their cathedrals that they are on their way to heaven. By kneeling before their half-dead corpses and bewitching them, attributing to them their false love for a corpse. They also mock, ridicule, and destroy any master and mistress they discover along the way who offer a prospect of freedom, beauty, intellectual support, high integrity, and self-identity — a true hypostasis against their stubborn, morose intoxication with suffering and pain, which they masochistically refer to as 'love', a Stockholm syndrome of bellicose hatred towards the world that is pure cannibalism to 'consume in the name of love', to 'kill in the name of love'. The cacodaimons help them in this miserable work of extinguishing the fire of reason, the flame of intellect, the great creative power of the celestial, supernatural worlds, which give birth to stars that our astronomers consider to be collections of swirling densities of gas and gigantic masses, birth chambers of powerful stars. All this is also true when we study both the phenomenal shadows and the philosophical essences. All these lords and mistresses destroyed in the name of a faux pas on the cross to which these believing imbeciles, these dangerous fools looked up as if he were their savior. The Savior of their indigestible desires, scorned by Heaven. May Christ redeem himself from his suffering — would have a Boddhisatvamoeglich said to him, if he ever listened. A theologian of them would say that it is a 'symbol', that it is an example ofa sacrifice, of a mortal representing a divine interior slaughtered by His own. A stolen henosis, the point at which a man, a woman is raptured by effort, Isidiac, truly, into the greater expanses of the hieratic worlds. What kind of a hoax is this? Was not Heracles, the initiate of Eleusis, and his mysteries, the Heracleiana, protected by the gods? Was Dionisos not an initiate. Is not Orpheus and Euridice a greater passage, a topoi of beauty? Julian Autocration compared one after another — heroes of antiquity against the Galilean hoax of a crucified pig. And yet, yet! Christ embodied all the sewers of the lowly, the wretched or the rubble. He had to curse the world with his rottenness and contamination in order to give meaning to his worthless mysteries, which initiated no one and seduced many. Julian Autokraton wrote: "What an unwise saying is this, to forbid tasting knowledge, not to distinguish good from evil?" — he further wrote: "To know good and evil is a natural need of men, for how can the wise and sensible decide what is good and what is evil, turning to the good by inclination and knowledge, without ignorance." Praises Helios in his hymn, Magna Mater, the Mother of the Stars. They called me a serpent, may the serpent spiral up to the divine, in the Akkadian text the kings were serpent-tongued, lion-headed. What a compliment to be compared to these people of wisdom, greatness, justice and power! What a hoax to turn a lion into a sheep. Peace is won by righteousness, not slavery; it is won by striving to be strong-true peace, not by the meek, who would willingly turn into jackals if given the chance to be stronger than they are. Glorious sun religions had to be destroyed so that their Nazarene eaters could triumph, the world had to be turned into an ugly, disgusting, suffering diabolic so that this religion could triumph. For what is the meaning of their Galilean Essene Gnostic in a world of beauty, of greatness, of reverence, a world where harmonious life is not strangled by the hardships of life? Their diabolical deception of a crucified mortal has defiled many a greater, better man. One might ask: What is the point of this accusation in the modern world? Is it a reverse resentment of what cannot be undone, cannot be undone? What is the point of finding fault rather than creating something beautiful, noble, principled? It is a personal account of a funeral, a cathartic burning of a religion on the Devanagari grounds. It is a rebellion against what was done, against what was and what is, a wedge in Plato's cave that crossed the prisoners on their way out, with seers reaching out to those who could see themselves. Every civilization has a round of destinies, every culture has its karman that leads to one or the other. Nevertheless, it is significant to leave a warning sign — to see what fruit the reaper will reap with his scythe. A poisoned fruit is left for Veneficium, the craft of the poisoner, a good fruit is used for healing, as the Drottars (Druids) knew. But are the mysteries of the ancients in the modern world a mere imitation, a mere repetition, a faulty reconstruction that has no right to exist? Or is there a hidden scheme of recovery, of initiations, to which men can look with all due sanctity and depth? Do the traces ofthe parental initiations hang by a golden thread over the globe, the Spheres, the stars? Are we really on our own, on false masters and charlatans, on instituted religions, on those few who know how to speak when they should be silent, as the masters and mistresses command? Is it really the time of silence? Abandoned we are not! I have been blessed with too many laurels, with too many signs and sigillia from Heaven to ignore this. What a brazen fool I would be if I did not share these invitations with the others! Sometimes I feel like Prometheus, cautiously making his way, fearing I might lead astray, who has stolen the fire of the gods. But it seems that the gods promote my way, if I interpret their intention and my intention correctly, that what was transmitted should not be held back! The chains, the processions of initiations are not held back, they call, we study, we practice, we act. We do the scientific work, we do the ceremonial work, we direct our senses, our intellect and our feelings to the Divine. We rebuke ourselves when we fail and stumble, we correct our ways when darkness enters us, we point our Pythagorean forks at Divine from messages, we swing and fold our follies and unrulinesses into an even greater path! As one Hindi philosopher — Kautilya (371—283 BME) mentioned: "Philosophy is the lamp of all sciences, the means of performing all the works, and the support of all the duties". Like the sun, which distributes its rays equally to all, it was understood to be an honest force. Thus, contracts in Rome were signed under Helios to represent honesty. It also stood for truth, which is obvious to all. Truth stands a priori, objectively, as the deep grammar of the universe, and is therefore closely related to Justice as the regulating force of this grammar, insofar as the force gives them a drive, just as the intellect (nous) gives a certain order. In the tarot cards it is the star (sun), justice, strength.

To Dare, to Will, to Stay Silent

If daring is the courage to break established patterns, to 'defy the world and venture oneself on the sacred path', to break the shell of the comfortably known and conditioned, automatized, and thus discover one's freedom and willpower through training and confrontation, then the will is an individualised movement of desire into a vision by 'knowing oneself ', knowing one's movements and forming mastery, in accordance with the divine will (procession, metaphor of the true Will), which one discovers by peeling away the layers of deception, ignorance, discord, cacophony, confusion, by constant means of reason, intellect, intuition, and not without Swedenborgian feeling, a gigantomachy within, represented by the Mithraic axiom: "harmony of tension in opposition", "against the void of inertia". In this, duality is resolved into a 'unio oppositorum', which is situated between the 'coincidentia oppositorum', the movement is decisive, the decision liberating, while the liberation is a struggle, "be patient, struggle, work", go with the gods, the redemption (liberation) is not a pill to escape (as in the song by Killing Joke, „Walking with Gods"), but a strong determined attitude. In the process of liberation there is no rest for the free, the evil and slaves must continue to be evil or enslave. On the other hand, a highly contradictory (antinominal, personal, egoistic) will that tries to hurt the world and itself with its personal projection. The difference between the divine Alexander of Macedonia and Hitler is gigantic, just like the difference between the Imperial Rome and its mocking cliché — the Nazi Empire. For the daring and the will we need a foundation, a fundamental self-constitution, a maturity, that of an Olimpius, mentioned in the letters of Iamblichus. It is a vision that dynamically and continuously sets in motion the effects of one's actions and of events in the world, but with reference to the Highest of which one is capable, a system of coordinates united in a perfect synthesis Staying Silent is the Eleusinian gift of transforming the world with the perfect silence of an idea. Bythos, the deep depth of an abyss, and Sige — the deep idea in silence are the epitome of a magician. The language of the magician and his deities is silence. To speak Gnosis Arretos is a great art, Gods understand all languages, but the former is ultimately the greatest interpretation of a man, translated into the logos of Providence. This is the reason why Eleusis initiates kept silence, words were useless and could do more harm than the silence of pure intellectual ideas. The world, I believe, is intelligible in all its realms and intellectual at its base, it is of continuous providential illumination, we must open ourselves to it and engage in the process through powerful streams of silent, glorified ideas, all else is but a reflection of it.

The memory twitch

Godot, now 92 years old, sat in his wheelchair in a nursing home. The nurses occasionally looked around and exchanged a few stiff words. -'Why did he move?' he wondered quietly, with an unspoken thought. Somewhere above his head, a storm of memories raged. Scenes moved backward, but they did not catch his attention. One, a cloudy, blurry one, stopped for a while. A scene, a flash. That was exactly sixty-eight years ago. She ran after him, laughing and shouting, "Stop, you stupid bastard, I love you!'. He stopped, silently content with the fact that they were together, comfort to his tired mind. Another scene. Unspoken things, tension as they parted. His finger twitched again. He smiled gently in a way he had been taught years ago, a compensation for not feeling pain. He did not, both the gesture and the pain had been dead for years. Gone. He stared at a spot on the wall that was fading more and more. Again the scenes were frozen. He, though trapped in a body, was already incarnate. If emptiness were to be defined, but a passive, humiliated emptiness, that's what it would be. In the corner of his eye he saw a shadow, a shadow soul. It whispered: 'Tis' tis', 'tis' tis'. Tic tac toe'. He did not answer, smiled numbly, after forgetting it, he mumbled something that sounded like this in the good old days: 'I am not afraid of anything, never have been, moments like these fit into eternity'. But it was just a -'mmmm'- followed by a nod. He saw something else for a while, future events on Earth, the disasters. They did not catch his attention either, he stared as if hypnotised, without any reaction. It was more important that he had to pee. He could not call the nurse, so he wet himself. She will come later. He did not know that either, she cleaned him up anyway and changed his underwear. Another whisper, trying to rouse his understanding: 'Once a roaring, snake-tongued lion, now fading into insensibility, you had a chance to die young.' He did not understand, just blinked, a nervous twitch. -'The last thing you'll say after you die will be a cold gasp' — the shadow tried to intimidate him. He thought of the night and the stars, but in a cold way. -'You are useless, you always have been, you do not even understand what I tell you anymore' — the shadow said. The man behind his white eyes suddenly replied in a voice that was not his, 'You tore up everything I never needed. Thank you for freeing me, I am already free'. The shadow grew in powerful anger, darkening the room and whispering, 'You will not escape, you will not, you will not easy!' The man was already dead.

Ides' march

Tap tap tap, the water dripped into the sink, and each drop was as cold asthe winter air, ripping wounds into a stone of sour understanding of his mind. Spring came, March 20, at 10:30 p.m. Vernal Equinox, the Ides of Mars, the games of the wolves and the she-wolves. Somehow the water sank ceaselessly as he listened to it in a kind of zenistic union, half stunned, half stunned. He had not wondered for a long time how he had gotten to this point. Because it is so. That's the answer he got to his questions as a child. He was a little blond guy, very lively and cheerful. Like a stern wreck barely adrift navigating the meanders of life, he tried to remember. He imagined his tired, stern, tense and dry face sitting next to this boy, smiling wearily. The boy did not understand, he was scared and afraid of his future self, he wanted to run away. The older man would cry if he still could, because that's what you have to feel. He detested these hatched souls of inferior quality. Even moon souls did not match his intellect or spirit. His soul was killed long ago, it bled to death and was torn to pieces by evil machinations. Draconic brain, thank Gods for this reinforcement! It was a gift of mercy. Even the gods had enough of his pain, so they killed his feeling out of compassion, but strengthened his mind, intelligence and resilience. Serpentine compassion, like Aesculap or the great Naga Kings. We all become cruel, but we hold back the poison with a greater strength of will, so as not to shed tears of poison, of veneficium. The child uncomfortable, inconsolable, the father in him looked at the child for a while with a paternal smile that would scream 'murder, destruction!' and look malicious, but it was an honest smile of a strange, darker benevolence. He searched for her in the eyes of the other women, avoiding their faces lest he accidentally catch a glimpse of her physiognomy. She was long gone. At least she died in him. A caregiver, an archivist of his stories she wanted to listen to before her memories were erased, killed, twisted, perverted. He decided he would never share them with anyone again. What would be the point? In the grave, carried like a burden, beyond Starborn memories of everything are restored, Mnemosyne's pass. Absolute memory, perhaps a small nod of understanding remains for the last life that should not be. I want nothing else, objective memory of all instances of the universe is the ultimate truth, as is silence, the perfect thunder of an idea. He saved himself from suicide, another time he failed to commit it. Never again! Never again! A silent, wordless voice in the air spoke: 'Keep going, on the other side your perspective will change, you will not suffer anymore'. The dropping of body and mind, a broken, damaged, crippled brain, an attacked nervous system, slander and lies that buried him deep in the grave of the profound gesture of 'not this, not that' until he began to grow resigned to it. Leonardo da Vinci once wrote: 'Those whose mind [and heart] are fixed on a star, are not hurt by lies and slander'. He was not, although he heard it every day, from people, from the other side, who spread illusions and malice. He was busy overcoming bigger problems and engaging with an expanded mind and heart despite the bite of the locusts. He lost his love, but that too had to be overcome, why bother with it? Mere nihilistic feelings that were not worthy of his efforts. 'First the gods, then the world, then men' — Pymander, Corpus Hermetica, from a human animal, a humane man was to commit himself to the worlds above, to call, to call, to call, that the world may receive, that the kingdoms of the earth may receive, then men, last of all, ungrateful and stubborn beings, for whose sake 'the stars do not turn' — a trace of Chaldean wisdom.

About overcoming

Karma is more than a mortal can bear - A Buddhist Proverb

Once upon a time there was a man who lived a dedicated life. He embraced others, was always kind, assertive, and dreamed of a better world. One day, while he was traveling abroad, someone spotted the man and, out of malice, cast a curse. The man, unaware of this offense, noticed that over the next few days people began to treat him badly, as if he were doing them wrong. As the months and years passed, his friends turned against him, and his family swore never to see him again. He was left penniless, a nervous breakdown ensued. He wondered, "Why is this happening to him, was not he, as far as he can remember, good and fair to others?'. He heard a whisper 'my son, this will change'. Soon, looking at the people wearing his broken, old, worn clothes, he noticed that something was happening to them. The women lost their hair, their skin became dry and dead after a while, they lost their cheerfulness, the man became sick and died of terrible diseases. Being righteous, he began to blame himself and tried to hide from people, he withdrew from society. His compassion for others was too great to allow their suffering. One day he was strolling through a park at night and was robbed and beaten up by a gang of gangsters. He stood up and with eyes filled with hatred, the bitter resolve to use his curse to destroy others found its way into his shattered heart. 'Why did this happen to him?' — he asked disconsolately — 'Why all this?' While he was thinking about revenge, he heard a vicious whisper — 'Why not' — 'it happened to me, why not, bastard'. As he grew older he became more adept at controlling himself amidst the hatred felt by those around him, he was a master of discipline in dealing with others, and soon he rose in the ranks of the people, feeling more comfortable and strong than ever before. They hated him, but admired his inner strength and keen intelligence. He began to make an awful lot of money, forgetting the rest and killing people for the pleasure of his curses against the cattle with which he once felt equal. His personality was thoroughly vicious and corrupt, cold in his cruelty and satisfied with his evil. The day has come when he was in a car accident, another car rammed him as he was exiting a highway. He remembers floating in the air for a while and hearing a disembodied voice that seemed to him like glistening gold: -'Have you forgotten your childhood, how it all began? — The causes that brought you here are not the effects you ever wanted. Then he found himself in the hospital, no one around, just the full moon staring out the window. In the corner of his eye he noticed a dark figure and heard many whispers: 'We accuse you, we accuse you, you have wronged us, death, accuse, you'.

The last woman in space

Times were volatile, markets shifted eastward as the Western hegemon fell apart like a leviathan without legs. The magnetic poles were also drifting, shifting and triggering magnetic storms and cosmic rays for the next couple of centuries or so until they would stabilize again. This was long overdue, as the climate changed with the vagaries of the geomagnetosphere relative to solar connectivity. Solar domes, fusion-powered tokamak generators to stabilize the planet, a far-fetched dream of utopian city-states all fell into disuse, the prototype in France, Cadarache, failing due to lack of funding and internal unrest. Nevertheless, there was a minor breakthrough in one of the DARPA labs just before humanity was on the brink of war. The Chinese built 1320-ton statues for the God of War. In research facilities based on a collection of digital IDs quantum computer algorithmization and mass radionics, the collective brain was slowly being decoded, as were its cognitive-physiological mechanisms, social engineering programs along with cruel experiments on the mind with psychiatry on the banners merging with neurolinguistics and merging with biopsychology gave a new imprint to a strange, eerie reputation. The first prototype cyborg was called 'the bee' as the real representatives died out. With the creation of the first fully functional cyborg came a commendable optimism that the dark ages were over, that humanity had once again entered a new era here. The volunteer father of the project, researcher Simon Darwin, and his assistant Helen Descartes had not only created the cyborg, deciphered man's erratic mind and created a synthetic brain, but also agreed to transfer his brilliant mind into the machine's thinking framework. He said he was the first immortal, the Nibelungen Methusaleh. Hearing the news, one man initially flew into a rage, but when his colleague calmed him down, he said in a resigned voice, "It's like transferring a mind into a corpse, a technological necromancy, nothing else. The Buddhists explained the samskaras as compound clusters, and the goal was to dismantle them in order to refine consciousness, reflect its purity, and become free. What they do is essentially to lock the deluded, ignorant mind into a self-created horror chamber and virtualize an already virtualized hell."-'Why the hell?' Aida said: -'Surely you are not postulating that there is a reality outside this world, some metaphysical nonsense? Humanity's concentrated effort has always been aimed at freeing itself from suffering. You cited Buddhism as an example, is not that the ultimate goal, and you are a modern Luddist who is afraid to deal with technology?' Again he replied, 'Maybe you are right, but I prefer the good old biomantic school, life has been laid out in this universe for billions of years, was not it for a purpose? Or are we really a plague of the void, to become machines that traverse the void to colonize, to beget spirit, to constantly expand? It is true, our species has its limits, it is not eternal as an organism, as an ape striving to be divine. Ancient people had more intellect than we have today. When we are all transferred to the cybercore, what will come? A digital eternity inthe cold fires of dark energy? I have to come to terms with that now. I did not know the sequencer technology the Psiops stole would lead to something like this. What's next? Now they are going to build the Hyperion arc. All right, I am done with the credits. It should be an arc for the living, not a tomb for the dead. Aida replied: Your job is done, old man, at least you were of use to the company. By the way, I have been employed since then. I will contact the agency, you can spend the rest of your days in a place surrounded by greenery. You know, a forest and a small house, just like you always dreamed of. Someone is waiting for you there. He fell silent, his gaze vicious and cold, as life had taught him, and he whispered, 'Fuck you, fuck you.' Aida: If you do not want to sit here and spend the rest of your days as a loser, you can sign a new contract if you want, they have already promoted me to Star Lieutenant, new ranks, cool, huh?' He stared out into the universe, trying to rest his eye on a tear he once had, and whispered, -'Fuck you all'- 'Then that's settled' — said Aida, leaving the apartment and quietly closing the door. He sat in his armchair, pleasantly stunned, and once again did not know if itwas the honest part of him or an act he made up himself. He would rather believe itwas honesty. For a while he remembered the embrace of someone from another time, she was killed, replaced, swept away. — 'Where does she live now, how is she?' — he pondered 'I do not want to know' — he remembered seeing her face in the stars. The project was widely advertised, many volunteered, only the best minds were selected for transfer, or the richest. Some had euthanasia injections given to them, which killed them after the mind transfer, it was like a fashion statement to be a cyborg. The first colonizer arc was full of mind clones in machines and while humans cheered their superior class of beings, some wanted to protest. Some were reasonable moderates, others were religious fanatics. The former tried to reform what was left of the planet, the latter howled time dead and tried by all means to convert others to their one religion. Soon a war developed, a global bloody war, the survivors retreated to the deserts with their crosses and taught others about 'the book'. Others werewandering scavengers, few wanted to organize and soon formed paramilitary cliques, but the birth rate was almost zero because of the yellow dust and winds that developed after the re-polarization. Nuclear meltdowns everywhere after the Carrington event, failure of satellite communications. Between the Atlantic only fiber optic cables worked, communication was maintained for a while with generators, but soon contact between continents was lost. Great wind storms brought a lot of sand from the deserts, which rarely settled anywhere, it was a whirlwind of an air dune. The sixth extinction. -'It was our fault' — they all said in the end. He died before all this happened. He did not know it, but the last words he spoke were, 'Wings of the ancestors Ennoia, take me back, may this hell realm of this lying corpse come, yellow planet, black planet, take me back.' It was all in vain." Then he took sedatives and drank Nembutal and, after 15 minutes, set fire to his apartment while looking at the full moon in Libra, which was conjunct HD 140283, a star of magnitude 7.223. Between fires, he smiled. Some said only a man freezing to death feels a divine fire just before he is raptured into the stars — he heard this fifty years ago in a psychiatric hospital from a fellow patient. On his deathbed, this thought did not occur to him. He knew it and smiled. After resetting and activating their synth brains, the human clone IDs woke up. There was something wrong with the cruiser, a technical glitch. The main plasma conduit had failed. The cyborgs did not panic. They bickered and blamed 'the humans'. It was probably damaged during the warp. An old businessman remarked: -'Mighty were the towers of the Ziggurats, they built them for the stars'. Immediately after, the shielding collapsed and pieces of the exquisitely three-dimensional, nanoprinting, industrial-sized Titanium-1 alloys began to fall off. The last one was Aida. She was smart and hooked up to the spine charger. A tough, survivalist girl on Earth, she had an unkind childhood, grew into a highly disciplined, analytical 'bitch' — as she was called in academic circles — and eventually attained the title of 'genius,' 'mistress of the lab,' 'alchemist of high tech.' Before Aida was hurled from the space shuttle into the cosmic void, ready to wonder in the voids of the cosmos for as long as her charge cells lasted, she thought: -'Why are we alone'. With her pseudo-bionic eye, she saw a flash. She gave the command, 'Scan all spectra.' -'That's not necessary,' her cybernetic brain listened inside. She noticed a sliver of a face in silver and gold, magnificent, radiant, outshining her for a while. The last thought before she was torn apart was, 'It's me, I am her, finally, what did we do wrong?' The alloy of matter that made her up was torn to pieces. Her nanotic processor was destroyed. A glorious song rang out and thundered through the universe as everything returned to a gigantic calm to be no more. The earth, after time had passed, was green again.

A modern Du Fu darkly

May the red dragons rejoice on the wind, carried by their human companions, may the evil of greed, disbelief and sorrow dissolve into nothingness — with wishes. With the Chinese New Year just around the corner, I feel compelled with the remnants of my dignity to write a short story about a humble, beautiful Chinese man. Once upon a time, there was a man born somewhere in Inner Mongolia whose ancestors once fought in the Black Dagger Uprising. It was a group of dedicated warriors who protected the peasants first against the excesses of the Japanese and then against the communist government until it was dissolved. He toiled in the fields, and in search of a better life, he moved to nearby Beijing to work in a factory. With little means, he settled in a terrible multi-story apartment block where he lived in two square meters for what he could afford. He still remembered his grandmother's stories about the yellow flags and red lamps when the Republicans tried to rally around the young emperor Pu Yi. Times were volatile, the boy was not promising, the government changed often, the emperorship was corrupt. She told him the story of a poor man who toiled in the fields and met a dakini. Her beauty was amazing, she was bathed in the light of the rainbow and wore red and green luminous cloths. She danced around him and said, "I am a wish-granting jewel and you are a humble man, what would you like?' He smiled with his rough earthy face and said, 'a good woman'. She nodded her head and disappeared like the dew of rain. In tears, he remembered this story of his grandmother and continued to work in the factory, hoping that one day he too would see the dakini. He saved all his money for a gift. It was a wooden box beautifully decorated with jade and gold. Inside was an obsidian ball studded with silver. He kept this gift for her. Since he was losing his eyesight, he bought a pair of glasses and was very happy and proud of them. He took good care of the glasses, but one day when he returned to his small apartment, he lay down and never woke up. A man aged 32 who lived in Warsaw, Poland, a rather vicious personality, read Chuang Tzu with awe, pondering his thoughts and reveling in his work. Ah this, ah this. He fell asleep at two in the morning. He had a dream in which he was presented with a dark room with some furniture. He felt an invisible presence and heard some soft Chinese words with slow thoughts. It was a ghost. The spirit directed him to a wooden box and said, 'Look, this was a gift for my wife'. The man admired it, congratulated the spirit and bowed respectfully. Then, full of joy, the spirit showed him a pair of glasses and he said: -'Look, what beautiful glasses'. Not wanting to offend the spirit, he admired them and thanked him sincerely. Then, in a flash, he became aware of the story of his life as he wept for the spirit. He whispered through the tears, "May the great Dakini take you, the spirit of the old man, to herself, may you join her, may she take you as her husband." The man woke up, tired of his own cruelty, and to this day he thinks fondly of the old man's spirit and wishes that he had found happiness and peace. Such was the story of the spirit of an old man, such are the dreams of a simple man. May it be a sign and a hint to the lamp of a hermit.

The evil that men do

The evil that men do I lit the candle in a candlestick given to me by my beloved. In memory of myself, my family, loved ones and close ones to my ancestors. I imagined a big, wide darkness and lit the candles in the underworld. For all the forgotten dead. Sigilaria. In ancient Rome, men were sacrificed to the Dis Pater, slaughtered like sheep, for I read in Macrobius' 'Saturnalia' a writing of the tradition he offered to his son. The custom was replaced in the kingdoms and later in the Roman Republic by the lighting of a candle andthe making of white masks instead of sacrificio, the killing. Di Manes, the good dead, ancestors of mine and of others, without distinction of ethnicity, custom, religion, region, skin colour. Those who remained, who are in the mists of the underworld, like small schools of fish on the surface of a great abyss. First my own lineage, then that of others. This is nepotism. If we identify with those close to us and admire, love and respect them, we can spread this to the rest of our race. That is how it should be done. I turned off the lights. A shadow demon, befriended, to my left, growing out of an open closet as if it lived inside, a twisted black face flashing white face-like deformities, a little night person I treat like an adopted son. A beautiful white spirit touched me and put a ribbon with inscriptions over my arm arm. All at once, our time is slow compared to the astral world. Some shadows just stand there, caught in a long thought, and after the shouting is over, they all whisper or fall silent. Because the living do not listen, because they do not hear. I see them because I myself am dead. At least partially, because my heartbeat and biological processes are largely undisturbed, strengthened by some strange magic. The night came, I lay in my bed and listened to Offermose — Mørkt Forår feat. Of The Wand & The Moon, Grift, a feminine fiery shadow kissed me, I touched her hand, a shadow witch was carving something on my skin with her pointed long finger, or was it a nail. It is all black, covered with writings, stories, lies and information for others. I opened my eyes and saw the mask of a man contorted in grotesque pain. The dead inhabited my body. I asked this friend, 'What made this world so evil?' — Which echoed as a naive question in my own head. Tough little bastard. I forgot my vicious pain, little tortured pleasures interrupting the heaviness and severity. A certain lightness from time to time, a focused, humane lightness that was nevertheless strong. -'The people did it' — she answered through me. I remembered reading the history of Assyria and Babilonia, Elam, Chaldea, Cambridge Ancient History vol. 3. part 2. I remembered the Akkadian literature and the stories of men, demons and gods — 'The people were bigger, but not much better' — I thought. — 'Why is that?'- -'You have forgotten that the possibilities of doing evil are much greater, your race has evolved a lot since then' — she replied -'What has corrupted the people?' — I asked -'They have always been like that, but their evil has contaminated other worlds.' — 'I refuse to accept that' — I said — 'If humans are capable of beauty and greatness, how come?' — i asked her -'Animal man, participating in nature, was a child of nature, crookedness began when he was capable of the divine, then he closed his eyes to the origin and made nature his enemy, while in time he forgot the divine' — she replied -but there were methods to overcome suffering and evil, the Hindis and the Buddhists knew them, others too, Gigantomachy within'. -'These methods are consigned to oblivion, there is a scheme' — she whispered. -'What kind of scheme?' — that aroused my interest. -'A deep scheme concerning the fire of chaos, which attacks the lower regions of the divine 'It has its effects,' she replied. -"Are monkeys evil?" — I asked like a child. "Only humans can be so bestial and idyllic" -"That's the price of making a child of nature a god, as if capturing the divine in the animal" — she said -"But it's not unique, it's like a whole plan was worked out to capture it, is there more?" — Inquired. -"Desire" — "to be out of one's senses" — "to live" — "Man is not made for happiness" — she expressed. -'But should we then blame the gods, judge what is good or evil?' — I asked. -'Do not you dare, they are your friends, a toil of ages, the infinity of the past behind your race, the infinity before you' — she answered softly. — "Some say we are made of the blood of Aw-Ila, an Igigi god, to toil like the rebels" — I said. -"Then be free" — the last whisper before she left. -"But do not spurn this world like those who hated it" — she gathered her strength and disappeared.

Mephistopheles prerogative: clueless Boddhisatva

"Then who are you?" "I am a part of that power which eternally wills evil and eternally works good." Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Faust: Part One.

In Mahayana Buddhism, it is the final net effect of one's actions, neitherone's intentions nor one's deeds, for which one is held karmically responsible. By what action? One might ask. Through the co-dependent, co-existent world of phenomenal events themselves, which are governed by various orders of justice, natural, human jurisdiction and law, transcendent, divine, objective physical, etc. If we define justice as a Platonic idea, it can be understood as a 'reactive, regulative factor of the harmonies of deep transcendent and objective laws'. If we define justice with a classical notion, it is a 'regulative codification of human experiences, ordering them according to social regulations, derived from situations that require moral or ethical judgments and decisions', then the strict Mahayana definition of justice would be something like the 'reactivity of karmic causation networks to the actor who participates in them'. Power, justice, responsibility. The more power one accumulates, the greater one's responsibility for the net effects of one's choices, even though one is already enmeshed in networks of power and causality when one enters the scene. Each burgeoning consciousness, each new birth, enters into a pre-existing web of relationships. When a leader causes deaths or condones bombings of civilians, leads to poverty and deprivation, and lives in a 'castle of delusion,' responsibility for his actions traces everything back to the causative effect — the leader. The soldier who kills on the battlefield is responsible for his own karman, but his karman is linked to and traced back to the leader who ordered the killings, through 'distributive co-responsibility' with various weights of nods to the network. From Bardo Thodol's point of view, only madmen want to put their minds in a position of power these days. Or very willingly — for whatever reason. Thus Mephisto, the old devil who in the Buddhist context 'wills evil that always turns to good', is an example of an absolute inversion, where he appears as a saint by the net effects of his actions, but as an ontic entity can be outright evil. He is better than a sacrosanct devil who causes evil through the will to do good, but still better than the absolute evil of the Black Brothers, which only leads to evil through the will to do evil. Remembering that good is a golden chain and evil is an iron chain, why not remember people like Milarepa, a black tantric magician who, according to legend, wiped out entire families with his mischief, but became a supreme Boddhisatva through his efforts to "break the shackles." Not all of us are so fortunate, but the highest good, which I instrumentally define as the Platonic Monad, is a pan-theistic view and can be derived on earth from reason, wisdom, insight, and the ability to grasp and penetrate all causality with understanding, to make ethical decisions, principled judgments on how to prevent, remedy and alleviate evil in terms of the Hindi Buddhist kleshas (suffering, destructive emotions, disturbing emotions, negative emotions, mind poisons). For example, the 'five poisons' described in the highest terms as: ignorance, attachment, aversion, false pride, envy, and all forms of delusion that prevent realization. Ethical and moral judgments and decisions require a cosmos or order. The original cannibals of Malaysia did not care too much about the zeitgeist of this order — it was established with the changing, shifting times. So is it void and relative? The question is wrongly posed. Rather, it is a form of human psychic forms, groups, and individuals that began to congeal and consolidate around certain factors with the advent of self-reflection and methods invented to counter what was considered 'impure, taboo' (bad) and to promote what was considered 'holy, clean, permitted', 'sacred, clean, permitted' (good), with shifting frames of reference for different moral concepts', which later developed into a social order based on values. It's not all doom and gloom, because there are things that are common to all humanity, that is undeniable, unless there is a 'zombie catastrophe'. What constitutes the value of a given society is what defines it. If profit is the value, then it is superseded by principles and makes people subjects — slaves. Values can be divided into external states, which have to do with the quality of the environmental milieus, or 'what is sought in the world, what is, what should be, what is desired' or internal states, which have to do with the quality of the subjective and intersubjective sphere of mind (noosphere), the emotional and spiritual states 'how we feel, how we think, what we are, what we want to be, normatively or descriptively'. Only when value is internalized as a principle directly related to human being: virtue or vice, it defines human essence, perhaps humanity or the 'lack thereof '. After all, everything is 'all too human', 'live and let live', 'beyond good and evil' one finds one's own ethos, hopefully not a perverse, sadistic or nightmarish ethos. Ernst Juenger wrote: 'A warrior may have his ethos', morality is another matter. But his ethos has a twist: May the dead be merciful to their murderers, for the dead may not have a warrior ethos, but they have a strange kind of morality all their own. Understanding karmic necromechanics enters the realm of posthumous justice. But why wait for justice after death when it can be realized here and now to create beautiful, thinking, committed and responsible human beings who draw from the wisdom treasuries of all civilizations and cultures. As one might say, 'Karma may be more than a mortal can bear,' so are the destinies.

On the darkness of ignorance

See, for I will expose the workings of the abject stupidity of the ignorant, who in their jealousy, in order to be victorious, must reflect their own depraved inadequacies in others, in order to be victorious, must poison a greater man with their own vile filth. For wiser serpents, among whom I count myself as Solar Drakon, a fierce enemy of both darkness and Judeo-Christian abomination, including their rotten corpse nailed to the cross, know how these wretched slaves approach their goal, the intelligent one, the intelligent they offer a bigoted religion, the astute they offer filthy bribes, the strong they try to ruin their nature, the virtuous they contaminate us with vice, the knowledgeable they offer blindness and lies, the free they want them to kneel like wretched slaves. For darkness and ignorance cannot conquer greater men, it must cripple their minds and lives to replace their minds and hearts, to poison them so that their pettiness and pathetic, worm-eaten attitude conquer us first by violent attacks from without, striking like wild pigs, and then from within, poisoning the innermost thoughts and minds of the giants who tower above them. The darkness is made up of rats who can only maintain their vermin through reflection and imitation. It is jealous of the greatness, glory, triumph of the Aionic solar providential intellect, its support and prestige, its superior position over the locusts, which are reduced to infinitesimal crippled worms by a single ray emitted by the sun, while it plunges Apophis, the wyrm, into the abyss at every attempt of attack. Planktonic idiots, stooges of this deluded power ceaselessly approach our minds and hearts, poisoning them with ignorance, replacing our virtues with vices, breaking us helpless, blind, until we become worms like themselves. Only in this does darkness triumph – it turns the great into worms, for it consists of mere worms who portray themselves as superiors. They lie creeping at our feet, as sun dragons we scorch them with fire. Our tribe of serpents, the dragons, abhor any deception, ignorance, inadequacy, any wormy belief, for our scaly armor is made of acid fire and courage, as long as these swine do not break us in our mortal human shell into the inversion of our aspirations, our strength, our astute intelligence and commitment. Cut. Them. Down. Stomp them down. Crush them. Destroy these wretched worms whenever you encounter them. May they never get their hands on any of us, this planet or the human race. May the tribe of the Winged Serpent, the immortal Winged Kheper Hearts and the glorious Sun Disks triumph over these pathetic worms.

About the spirit and the mistress

–When will my suffering be over? My mind is broken, rotten, vampiric, full of errors, paroxysms of cognitive and affective range, scandalous twitches and errors. I have to survive it. The Buddhists did not imagine a bunch of vampiric rogues experimenting on my brain, a tale of cybernetics and sadism. 'I guess another time, another age,' lamented one man that night –'Do you remember what state your mind was in ten years ago?' – Mistress Sosipatra, the seeress of the Greeks, spoke to him in gentle thoughts which the man mistook for his own. The silent conversation continued. –'Definitely different from now, it was something else' – he answered, thinking he was talking to himself. –'What is the most static part of your being' – The Mistress –'Well, my body' – he replied –'You see, that is so, and not only that, that is the only moment of reality you will ever experience from a human point of view. Another magician once said (AOS), is not your mind ultimately a concatenation of causes, made up of sensations, experiences, identities, memories, inclinations, natures, conditioned and autonomous responses, choices, etc.? – The mistress asked –'That's so, but it's difficult to perceive it that way, everything appears as a derealized illusion', he replied. -'That is so, but you must be aware of it and seek the core of your being from a safe position where you find static parts of your mind and coordinates in what you perceive, in other words, the flashes of events called the world, you always need a point of reference, and then you shape yourself to bind certain expressions and let go of others' - said the seer - 'It is a matter of sense, direction and discipline' - she continued. -'But do I dissolve after death? Would not that be preferable?' - he asked. 'It is not so simple. You arise in a world that already exists, and you are caught in a web of causes, along with the various souls of your being, including your mind and body. May it not distract you from liberation, but this is a distant goal, to extinguish all the karmic movements of the universe a sheer impossibility, to exhaust them in yourself is a rare quality nowadays, if you cannot yet reach the state of Pari-Nirvana, what would you do with the chain of being?' - asked the Lady -'To obtain it?' - asked the man. -'If the mind is an illusion, why preserve it, it is a form of self-destruction, we might as well become cyborgs' - replied the mistress. -'Is not it the paradigm of the modern world that there is nothing but the mind, in the naive sense, and that scientists struggle to explain this phenomenon on a neural basis?'- He asked -There are components that do not fit into their paradigm, you have found another way as a pneumatic, as a souled person. 'You can not fight the paradigms of the modern world, but you can fight your own way out as long as you stay in this Dionisian tomb,' said the Lady of Chaldeana -'If I were to ask the gods to create a new spirit for me to continue my existence, what would it be?' - he asked

–'Imagine your consciousness changing into a new vehicle and being born in a new disincarnated world, you receive a new movement of existence – replied the glorious mistress –'But if everything is an illusion, then what is the point of continuing to exist in one of the worlds, as a shadow, a ghost, a daimonion, an angel, a hero, or in one of the myriads of worlds?' – he asked. –'Reach the equilibrium of compassion and recall the rest until the chains of being are over and we all retire to the final rest' – he answered – 'The purpose of the great work, tris-mae-gistos, is to descend to pass the consciousness through the necessary seals and later to ascend and transform into a deity, held, angel, purified soul, with the support of the elders. The toil of the great work is to commit oneself to the cosmic expression, knowing the laws of the changes of the cosmos and adapting oneself to the divine will to participate in a greater chain of being. – Said the Great Lady –'How can I thus outlive my own mind, when I am incapable of performing this task' – he replied. –They greatly underestimate themselves, as Nichiren said to Shijo Kingo in 1276: 'Never be troubled by the difficulties of life, after all, no one can avoid problems, not even saints or sages, suffer what is to be suffered, enjoy what is to be enjoyed' (. . .) – the mistress recalled a fragment of a text he had read some time ago. He put his thoughts together and was amazed at what came to him. As he stared into the night sky, he thought he saw silver-gold wings with the Caduceus Staff in the centre, appearing and disappearing out of nowhere. He wondered a lot, calmed down after a while and fell asleep.

Idea, narrative, reason, action!

Any form of discourse or narrative study should never be divorced from group and individual psychology, for that is to measure the results of a particular subject.

I.

Take the idea of witchcraft from the European Middle Ages. While parallel civilizations, e.g. Hindi (spreading faith and magical-spiritual techniques) and Arabic (pro-science) were at their peak, most Hindi practices were branded as 'witchcraft' by the overzealous inquisitors of Europe Europe. The term 'witch' is as broad as its usage, whether we mean a prophetess, a seeress, a priestess, a herbalist, a sorceress, a necromancer, and so on. Exactly what area of the magical arts is she proficient in, what skills does she have, what position or profession does she hold, and similar questions apply to her male counterpart, of course. In general, these concepts, words, abstractions add up to a whole framework of a network of ideas, while the Cathedrals of memory and universes of discourse are built, adapting meaning and content to the context of symbolism and belief system of the time and age. For example, witchcraft in the Greco-Roman period was understood differently through the lens of Greco-Roman religions and cults than it was through the symbol and belief recognition apparatus of Christianity. One would have to examine in depth the phenotypes of these cathedral structures and what the visitor perceives when visiting, or the phenotypes of seeing and feeling both the structure, the 'general impressions of the esthetics of the whole' and the modus operandi of seeing and understanding the content in particular, with all its undercurrents. Any interpretation of an existing 'insider's' perspective perspective is fraught with the prejudice of pareidolia [parά, "beside, alongside, rather than [of]" - in this context meaning: alternatively) and the noun eidolon (eἴdwlon "image, form, shape" - the diminutive of eidos)] refer to belief systems in this context, whereupon one sees relevant phenomena only through one's previously acquired belief systems, distorts the factors that are crucial to understanding the phenomena, and nihilates any content that is incompatible with the belief system. This is a trained skill that is highly counterintuitive from the perspective of self-preservation of habitual belief systems. As with all forms of study, effort must be put into this skill. The objective skill is trained in a similar way. As a spectator, one has a more objective viewpoint than the committed actor, as long as one can also discern well and is open-minded to the ways of the latter. An objective theological scholar who is, for example, a professor of Sanskrit and a comparative mythologist, will view an uneducated believer indulgently and objectively without being involved in his ways of perception and without being entangled in his belief system or his ways of acting and perceiving. It is likely that an uneducated believer who has a set of beliefs, such as Christianity, and no basic knowledge of Buddhism will not have an educated and far-sighted view of Buddhism, and that his way of perceiving Buddhism will be thwarted by his pareidol bias. a person who is ignorant of others will not see anything beyond his own understanding, as far as his ignorance or lack of knowledge allows. In other words, the more educated, civilized [Hellenic], inquisitive,and open-minded a person is, the better he can understand another's perspective. There are things common to all people that are determined by empathy, but when it comes to belief systems, without any idea of the other person's belief system, one is just an object of pareidolic bias, and that is directly interpreted and written into the way of seeing and perceiving. On the other hand, if you do not know anything about the stasis, the subjects of the other, you can not make educated judgments, so you fall back on the universe of discourse you know and read everything into it as if you were looking through lenses that let through no light but only a tiny slice of the social, religious, historical, cognitive, political spectrum of the whole matter, while being blind to everything else.

II.

The other interesting aspect is how these belief systems, perceptual lenses, pareidolic distortions enter the upper structures of the neurocognitive circuits that biopsychology deals with. How they are conditioned is what sociology deals with,

then the upper level of cognition, which is often unconscious or remains in the realm of unactivated knowledge or ignorance of ignorance, namely the architecture of meanings and beliefs, which is composed of the history of ideas, their transmission, transmission capacity, memification, stratification, diffusion, distribution, mutations, adaptation, evolution, and so on. Intellect and reason are the self-conscious geniuses that shape and carve into these ideas to reconstitute, produce, rearrange, and compose new narratives and ideas. How they work in practice is the study of mass and individual behavior, for example complex adaptive systems in complexity theories applied to the social sciences to study them quantitatively. Humans are not a 'tabula rasa' and do not function in a void on which everything can be written. We have our cognitive abilities, thinking styles, cognitive phenotypes, we are shaped by mentors, society, images, self-images, imago and logoi, etc. If we are lucky, we individuate according to the alchymic process and mature, if not, we live with acquired automatisms that preserve the illusion of free will. Therefore, every phenomenon mentioned in the first part is inseparable from the biopsychological, sociological, mythogenic part. This process largely determines human behavior in the civilizational context. He who masters the context masters the meaning. It is both dangerous to the uneducated and a threat to the educated. Populism thrives on the domination of context; religious fundamentalism thrives on the domination of content and the faith through which it is seen; it appropriates context and content. Fortunately, the context itself is not homogeneous because of the diversity of content and meaning. Therefore, it is not susceptible to abuse by the reverse totalitarian regime or any form of populist fascist ideas - after a while, the whole construct and dynamic frees itself from the shackles, but each time at a high price of education, open-mindedness, human principles, virtues and values. Every war robs humanity of something, every rise of stupidity and human folly that is placed in a position of power damages the social fabric of minds and hearts. It is not easy to overthrow a tyranny, but the reconstruction of a society of mature individuals is arduous after it has been ruined by stupidity and baseness of ignorance, whether by a war or a cold war between intellect and ignorance, reason and stupidity, virtue and vice, principles and spinelessness, the whole and egoism.

'I see here only a tragedy' – she continued – 'not of evil, but of generation'. –'That is, no one will protest against nature or life' – she laughed – 'Embrace it, but the degree of otherness between perfection and generation, perfection and growth, creation and reception, suffering and nirvana is an ever-increasing tragedy' – 'Those who see it are few, those who exercise it, fewer and fewer – she continued – 'But is it not the case that every world has perished?' – she asked in a gentle way. –the Socratic irony belongs to those who descend as prisoners in Plato's cave, they act against generation and blindness, a heroic attitude, but soon they are strangled by this world. –'What about those who destroy them?'– 'Madmen, they will not wipe out the universe or the solar system even if all the crowns and armies of Pluto were theirs'. –So what can you do in a world of failure?' – 'Do not add evil to evil, stay in growth despite the times ' – My Saturnian father interrupted me. – This is a very human reaction, but in the eyes of angels you see terror and awe, never a tear. –'That's a demiurgic view,' I inquired curiously. 'Forget the details, every perspective is born from your life, what kind of glasses do you wear, blind man?' – 'Ah, now I see I do not have any' – 'Not in this life' – she winked at me. –'Then what's the point of all this learning and practicing?' - i asked. they know exactly what you must do, as your mind and destiny allow, wise choices for a young old man. Builder of the house, you shall build no more - a Buddhist Lhag Thog (inner teachings) proverb. Pause for a while. Take a look at all the threads that animate your mind. What is the most static part of your mind? What is the densest part of your personality, your self? What makes you a real person, a qualia of an individual existence? Where does it all come from? According to the Samskarian view, in which senses and mind are only an aggregate of conditioned clusters that have crept into man over the ages as carriers of these energies. The only original reality that this 'man', this 'woman' can approach is the sheddingof all these conditionings from the perspective, from the attitude of these conditioned clusters, to reach the original light of consciousness, the purified lenses of pure mind. But do we then cease to exist? Is everything just a concatenation of causes and effects, illusions in motion, which we abolish and thus abolish life in its generative aspect? This would be nihilism if a fatalist, a reductionist, a materialist took this stand. Embraced by the joy of life, the illusions play in favor of life, because empty and void we are the cup of the world, the cup. But who embraces the demiurgic hand, who frees himself from the roots and floats in the stars and beyond? Uncounted threads of all the movements of Shakti, a hypothetical energy that flows through the universe like the sacred words and seals of the Chaldeans. When does Shakti become Samskara, or when does unconditioned energy become conditioned, when Nirvana is Samsara at its root, then Shakti is Samskara. For a magician, this is of paramount importance, for by definition he attunes himself withthe creative force, he revels in his children - the movements of his will. Basically, a magician is a microcosmic demiurge, a mystic is the one who receives the demiurgic and transdemiurgic transcendent call. How to understand the exclusion from the universe, the apparent search for a transcendent reality in which there is something like nothingness, because we erase our own existence to become free and one. How can the contradictory, immaculate will be reconciled with the act of ascending and burning, of fading away in great awe? This knowledge is given only to the exhausted man, for which he strives and desires dispassionately. In the eye of the beholder, the world he sees is all that he is in the mirror of his dreams.

The homeless woman was traveling on the night bus to shelter from the rain of the previous storm. Some random passengers, hangovers of the day, gave her a brief ashamed look as she boarded and turned away from her disfigured face and the smell of old clothes, feces and piss. In the back of the bus sat a man wearing a silver mask and a black hood who was not noticed by anyone. He was the only one who looked at them with an incomparable gaze. He whispered in his mind, 'Ishtar, Innana, Shamash, Belet-Ili'. She woke up in the morning on the park bench, a little drunk and full of worry about the next day. And yet, something changed. She felt fresh, powerful and happier than usual. She touched her face and the blemishes were gone, she touched her hair and noticed strong, black, curly, long hair on her previously almost bald head. She also noticed that her old clothes were gone, and she smelled of an eerie nutmeg and sandalwood oil. -'That was the scent of her skin!' - she was surprised and smiled proudly. She was wearing normal clothes, like everyone else. She stood up and looked at her face in a pond where water had accumulated due to yesterday's rain. Her physiognomy was of outstanding, radiant beauty with golden, white and yet a little Moorish skin with Mediterranean undertones. 'I do not believe my own eyes,' she thought. Her character and nature also straightened, she felt noble and principled with a commanding attitude, similar to the old Semiramis. She heard a voice in the air: –'I am your guardian, beautiful one, there is a small piece of paper on the bench'. She asked 'Who are you?' but no answer came. Her eyes were drawn to a small paper on the wooden bench, she grabbed it and opened the red seal. –Marszałkowska 140, under the carpet there is a key'. She made her way there as if she knew this place from before, although shehad preserved her memories of being a homeless, destitute person only yesterday. When she got there shortly after, she remembered waking up in the Saxon Gardens. In fact, she found the key under the carpet and opened the door. It was a beautiful little apartment with high-end furnishings, a vase of tulips, On the wall hung a reproduction of William Blake's painting, 'The Great Red Dragon and the Beast from the Sea'. On a small wooden coffee table was a letter, also sealed. Pleased to see another clue, she opened it. 'This world is already a whore, you are just another whore'. Startled by the message, she backed away a little. She heard a voice again, 'Artemis, Artemis, you are long gone, go through the door'. She went back to the door through which she had entered and opened it. She saw red fire and in the center Jesus Christ crucified with the signature above his head 'Traitor, King of the Jews, Lord of the Flies'. He was surrounded by his followers kneeling around him with red glowing eyes while strange demonic beings repeated all the tortures that Christianity had invented for others over the centuries. Popes and inquisitors were burned at the stake, theologians and saints were quartered. Nuns and priests were tormented with iron rods of fire in their throats. A dark, grim voice said, 'Do not turn Gods into demons, Artemis, your art and temples are fallen, Hecate of Fate'. She could not believe her eyes and yet laughed at the whole spectacle. Her face turned black with many faces and lit the fires with golden lights, she roaredwith serpent's tongue, roared like a dragon, while all these figures trembled in great fire. 'You are cruel, I see, so was it with them, baptismal curse, who will undo it?' – the dark voice asked. –'the messenger has already been killed, will you free them from the fires? What do you think?' – the dark voice continued. –'When dawn comes, they will be freed after the sun spits lightning on the earth and douses the land with fire, is not that what the great Plato said? That the earth undergoes destructions, by water and floods, by air and great winds, by fire and burning and by earth and earthquakes and volcanic fury'. –'This is how Atlantis perished in the past' – said the dark voice. The homeless woman woke up in the park and looked around. A man was looking around, walking with his wife and a daughter. The homeless woman got up and shouted in a shrieking voice: 'Where is the dragon, I am Artemis, you fools!' The man laughed at her and walked by with his family. She heard only one voice, a last breath in the wind: 'You will not see these worlds, death was a forewarning, your time is near, let them line up for the hells, watch them still, the moderns, you will decide their fate, are you mistreated, burn them, scorch them all!'

Methusaleh

His torn, ragged clothing has served him well for years. He lived through his youth and rebelliously observed world events. On the verge of commitment and retreat, he knew he would not change fate. He never regretted that. He held a small wooden tablet with six runes on it: Algiz, Sawilo, Laguz, Thurisaz, Hagalaz, Raidho. His palm intuitively grasped it, like a snake trying to suffocate its victim. He had seen the war, the population shifts, the great floods. Now he was safe, in the taiga forests of the former Russia. Centuries passed, even the strong winds that carried the yellow desert dust settled. He remembered an encounter about five hundred years ago, when carefree humanity was still busy with its own affairs. A girl drummed camertons around his body, demons of nature, chthonic, representing his death in a vision. One saw the treetops of the taiga where his weary body should rest. She was a friend of his once great love. Naively, he believed that the gods were renewing his body for some reason, but long ago he had forgotten these conjured explanations; they were mere rationalizations. Over the years he became more and more silent, but he began to understand the language of nature and the gods better and better. The ghosts of other people remained behind, some rose into the starry mist, others were shadows of the past — they no longer troubled him, in silent contemplation. He avoided the ruins of the cities, there, in the landscape of abandoned, invited soul remains of many. There, once again, Atlantis experienced a catastrophe. That is, the planet Atlantis, Tybil. He does not want to think about all the thoughts between his birth and now, he was part animal, part god. His thoughts had merged with nature and the divine, they were no longer his own, as they were decades and decades ago. He lay down before the stars and contemplated the treetops, a winged ethereal serpent closed his eyes. His body was torn apart by wild beasts, maggots and ants. If you know anything about his spirit, whether he rests in the great abysses of the underworlds in a sealed cosmic tomb that he once constructed, or whether he joined his dream, and you read this in the past, please think of this man and make a wish. That his most wondrous of loves, which perished centuries before his death, before it really began, might be saved across the stars as his will and testimony, that he might join it. When the seventh bull of heaven, Methusaleh, star of Libra, the next victim, joined Kakkab Su-gub Gud-Elim to shine across the wastelands and dreams of nature and spirits from afar. The gods promised: When there are no more people, the planet will be green again.

Immemoria

When live and let live is not enough The post-factual age is characterised by a low attention span, a memory capacity like that of a goldfish, and a socio-political virtualization of disenfranchised movements. A dream sphere of apodictic forces destroying the remnants of forgotten freedoms, a dream zone of corporate statisticians drawing the boundaries of life. The post-factual age is the greatest achievement of social engineering in the technological age. By and large, the trends have settled in and they are advancing. In the democracy feast of inverted totalitarianism, transient appetites are satisfied, whether through controlled, permitted or accepted dissidence, whether through the provision of 'bread and butter', 'infotainment and pleasure', whether through listless apathy and affirmation of 'business as usual'. People who are comfortable and not threatened do not question the moves of their governments. But when is it simply an appeasing mass of bad policy that leagovds to a terrible end, and when is it really good government for the foreseeable future with global insights and implications that are far-sighted? There is a quote from the Upanishads 'every enterprise is known by its effects' Almost no one questions the current circus of the world per history with the associated trends, almost no one questions, explores the place of ideas, their meaning and historical potential. At least they live by them. When the ideas die, they are replaced by surrogates that flood minds and hearts with untruths. The time of grand narratives and grand social logos is over. Narratives are procured, advised, regulated, controlled, disseminated, measured, and optimised. Most already accepted this world without resorting to the contradiction they never felt or had the need to feel, think, conceive, internalize and act. I contend that the end of the world, at least for humans, is complete with the final replacement of the citizen, the human, with the statistical biomechanism fully identified with a political cyborg. A political cyborg is simply a subservient individual whose meta-programs have been replaced at every level, constructed by the forces of tide, zeitgeist, government, and set in motion from birth to death of its functional, utilitarian purpose. As an avid reader of history and one who likes to live the ideas as Ding-an-Sich in Husserl's language, or as Hegelian essence, or as Platonic true force, these ideas can only be killed by eliminating the cognitive-emotional factors and replacing them continuously, by developing into a web of sophisticated falsehoods that contradict the original ideas and drive a wedge between Swedenborgian feeling, the intellect of philosophy, and the biomachinery, ultimately short-circuiting the process of self-knowledge, the gnoseology of man. There are controversial concepts, but the ideas are pure. Ultimately, the biomachine, the biocomputer, is cut off from the essential component of re-defined ideas. Their components are holistic and cannot be subjected to an analytical philosophy, their modalities are multiple and cannot be captured with just one aspect. Do you remember the time when personalities of the past warned us about the future? It has all happened, both their warnings and the figures are forgotten, or we study them in a sullen atmosphere that does not allow us to see through the world spectacle as it has unfolded. The Cassandras of modern times are the past prophets of the future. All movements of the current political spectrum are mischievously marching towards the end of humanity. This does not mean global catastrophe, this does not mean the end of the human race. It means the posthuman political cyborg, one incapable of self-awareness, one incapable of critical self-examination, and therefore one that extinguishes its consciousness in movements that are meaningful only to the shell. One who is not able to generate zeitgeist through a logos that he has created. He is, in fact, a shell without spirit. A shell without machine.

Beware thou dark schemes

Last night I found a green piece of cloth decorated with Rowan twigs and fruit. For several days now, my misogyny at finding a curse of unknown origin has been driving me to bestial imaginings of how I harm the women around me. Once I was a lover of women. I was aware of some vicious shades, the angry dead or the eidola of murderers, but I was still not strong enough to defeat the overwhelming thoughts that slowly invaded me and discharged as my own. A few days ago, I had the terrible intention of incubating a woman. I remember my grandmother was an 'Amazon', she was dying of cancer. Her breast was cut off to slow down the incurable disease. She was a witch of strong Germanic Slavic descent, just like my mother, I was the last to close the line. No female descendants. I was incited by some spirits to take this cloth hanging on the wire. The first thought that came to my mind was that it was from a woman's grave. The garment was really old, the fabric torn, ripped and left a smell of creepy graveyard soil. She appeared in the shadows, as a female silhouette. I kissed her and she put a ring on my finger. An engagement to the dead, I had been married to many, this was nothing new. Sometimes I cursed her for her arrogance and threatened that I would exchange her with the Yellow King of the Chinese Hells. Somehow they did not listen to me. Ionce had a dream where I was walking on spider legs with my torso, head and hands being human. Arachne took my shadow. Little spiders with doll heads were walking around. I was buried in yellow dusty mist, after a while I jumped into another reality, that of the dead, where I comforted a young man at the train station. Back to 'reality'. I closed my eyes and saw the cover of 'Tubular Bells', an album by Mike Oldfield from the 1970s. I played the song on a loop on youtube. I thought 'wait a minute' — what was happening in Wawer, Warsaw, Poland at that time? I did some research. On March 16, 1981, a woman was murdered by a necrophiliac who killed women, cut off their breasts and genitals and sewed them to a mannequin for sexual gratification. She was his 'sex doll. The woman's name was Hanna S. He was executed in Poznań on July 28, 1986. Six days after I was born. The young child was watching the work in the prosectures since he was 11 years old, as it says in the story. I sensed that something was wrong. - they perverted his mind from the beginning, those cruel devils. I remember that I had a good upbringing as a child, but 'they' tried to pervert me in many different ways. On the other hand, women were also murdered in the cruelest ways. He was after me, my grandfather once mentioned that 'a murderer haunted him all his life', something also stuck with him. I came back to my senses from my terrible misogyny and wondered how this could have happened? Was I supposed to be a cruel murderess like the vampires wanted me to be? The shadow female rested beside me in my bed, as I pondered I smelled her skin and the memory of her sweat when she was alive. It was beautiful, like lavender and morning air. As a silent comfort, I kissed her shadow again and smiled into her blank face. I photographed the green cloth together with my Galdrabok Bindrunes. The child defiled, a monster grown, how could these young beautiful women suffer such a cruel fate? Evil should be stopped at the seed and eradicated before it grows into a dehumanized, de-individualized cruelty! I write this out of a sense of duty, to convey what the dead wanted to hear from me.

Angry Youth and Virtue

I met a young man shouting something in the street: –'Traitors, traitors to all mankind, who have sold their souls, hearts and minds to shit forever'. People walked past him anxiously, mocking or talking in between, women giggling and pointing at the madman. Still, I decided to approach him, stop for a while and ask him about his croaking. –'Why do you call people traitors?', I asked. –'This is not what I lived for, this is not the world I fought for, this is not what I was about' — he shouted and roared. –'What do you want from the people?'I asked him again. –'I do not want anything from the people, I have only raised my song high, and with regret I see that no one follows me, I have striven for beauty of the highest nobility, I have met with the ancients, but I found myself alien to this world and far from it. This world is ugly and has torn my heart. Now I see that I am shouting at it because I hate it" — he replied. I thought deeply about his words and did not blame him, but only said: –'I can sympathize with you, but do not think that you are raising your song too high so that others can not follow, and now you have only alienated the others from your goals, there is no reproach to you, because you have pursued a just and great task' I continued, "Would you like me to talk to you about the virtues you have followed so that you do not feel betrayed by this world, but are committed to upholding the values you hold dear?' — i asked him in a friendly tone. -'It is already too late, I have only gloating for the rest, how long can you fight among the blind without resorting to hatred, how many punishments can you receive once for living your mind, nature and soul to the utmost and being punished by the insignificant things of life, like a swarm of locusts belittling and mocking these things?' — he replied. -'This is the Confucian virtue of Yi, you are neither a liar nor a cheat, your honesty is well-intentioned, your malice a raging anger that puts you on a par with the sun gods, Shamash and Aya would bless you, for even the greatest misery is touched by their rays, even the greatest noble people cannot be dishonest in their light, so it is that power that is honest and distributes its rejuvenating light to all creatures, great and small. Sincere about things, it is enough to straighten the roots so that you do not grow firmly on false paths. For there are many people who are sincere about their beliefs, but they may remain unquestioning and inconsistent, and therefore are of no use to the common good. Do you think that the virtue of Ren, the virtue of benevolence, charity and humanity has died in you, that it has become a kind of twisted branch due to alienation, which has been cut off and is no longer strengthened and revived by the common bond? — I asked. — You speak of virtues I know, but I know people too well, they are insolent, arrogant, ungrateful, and prefer to chase their whims when they are well and full rather than care about the big picture" — he replied. -That is typical of little people, that their attention is riveted by what they can hold as a plaything in their minds, that their dreams seldom extend beyond their own affairs. I suppose you are not like the inferiors you pretend to hate, but you prefer to walk on higher ground and inspire that matter that can be shaped, or promote the goal and toil of it all, despite their stupidity, lack of consistency or foresight, rather than push them deeper into the abyss you so want to see. 'Zhi is a virtue of right knowledge based on observation and guidance that goes beyond the ordinary and is not simply a cloak put over that knows and yet does not know, that does not know and yet reverses all its wiser effects' — I replied. -'But how can I maintain this view, as if I were standing on the watchtower, looking at the sky and looking down on all humanity, with the virtue of Xin, faithful to the creative forces of the divine movements and the integral within, while everything is changing and even my mind is taken by the greater movements of these evils you speak of?' -Fight the corruption with great blocks and erase petty motives and hatreds before they grow into you. After all, you have seen how easily they pervert your aspirations, and after being reminded of your goals and ideas, they lose any meaning they had previously acquired, they lose their blood, and if you dare to ignore them or even cynically mock them, you mock yourself. For this you must establish a Li, an inner tradition derived from the cultural characteristics of the ancients that surpasses those of the present, but without neglecting modernity. May your inner coordinates guide you based on insightful studies, may your practice be permeated by the movements of the deities and the invisible worlds that gift you with a smile."-'A smile after all this?' — he asked bitterly. -'To have authority over people, do not become bitter, that will only shift your goals, and if you do not want the authority anymore, how will you use your Pythagorean lyre to influence someone else? If it is out of tune, it will annoy you, but if you find comfort in solitude, remember to take the greatest pains to preserve your humor and courtesy, remain open and friendly, overcome your inner turmoil with wise and fatherly dealings with people, they willoften be ungrateful, but they come and go of course" — I replied, "be merciful and bear with them thoroughly and steadfastly, as a true pagan should." -'They would soon take advantage of me and try to slander me or, much worse, betray me,' he said. -'Bear it with dignity' — I simulated a shout — 'I'll discipline you, young man' — I roared. Fortunately, he understood and laughed. -'Now I understand to remain steadfast inwardly and outwardly, strong inwardly and meek outwardly, and yet to have a strong will.' -'This is the Roman virtue of gravity, you carry on committedly, do not be distracted by the whims of spineless or unyielding people, I see that in your honesty you are already fulfilling a lavishly frugal style, including the speech you just gave to the crowd'. — I mentioned He looked around and observed the people -'Oh yes, that was unnecessary' — he glanced at a passing family and smiled. 'You see, humanity can be quite humane at times, the way you see yourself now, where is the torn, angry image I noticed before I met you' — I smiled at him. -'Nowhere to be found' — he laughed. -'A wise remark, but remember not to take yourself too seriously and not to be too proud or conceited with your works, if you take something from nature or the gods it will be returned to nature and the gods when the time comes, fame is a dangerous thing, anonymity is recognized by Providence, stay strong and do not waver in your works, do not give in to forgetfulness and be true to yourself, know yourself, there your true self keeps its dominion, all falsehood is unbearable in the eyes of the sun, mortals like to deceive each other a lot, but they never hide anything from the powerful eyes, not even the playful greatness of the ancients The young man turned around and enjoyed the light rustling of the wind. Meanwhile, I disappeared into my saturnine realm. He turned around and was amazed that I was no longer there: 'Where are you?'- he whispered with a tear in his eye. -'I am watching over you' — my voice echoed through the sky in a silent idea that only he could hear. He smiled and walked away comforted.

A Warm Place to Be: A simplified report

"My book was closed, I read no more, Watching the fire dance On the floor. I have left my book, I have left my room, For I heard you singing Through the gloom." — Chamber Music, James Joyce.

Circling. I circle in a zero-sum game in which I played the losing side. I had been stranded in the city for four years. The distant past, when I had travelled the world, sounded only like a memory I could no longer do anything with. — Do you remember every day of 2015, or can you summarise the most important points of a few months? Could you do the same for 2010, 2005, 2000, 1995, 1990 and on until you were 3 years old? I thought, 'This is when the first memories begin to solidify, unless someone has prenatal memories, references to other lives, other stars — these are treacherous things'. In a state of mania and despair, I tried to escape from the city that humiliated me, that harmed me, whose bricks and houses I hated, whose magical communities I despised, along with ordinary people who were as anonymous to me as yesterday's day. At night, my living corpse was pierced by invisible shadow crawlers. Buddhist meditation on a decaying corpse. Maranasati. In my bathroom, the walls were full of the spiritual remains of the dead, which I could see better inthe twilight. I packed my things, never to return. I gave my entire precious book collection, a whole library of Rara Avis books, to the antiquarian bookstore without even asking for money.

In a state of mania, with my mind shattered and assaulted, I wanted to escape as quickly as possible. My bus departed and made its way to the northern Carpathians. The original plan was to catch the eastbound bus transit in Slovakia, but I changed my route. The problem was that I had no money, I was completely burned out and broken, deranged and torn. When I reached the city in southeastern Poland, I remembered another young woman I had once loved, but I did not want to see her.

„Who goes amid the green wood With springtide all adorning her? Who goes amid the merry green wood To make it merrier?"

— Chamber Music, James Joyce.

I boarded the regional train to the border with Ukraine and arrived there after midnight. The stars vaulted me into a cosmic cave where I explored the slow initiations like the ancient Mithridates. As I walked along the railroad tracks, I came upon a ruined house. The roof had burned to the ground, but the late summer weather was so beautiful that I lay there to rest. The shadows of the dead gathered, and I heard a whisper: -'You are not welcome here, go somewhere else'-. I gathered myself, even chased away by the dead, and continued along the meadow path. The fog had fallen by now. I found a small hut near a lake, judging by the sounds. The door was closed. I lay down on the floor of the porch and tried to sleep. I had nightmares in which I dreamed of hospitals, blood, and sadists. I woke up an hour later. The nightmares were still there. Not dreams, but real nightmares. Beings that feast on people's fears. I heard a call nearby. I went to see what was in the forest. There was a sharpened wooden stake, pounded on the ground. I took it out and played a pikeman, half delirious, half aware that something was about to emerge from the darkness. An old friend joined me, I felt two belts of light around my chest, focused on my solar plexus. Megingjoerð. I judged that there was no danger and turned my back on the forest, reproaching myself for never turning my back on a potential danger. I collapsed into the hut, exhausted, and caught sight of a damp, wet mattress. I lay down, covered myself with my travelling trench coat, and heard a demoness scream through the air, "That?! That, you bastards! To my son!!!" I smiled to myself, adopted by a demonic mother.

„Sleep now, O sleep now, O you unquiet heart! A voice crying "Sleep now" Is heard in my heart."

— Chamber's Music, James Joyce

I slept well that day and woke up with the rising sun. For the first time in a long time. The next day some villagers reported me, fortunately not because of the burglary, but because I had been hanging around. My documents were all in order.

The border officials let me go. I felt demotivated and tired, the whole trip was sabotaged. -'I have travelled all over the world' — I thought — 'and now a fucking short trip in this shitty country can finish me off '. I took a car and hitchhiked to the next village. I needed money, so I went from shop to shop trying to sell my camera. In the last shop the man was convinced it was suitable for his daughter and bought it for a third of the price. As I drove back to Warsaw, I remembered the witch from the Ukrainian border. I thought: 'Jagerfrau', mistress of the hunt. When I arrived in Warsaw late at night, I said: 'I want revenge, order a hit'. I heard gunshots in the air, violent outbursts from some Warsaw pigs, and the scream of a vampiric bitch: 'You betrayed your family'. Originally, I was to be committed to a mental hospital for screaming in pain and talking in word salad, like Victorian insane asylums. Fortunately, thank the gods, I survived. My bed, a roof over my head, something to eat. What a warm place. I travelled with the conviction that I would be homeless for some time, and broke the inhibition. In the end, I was content and grateful, especially in winter, for a warm place to be.

„Despite the Writ that stores the skull; despite the Table and the Pen;[1] Maugre the Fate that plays us down, her board the world, her pieces men?"

— THE KASÎDAH of HÂJÎ ABDÛ EL-YEZDÎ by Sir Richard Burton [1880]

A madman danced at the train station

I was changing my night bus near the main station. My habit was to smoke a cigarette, far from the main hub for homeless people begging for cigarettes. On rare occasions, I chatted with some people. I went to the second floor, which was full of people waiting for the morning train, some homeless and other outcasts. I sat down and opened my tablet to read the time. Suddenly, a man in his sixties stood up, from a low posture with white headphones up. He started dancing and happily listened to his music. He did not seem to notice anyone nearby. People stared at him in amusement and disbelief. I sensed a story and bent my head toward him from behind. -'What drives good, decent people to do such things?'-'The happiness of madness conquers the unhappiness of pain.' I had conquered my madness, or so I thought. It sublimated itself into a psychopathic, ethical art. When her smile froze and she began to sob. -'Are you happy?' — I asked, and she seemed to regain her grip on reality. -'Only when I forget' — she replied and her face contorted in agony that turned into fits of laughter, she pointed her finger at me and said: -„You'll see". I went down to sit in a café where I saw the same man with white headphones dancing for three homeless people. They seemed amused that a well-dressed man was happily cracking up. I bowed to him again so he could see me and walked by. My bus was about to leave. I ignored the shadows of the dead and the Caduceus Wings flying by and devoted myself to my reading as the nightscape of the city passed me by.

A reparation in a torrent of rage

You filthy creatures of nonsense! An address of beauty and reverence that which I have composed in the spirit of mine. In great discipline and strength I have coined from my life! The nobility of old nourished me, and I kept all in my heart, For these treasures and torches to burn the fugitive world with a new flame This attempt was foiled, my throat turned scarlet From blood and poison spewed on you, From the disease of vermin I cannot bear, That spills on superior men, and, having brought him down To a shabby, petty life, admires the effects of their own ruin. For truly no one has triumphed while our failure and downfall is all around his own, just as we have constantly proved with the majority of all breaths that we will not submit, that we are above, that our lion's head is dragon-like, that we recognize the great and the small, and hate the petty, the envious, the wormy, the meek, who would easily turn into jackals if they had more power or gold. I cannot gather my senses long enough to comprehend this mischief, worthy only of swine, for the malignant evil makes use of subtlety, the simpletons destroy en masse, yet I dare not say that even evil shrank from lofty methods and submitted to this foolish world, yawning and directing these imbeciles to destroy something greater than themselves for lack of intelligence, to sow discord in a more opulent manner! Not from vanity I stand here, but from helplessness and a hateful resentment that my gifts are spurned, turned from gold back into excrement and monetized for small fame of a few minutes, weeks. Go to the graves with your fame! You will not help this world to convey how I, victorious in overcoming my madness, arrived here, To see that I fought and toiled and struggled for worthless worms! That all the incantations, the labor, the great deeds of theurgy in the name of earth, of men, and of the gods, were a rot, turned not by the devils, but by the putrid corpse of a leviathan of humanity, about to collapse for want of support, and yet with his head raised. The scourge did not believe in miracles, and when they saw them, they hid in cowardly fear as long as their worthless lives are not much moved. At least I do not have the right to be reborn as Ophiskaphalos, as a winged god, reborn in a mighty body of Aethyrs in the starry sky of Mother Neith, after having discarded this cursed monkey flesh! For in the meantime I invoke malignity and greatness with ever new passion, I have become a broken company, a corroded good, a contaminated evil. When a great being falls, he seldom falls into the grave without a view of the future, leaving behind a resounding warning that stands like a curse over the land for all to endure. You have changed a lot, children of the earth. Can it be that the course has been set and fate has begun to favor humanity? But these Morias, who once brought curses of unalterable magnitude, are now indeed much too weak to undo their intrigues, and they are crushed under the movements of destiny, which has determined a cold transition. That cold transition has been colored by all the deeds of men, fate, and the gods, and that there is no salvation unless one adheres to the timeless course. And so I end this flawed speech here, for inspired to write from my mind and heart, my mind ordered these clumsy sentences. I have spoken according to whim, not wisdom, but I know my convoluted charm dance, my tarantella, tomorrow I will be more focused and detached, deciding in strict benevolence what to do with this bunch for whom I have only contempt. The winners remain on earth as slaves, the losers leave it without regret.

Godot is Home

Godot sat in a wheelchair and the nurse was trying to chat him up: -'Did you know that this and that party won in politics?'- -'Ah'- He replied — 'That is interesting' — he nodded. -'And that a young prince in Japan passed away?' — she inquired — 'That is sad' — he replied. — 'And that atrocity, a new shooting at a school full of youth' — she requested his attention, half-bored, chatting him up, pretending she cares and committed by forced conviction. — 'That is dreadful' — he said understandingly. There would be nothing special about the situation if not the deep resignation of Godot, who through mature eyes experienced, and could see more than the young nurse could ever dream to see, be, understand and grasp. It was not a cold sight of apprehension of a lecturer or a professor, it was not a trifle nod of lovers, it was not a kotow to a boss in one of those Japanese corporations, it was not a veneration to Gods that ancient priests gave, it was not a blunt, annoyed understanding that parents give sometimes to children. It was not a deep-eyed exchange of souls that some people experience. It was something different, not the fear or cognizance of approaching death, not the recollection of life or some past memory. He was a non-returner, a compassionate detached observer.

It was compassion that found fruition in his detachment and every action and gesture and reply was speaking universes, although the nurse did not notice. He was delineating every ten thousand things in every movement and abandoning them as if looking from above, it was a delightful complete Isiac tear and knowledge surpassing time that rare people at his gentlemanly age sometimes experience. Yes, those who lived beautiful lives and completed them in a final crescendo of subtle dances that resolved in this melancholic tranquility of a fruitful Saturnine age. He once attempted to stop her. A shard of a shadow to kiss, a spirit to adore, a banquet of illusions to conjure. Thinking certain thoughts on the bus. The black brotherhoods visited him with her shadow-soul, her pain torrented into him in a flash as he scratched his face with fingernails, until the blood was flowing all over. It was his rotten face and her shadow-self conjoined in pain. Little Euridice. 'Is she free?'-they set her free, her shadow dissolved in the enlightened activities of the pure mind. -'Ah, that is good' — he learned the first step of resignation. 'And her spirit, will we meet?' — he asked. 'She has returned to the Divine, since you have released her, you cannot look for her there' -said a voice. — 'I am glad I did,' he replied resignedly. 'And her body, mind and soul?' — he asked -'Leave her, maybe she will become a wise old mother, as you once wished, do not worry her' — he heard somewhere in a thought of a song he heard. -'Ah, that's a good resolution, let her go' — he said lonely lingering. 'Do you remember your wish?' — she asked. 'Which, there were some ... ' — Godot answered. 'That she will understand everything before she goes. She did, she was glad' — he heard 'The face in the stars? The sad forgiveness and an embracing deity...' — he remembered 'That's how it is'. Years later, Godot closed his eyes. It was a late evening. He looked at the moon and thought: -'This is sad'.

Mnemosyne is Aletheia

I sat on the bus No. 146, among the sweat of working people. This is a line in Warsaw, Poland, connecting the National Stadium metro station with the area where I live. Trying to gather my thoughts and listening to 'Flesh and Bone' by Black Math, I closed my eyes. The visions took me tothe fields of African American slaves singing in unison as shadows of their past. How did a free man react to the injustice that fate had done to him? How did an African slave react to the injustice of already being a slave? — among the thought forms, these were the most haunting. The tears of a free man differ from those of a bound one, the latter having the taste of iron around their neck. I checked my thoughts: — "Fuomo, are you there?". But there was only silence. The merciful dead put a garland of flowers around my neck as I re-entered my starry temple. Everything was in bloom, the vines climbing, the roses growing persistently, the marble walls, the mighty colonnades through which I could see the universe. In the centre stood a fountain in neoclassical style. Leanan sídhe, Morrigu, was next to me, as a silver female figure full of grace and beauty, I was just a ghost, bluish-azurine light, feeling only satisfaction. We gazed together at the stars while she supported my shoulder with her hand. -"This, my friend, is your completeness, your Euidaimonia," she whispered. -"We are here only for a while, it is an illusion that will soon crumble" — she said tenderly and delicately. I thought for a while and looked around again, everything seemed as it was, perfect and complete. All suffering was frozen here, all unhappiness faded, and while the memories were engraved in the pillars of the temple, I heard a question in her breath: — "Do you want to remember your earthly life? — she asked, and I answered: "It is a burden that I would like to forget, but may the entire memory of everything that is a sister of truth return to me, then we will become one" — I spoke slowly, weighing my words and putting them together with great care. I fell on one knee in adoration of Mater Magna, the temple was washed away by the stellar winds, my souls broke, united with her and united all my past, present and future in a cry of ascent and rest. -"Truth, after all, does not tolerate illusion, it is immortal as the memory of itself, for it is the Numinous Luminous Fire, the Silence, the Depth, the Abyss and an Idea. Beautiful ideas, whether of intellect or of feeling, echoing in great symphonies of truth, my friends, never die, they are the soul of the universe, embodied in the constellations, whoever has understood this is already a hero among the starry vaults, his heart akin to the immortals in the sincerity of the last dance" — Morrigu bowed to the empty scene and disappeared herself. I opened my eyes, it was my bus stop, the rain was slowly coming out of the Autumn storm clouds. While strolling through the streets, watching the shadows of the deceased and the spirits of the nearby forest, I reached the batchelor's flat where I lived.

Potiomkin at GSI: A Short note

Potiomkin worked late into the night at the Genetic State Institute trying to modify Fgf8, encoding the diffusible morphogen FGF8, which encodes the Isthmocerebellar region, and the GCY-18 and GCY-23 magnetic receptors in birds; The lab lights were bright and sterile. His assistant rushed into the lab and nervously said: -'Professor, there is something important.... -'Not now' — said Potiomkin, looking hopefully out of his shining eyes -'Please, it is of the utmost importance' — said the assistant — 'Your wife, Mr., Professor, has been murdered' Potiomkin took it all in with stiff understanding and hid the rising pain. It overwhelmed him, he dropped his pen, but kept his insolent face. -'I, I understand' — ... -'You can go now, please' — he said. The assistant left the laboratory while Potiomkin began to cry. At first he let the pain seep slowly through his moist eyes, then he exploded, throwing everything off his desk onto the floor and wandering around the lab like an epileptic. He stiffened. His eyes locked on the injection of chemicals from a previous experiment that altered the brains of small lizards and mice he was experimenting on. He injected it slowly into his muscle, only to have no more idea of the tragedy. In the days he was collecting, his therapist said he was sublimating his grief and that he would be there for him throughout the process. He will eventually recover. That's what was said. He felt it. Something strange was happening to the inside of his skull, he could magnetically feel the inner structure of his brain changing. He could feel his guts, his intestines, his heart, his lungs, just everything. Some things were changed as if from the outside, by some strange means. Something ancient, serpentine, draconic. Last night he dreamed of dragons in the sky, some of them beautiful, magnificent in the brilliance of the stars. Others evil, hating, hurt, harmed. Some shouted 'the beauty, the awe', others 'our children, our children are dying, they are... ' He noticed a slight intuition in his head: 'We are not evil, people should not know us, approach us, your change will follow, it's up to you what happens'. The being introduced himself as a 'follower of Ea, the god of wisdom, creator of life'. He saw fish people in the mist, ancient grotesque biological amphibians, who presented him with starfish as gifts and told him, "These are our children, do you like them?'. Not knowing how to respond, he smiled numbly. Horror was all around him. When he opened his eyes, he had visions of primeval oceans, Neptunian creatures, just like in mythology. Oannes, Babilon, Sumer. When he woke up, he remembered that he had once read H.P. Lovecraft. He could not believe it. There was a.. key in it. When he attended his wife's funeral he felt nothing, in fact he felt that the people around him were dehumanized zombies, at first he blamed them for his wife's death, but his mind and logic told him otherwise; He hired a detective, the police in St. Petersburg were useless. All the papers of the investigation were open, they managed to identify the person. Potiomkin icily decided to solve the situation himself. He prepared 50 ml of Nembutal and neurotoxins from the laboratory and carefully packed the syringe. He managed to track down the young man, who came drunk from a pub nearby and sang with another. The other went away. Potiomkin followed him; at the next turn, he put on black gloves and waited until the perpetrator's intoxication reached its reached its climax. Slowly he approached him from behind, grabbed him by the head, turned him and quickly injected the needle into his neck. Then he quickly walked away. The drunk mumbled something and tried to follow Potiomkin, stumbling in the process. That was the end of him. Potiomkin felt only reason, his child. However, there was one thought his teacher had taught him. Ethos, yes. Compassion. He recognized that. The murder was irrational. Consequence of reason. An imperative that resonated in his mind.

Cold gaze

The mighty city of Iamblichus the Great, Chalcis-Qinnasrin. Bombarded by artillery, gunfire, ammunition moving through the hells. A lonely house, somewhere in the suburbs, and the shadow of a mother figure. 'Let it end' — she stared into the abyss of her child's dead eye as the bombs fell. A vast, silent, gigantic scream that rips cosmic mountains. An Eve who witnesses the death of Adam and then that of her firstborn. Across the silent space of nothingness, a scream that shatters the whole earth and race. Microcosms of tragedies, like broken hearts in the freezing rain. They repeat as archetypes and signs, one after the other. I crawled down the tree of Eden, I whose children were also killed. And I looked into her eyes with a yellowish spark. -'Your world has ended' — I gave her a comforting smile. Half cruel, half divine -'Why did she die?'- she asked, shaking her head hopelessly -'It's those who dream, who make dreams and those who kill the dreams of others' — I answered, staring at her with a shining blue eye. -'Why can not you feel, why can not you sympathize, why are you so cold?' — She was more afraid than of losing her child. -'Her world has ended, mine has ended many times, there are those who wish the world to end and those who have witnessed it all again,' I replied. -'Are you the cause, the revenge, something I do not want to know?" she asked. -'I am the time that does not pass, I watch the hell of the world, the divinity and the awe, your tear is your child, that is what you should know' — I said. 'Is there no mercy for one of us, an angel from above?' — she cried with an agonized body. -'This is what I want your child to know, go now, the memories of pain pass quickly, the damaged hearts and souls remain to cleanse and overcome' — I said. -'Then may I know who you are' — she trembled and was afraid. -'I am the angel of death who killed your daughter out of pity to bring her back home, the child shall not experience anything more.

A Wise Woman and Her Angel

Philemon, once known as Carl Gustav Jung, an Egyptian-Hellenic archangel, stood proudly over the city, calling to everyone. One who saw him thought he was the Chosen One Philemon shook his head Another who saw him thought he was a hallucination Philemon shook his head Another who saw him told him he was psychotic Philemon shook his head helplessly. A certain woman saw him and wisely asked herself in her mind: -"Why do not others see you?" Philemon inspired her with an idea: "The blindness of men is great, even when they see they fall into an even greater one."-"Will you stay with me?" she asked - "I will be your breath and your inspiration, be strong and free, do not surrender to forgetfulness".

How to Become a God?

I stood in front of the house and this is how my words went: Heroization, apoteization, people of science and magic, of great theologies and theurgy, of supreme perfection and unshakable unity of name, will and character, I salute you. Although my mind is bent in various ways, I aspire to the way of the wise. In ancient China, the way of the wise was that of great concentration and contemplation, to be a man or woman of the way, to unite earth and heaven within oneself, Wu, Chinese female cultivated mages of great refinement and Xi, male cultivated mages of great refinement were a great council until degeneration. The way of the hero was the second way — that of action, a cosmic trickster, the great clod who inspired and impressed, a cultural hero, a civilizational hero — who was a true champion if what he or she did was remarkable in the eyes of the great. Chaldea, the great solar cross on the lips, Babylon, Assyria, Persian Zoroastrianism, Egypt in its splendor, shining the mysteries of Hieros Hosios Hieros Hyperion. The pursuit of such a degree is a peculiarity without equal. May the great Boddhisatvas show the way! But listen to me! The gods have their council and they perpetuate their subjects. This is the meaning of the sacred path, the refinement of the souls, the daimonions, the genii into the ranks of the Divine... Away with the religion of the liars who worship a corpse whose stench is unbearable to my nose. Who have poisoned the world with a corpse and have brought the worst from And have combined the worst of Jewish recklessness and Roman persian degenerate practices into a monster of a religion. Yessir! Men are not evil, religion is evil, it is the fruit this religion has given to the world, enslaving human minds and souls to oblivion by an evil pact, the effects of its wretched crucified worm sending its devils to torment the Hellenes of the Way, destroying their cherished mysteries, ruining science, greater theologies than their beggars could have known. For I am a mortal, in Theion Ergon I have won my dragon wings, my steel wings, my armor of the divine, as promised in the Chaldean oracles, for I am a mortal, and no one who walks in this land is anything else, until the day of his personal apocalypse, the revelation worthy of an epopteion, by the sum of all his attitudes and his greatness, all his thoughts, battles and wars, which he does not fight in vain, in the gigantomachy of his mind and soul, representing his name, his will and his geniuses! Those without ethos, without character, how will you claim a memory worthy of a hero, how will you equate this memory with the truth when they unite in leaving this land? They are ways in humanity that are in accordance with the goal of the divine harmonies and octaves! Doubly despised are slaves who are enslaved by Heaven! Yes, truly, slaves are mocked and not pitied, what a mocking event, how they ruin greater men and women in hypocrisy, when this lying flock gathers to destroy them! How their slave masters point out this vermin to greatness to abolish it because it is a thorn in their side! Heaven spits on slaves, it does not need fools, for what good is a slave without freedom to heaven? The divine messengers are free in their advice. If the gods bring fire into the soul of a man, only a fool would refuse it. I spit on the jealous god-man of the Hebrews and Christians, I crush his head with joy, I crush his followers and poke out his blind eyes! The only thing their god-man can do is to go mad in his jealous hatred, while the great wings of Isis bless me, while the stars I kiss liberate me, while the ancient muses bless and inspire me, while the masters and mistresses of all cultures and civilizations support me against these cacodaemoniacs of Apophis, fools and ignoramuses of a lying religion. Yes, do not call me Antichrist, this vermin is no comparison to my just pride, for I have survived a thousand times more than this wretched worm, and no one dares to oppose my ascent, for I am under the protection of the dragons, my great gods of Sumer! And yet I stand victorious, overcoming all torments with laughter and striking down my enemies as if they were groveling at my feet. I have the twin serpent Caduces in my power and a mercurial child with a mortal spirit, a dragon Red, I rage at my enemies and intensify my deadly venom in silence. Only cold-blooded beasts have venom, serpent beings, only hot-blooded beasts know how to roar, so Lion Serpent Sun, equal to my kin above, a mortal though! The pigs below tried to use me for fucks, dollars and power, for religion, ideology and the nonsense of their ape relatives. The pigs wanted to buy godhood and immortality. They tried to trade my gods for their pig stomachs. The swine could not understand that they were projecting their messes on me, for I detest all their lazy attempts. I received the ankh, the dragon's wings, and my name is written in my star, a refined subject of theirs, a little god who bathed in Tartarus bathed, who did not even falter under the Vampire, who is devoted to the Way of the Star, the glorious Ra-Hyperion and the transcendent Fire of all Aions, worship the Igigi Gods and Goddesses who have hereby delivered me from mortal toil. I worship them, I worship them, I worship them, and the time I have left on earth I will use to refine and perfect the Ankh vessel, to be happier and more perfect, to be ennobled and full of ethos, to be undefeated and divinely proud, to strike down any enemy, who ever dares to stand against me, to dance with flashing swords and make my past enemies a royal sport, royal hunting grounds, so that I may shoot my arrows swiftly like Zarathustra and celebrate on the stars and rejoice with the one who was taken from me in life! Enter the holy ground, taste from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, decide with the mind what is better, and go into divinity without regret, supported by all the greatness that humanity has gathered throughout the ages! Be honest, steadfast and strong, be fearless, just and noble, be moderate, wise and know yourself, know yourself, know yourself until you merge with that greater power which will uplift you!

(H)oratio, speak

In ancient Greece and Rome, every citizen had to be able to present himself before a large audience, so the art of speech was highly valued. Quintillian mentioned that "bene discendi scientia" means to make such speeches that improve people to a great extent. Thus, the art of speaking well was a prerequisite for maintaining social cohesion, growth, participation, and engagement. From the perspective of meta-rhetoric, modern people are children who can neither memorize nor speak, neither invent, arrange, nor perform. Their speech is a childish babble, a movement of aggrieved ego, arbitrariness, and whimsy that rarely focuses on what, how, and why they want to say what they do. Whenever they are asked what they think, they hide in humility and admit they do not know. When they are proud and humbled, they invent an immediate answer that is nonsensical just to say something, anything. That is why they are so easily seduced by propaganda, the seduction of people who talk.... talk... talk... talking more nonsense than anyone else could invent. People who know what they know, who know what they have to say, are confident enough in their knowledge and convictions, in their logical thinking and in the coherence of what they want to say, to see through this nonsense of infantile politicians who parrot words without effect. Unsuccessful? They may move masses of passive recipients. But politicians are rarely linguists, semioticians, semanticists; they merely use and misuse words, for most of the time they are not even aware of the abstracts they introduce into a social discourse, a network of symbols. They are also like children. How often do they go beyond their immediate interest or attend to a trivial spectacle? Only rarely do they discipline the power of the word to achieve a true goal. Most of the time it is mere conversationalism, if we take the stasis of the majority of human speech in modern times, it is mere sounds uttered like little children — 'I want this, I want that, give me this, give me that, away with this, away with that, I like this, I do not like that'. The rhetor, the orator stands there like a statue, trying to tune their mind and soul to something noble, higher, greater, but he is silent, abandoned, watching children play at the foot of his monument, is it a 'game of hide and seek' or is it a 'Blind Cow,' he asks in a breaking voice. The children do not answer, they are playing politics, they are playing social games, each one of them extremely serious in their games, but none of them knows the sound of the spheres that Pythagoras once heard. -'What do you want?' — asked a passerby. 'To re-enchant the world, to make it beautiful again,' replied the stone.

The metaphysics of Anarch

As a child of the living ideas that are called 'interpretable', 'fluid' or 'contestable', I swear that they are not. They are completely objective and are merely transformed into intelligence by the human animal world. When we dwell above the Platonic cave, we know what the ideas of freedom are, of divine pride, of the glorious sight that overlooks the lands from above, of divine power and insight, of omniscient knowledge, of perfect memory and cognition, of great bliss and understanding, of perfect tranquility and simple, unhindered creativity, of great effort and heroic attitude, of the ease of enduring all this — like our second flesh. From the desire to draw all this in virtues that were once the blood of — for example — the Roman Republic, and to write them in our minds, hearts and souls. To live by them, to feel them, to practice them as something true, transcendent and unhindered. Now, observing the power games of illegitimate chiefs in all areas of human endeavor that contradict all this, one can choose between taking up ideas in Henotic ideals, the superhuman deity, the breath of Osirian life and Horusian justice, the power of Atum and the souls of the gods and goddesses, as was nothing new to the winged ancients in epiphany and epitomy, or submission to the rule of these illegitimate warlords and profiteers. All revolutions and holy wars begin within — this is where we are the sole rulers and commanders over ourselves, this is where we pose the greatest threat to those who fear to see free-thinking, autonomous, resilient individuals in their castles of delusion, separation, derealization and dehumanization. This is where the transformation, the transmutation, the alchemy of anarchic metaphysics begins. It is a fact that we are the sole rulers, cooperating with others, judging and evaluating their value, ability, merit and wisdom, which is factually proven. Therefore, we must constantly examine, be vigilant, open-minded, without tolerance for the ruling class that acts against the ideas deeply rooted in humanity, such as that of justice. Justice, which can be found even in atoms, has been replaced nowadays by a threatened, sick, disarmed, scaleless bitch with its eyes open, chasing after everything that shines. That everything else that masquerades as the antithesis of this human freedom is just a mask of lies and a slave-like business. That requires autonomy of being, maturity of self, responsibility in freedom. If the modern world does not provide such examples, we must strive to develop them in ourselves. When we have done that, we see the contrasts, we contrast the modern world with the references from the golden ages of the past, across all cultures and civilizations, like Goethe who wrote: 'He who does not know at least 3000 years of human history is a slave of the present'. So we live in the modern age according to ancient standards, as fools — or as heroes, villains and gods — decide for yourself. But it is the decline of the appreciation of intellect, ideas, memory and virtues as the most important human treasures, along with skill, knowledge, art and science, which are the lifeblood of any civilized culture. When things go downhill, all this is turned around and considered false or hidden from people's eyes. The simple things, the surrogates, pale before those who have not the slightest idea of what they have lost until now.

Unhappy house

It was a small American house with a garage. A 20-year-old boy and his father lived there. The mother had died tragically years ago. The boy sat in the garage where he had his chamber, playing computer games and exchanging ideas in various forums, alienated and estranged from his father, whom he hated. His father was in his sixties, you could say he was an old-timer, a noble man who loved his son as he loved his wife, who had died years ago. Car accident. I visited him from time to time in dreams. At first I watched the boy playing a game. When his father came in to ask him how he felt, he got up and left the room, silent and with distaste in his eyes. The father looked at my big shadow and thought I was an angel, we exchanged some thoughts. Neither in waking life nor in dreams was I aware that Ihad visited my friend. He began to cry and said, "Why is all this happening, if she were alive it would be different," I thought imposingly, so he could hear an idea that he interpreted himself, something like: -"She's well taken care of, and your son.. " — He answered aloud: — "I do not know what to do with him, Ihave tried everything" — I felt his heart breaking, all that caring pain. Again I thought in my darkened mind: — "You are a man with a golden heart, times are not easy, they all fall into extremes, do not give up" — I thought. -" I worry about what will become of him when I die," he said. -" You will take care of him on the other side, you will see the diseases and corruptions that have blinded him, I am as helpless as you are against the viciousness of this modern world" — I gathered a darker thought and planted it in his mind, along with some joy, righteousness, as he felta cathartic pain, so this emotional equation dissolved. -"Farewell, I must go now, be strong" — I transferred some of my own sadness to the old man's head, reluctantly. I woke up late in the evening in Eastern Europe wondering how often my vampiric shadow self travelled the world. It is now 1:28 AM CET. I just wished that his son would change and they would reconcile. After all, they both had no one else in this life. My own dead heart felt an ache, a novelty, for many months.

Game of Saturn

There is a justice deeply embedded in the grammar of the world. But it is not human justice that governs the stars. From a shamanic perspective, a cannibal in a trance in his rage for hallucinogenic entheogens could travel through the Axis mundi as well as Scipio Africanus' son, as described in Somnium Scipionis, on his supernatural star journey when he was raptured beyond the solar system to see the glorious universal spaces. The difference is that the former was uncivilized, while the latter lived according to a certain uniform logos given by his sociohistorical environment. The most amusing in this regard are those systems that, through self-censorship in taboo belief systems, miserably try to censor others while believing they are on the way to heaven, ending up in their own hell where their minds are trapped, while the most vile murderer on earth who understands the method, the causality with the necessary technical and mental effort and equipment, can be on the way to liberation, rarely but surely. The murderer, just like a Mithraic soldier or a Hindi warrior, can simply escape the gravity of his deeds and the judgment of the dead. This notion is appalling to certain self-absorbed religious zealots, for they would thereby lose all the foundations, especially their self-created, organizing logos of their incantation. The question is whether we sacrifice society within to regain freedom, to reintegrate ourselves into society in our autonomy, or whether we follow the traditional logos in the role of receiver, transmitter, catalyst, responder, conservative, reformer, or the one who builds new foundations, like Confucius, who found himself 'cursed by heaven' to set the hearts of such. Here, as a completely free man, a completely free woman, one must make a personal decision as to which way to go — this is an act of gigantic bravery, groundbreaking in self-government, discipline and thought. Whether he or she derives their reason from civilizational logos and finds a community with the others, thus basing themselves on a certain idea of friendship and humanity as a foundation, as a tribe, an ethnicity, a culture, a civilization, and thus imposing an order on their inner millieus in one way or another. But that is entirely their choice, for better or for worse. Not that the opposite is to be condemned, but it may be unwise and unintelligent. In my personal observations, I sometimes have the impression that certain scum wanted to dominate humanity and therefore imposed on it a self-censoring slave logo, understanding perfectly this joke played on this race. This is the game of Saturn: the game of the strict order for the purpose of preservation. A demiurgic prison, a theatrical play or an invitation to freedom? It would be unwise to assume and disregard all the socio-cultural, formative and formative aspects. However, it seems quite tempting to superimpose this on the normal sociological processes. Whatever governed these actors sprang from fear, perhaps benevolence, only later becoming Machiavellian. Who blames a frightened Homo sapiens sapiens who barely understood the magical power at his disposal and in his confusion almost believed it could be some kind of deity, a separate "I" free and in command? Without a frame of reference, we perish; terror lurks behind the facade of order. Therefore, order — even if it is deadly — must be preserved, because only here is individuation and freedom possible. In chaos one survives, but is never free, for how can one define one's freedoms outside of the Logos who created him, her? It is an anarchic attitude, pro-cosmic and yet entirely anarchic within the cosmos. But who gave the right to those who abused it? Who sent the devils to the earthly heaven, who allowed religious impostors to take the place of the winged excellent masters of the pagan times? But if we consider the whole causal, interdependent, jointly emerging historical picture, the Zeitgeist and its shadow, the Zeitgeist and its ideological maps — who is there to judge? Petty matters of people who can not see beyond the big picture: Essentially, it's about controlling values, abstracts, resources, and methods of structuring them: values, i.e., what values define the social construct; abstracts, i.e., what ideas merge with values and give them new expression; and resources: political, social, natural, zoospheric, noospheric, technological; and finally, methods: Surveillance or non-surveillance? Democracy or inverted to- talitarianism? open society and freedoms or secrecy? and information management? population control or population deregulation? etc. I find metaphysics useful here, anarchic at its core, but just like occultism, it is a luxury good: not many are comfortable enough to pursue it. Religiosity is historical and a method of control, as are its institutions: But if liberal, elitist doctrines are mired in metaphysics and occultism, what is a religious person to do? Should I lecture a homeless man on perfection? Or promise a corrupt businessman or politician that I will sell him heaven? Freedom is a double-edged sword. I like to think of it as a natural process: nature embraces everything, but is not choosy. Common sense prohibits me from feeling better than a Hindi prostitute in a pregnancy farm, but one can at least work to improve certain conditions to give the substance more of a chance, good old 'equality of opportunity' to develop. When the majority of the world is abused, it pulls everyone down, nature becomes ruthless, so does heaven! I believe even that one can end in the hell if one disregards certain order structures. If you bypass them, even if you are a villain, you can become a hero among the gods, if you fail to bypass and secure the idea of friendship with greater powers, you can be punished — by the regulators of an order. It is better to be a friend of the gods than a subject of a master-slave relationship with old bastards with ruler complexes. The Wizards of Oz will be toppled from the towers sooner or later, and friendship with the gods will last forever. If you are afraid of the relativity of things — I say there are objective laws, brutal, honest, inhuman, make yourself comfortable, smart, intelligent and cordial if you want. After all, happiness was the greatest good that the philosophers aspired to, along with beauty, truth and wisdom.

Question of perspective

A moth caught a man's eye "The world is a moth, an infinite moth!" — he exclaimed in the certainty of his genius. Another saw an angel "I am chosen, my faith is universal, no one is more right than I am!" Another saw a shadow creature "This world is evil, there is no providence, only hell, riddled with suffering!" A moth flying around the man whispered to his surprise, " A star is infinitely greater, see the masquerade, Human beliefs and perspectives, are a game of magnitudes, Between them masks of different forces, playing one after another in an instructive tirade. One mortal bombastically pours over the jar, the other puts in a drop, The vessel they take for all there is, but when it breaks — they cry. The angel you saw was a tiny sprite who wanted to say: "Elves Kingdoms are the most powerful of all," would you believe her? Without wishing to offend you Obaron's worlds, use your wits! The shadow that beset you was an instance of death. Understand the demons that haunt you and you will be at peace with yourself, It is a small planet in the solar system in one of the Galactic Wings, Galaxies many billions, but if you think you are infinite, poor human, so am I. An infinite moth sharing the substance of life, death, continuity of universal sure prediction. As a moth, I am at peace with who

I am, humans often have gigantic or belittling claims, a Brahmin believes he can Divinity of infinite space, power and time, a small mind plays to the Christian minds, understand what you want — then you will understand what you see, if you become an educated observer, Perhaps some tricks of the trade will be known to you.

Exposition

What I feared most – has come to pass. That even the shards of memories fail and fade with time and become shells of history, unfelt, unlived, unborn. I am surrounded by souvenirs of the greatest love of my life, the love born of mutual pain and madness, the love that was meant to endure, unaffected by vicious intrigue and petty, stingy envy. Now, as I move through the remains she left behind, even her providential gift seems unconvincing: "Find me, find me… . ". That was for the other side, after we pass away, to find her spirit in the stars. I let go of their wings to stop waiting for me. I cannot say that I thrive in the void, I spend my time in wisdom, watching the movements of the caducous rods in the night sky, the phantoms of the departed, the magnificent figures in golden robes that disappear into glory as quickly as they appear. Yet I greet them, withdrawn, like a general who has lost a battle, a consul who has lost a war and in resignation wants to honor his soldiers. One day I will join them, not to seek happiness, but to find peace. Not to claim dreams and hopes I left behind, but to find comfort. A quiet place to stay. And even if, even if I spewed bile of hatred in saturnine melancholy, our kind either sacrifices these things to the past, or they turn into curses that bite back. Those who have not lived deeply treat any such spectacle with a light hand - an insignificant sight that arouses them to anger. Formerly, when I have not lived, I used to make fun of such occurrences as a simpleton, but where one encounters the magnanimous terror of the empty abyss, one must deepen one's life tremendously and live for the substance of living ideas, a senior who has become childish, a senex who is a puer. Old people know this perfectly well, they realize too late that there is no point, and behave childishly after realizing that this spectacle is not worth the seriousness attached to it. In the intricate web of events, aspects of the theatron animatronique I stand with terror and nightmares that are my mothers and a curious look in the eyes, a child watching cruelly as an animal is slaughtered, rebellious, beats the other child for stealing his shovel. What distinguishes us from the children isthe mature reason, the sense of gravity and responsibility, what distinguishes us fromthe senexes is the idea that the whole world is full of gravity and responsibility, that we who pass on the waves of death have indeed a cry, a say, a history to write. They already know that they have not, even if they have lived in glory, it is time to pass on these ephemeral crowns to others. A modern celebrity is not the eternal Virgil, immortalized as one of the stars in the Milky Way, that's for sure. Without metaphysics, and I am a fool - for as an empiricist, Providence had to provide me with the second sight so that I could act, research and think to defend myself against an onslaught of anomalies - I would have to commit suicide, but the other side, with a certain bravery of living in darkness, ensures that it is not a cosmic void, but a cosmic Intellect and a world soul. Many did not have this comfort, many were good men and women and perished out of pure despair.

Eschatonic Attrition

Rarely do we find critical evaluation of normative journalistic judgments about what should be done or how it violates reason or human principles and standards, if we have any in common — given the relativity of things like morality, principles, standards, ethos, and belief systems. We urgently need a combination of different disciplines from daily or sociology of the day," narratives, study of discourse, complex adaptive systems, philosophy, and acting on it. At its core is the journey of narratives and ideas through people's minds and hearts. Of importance are: the cognitive phenotypes or the cognitive group phenotypes, the way information is distributed and received in the chaosphere, the deep sociology that sheds light on historical trends and narratives, the deep-rooted symbols of the unconscious or the egregors of the zeitgeist, and the overall topological space of ideas that move societies, groups, and individuals in their diversity and sameness of thought and cognition toward individual and group action. The Hearts, Souls, and Minds. Assessing modern societies using complexity theories such as the complex adaptive systems applied to the social sciences provides sufficient data to model the statistical behavior of a given collective, group, or subgroup of people interacting in a given setting.

In the modern world, we encounter lots of confusion. Information, disinformation, misinformation or outright strategic deception by conscious actors or unconscious mechanisms (mass self-deception, individual encoding of information). Here we come up against the sociology of knowledge, to know "what we know and how we structure that knowledge," how we disseminate our knowledge, and how we maintain our knowledge. Then the sociology of ignorance (agnotology), what we do not know, how we structure our ignorance, and how we prevent our knowledge from acquiring what we want or need to know. In the sociology of ignorance, there is a term called 'activated knowledge'. This is usually what we know, but we refuse to act on. Or it is a hidden potential of social action that is not tapped. Something that everyone knows about but refuses to organize and act upon, or does not integrate well enough to use as a stimulus for personal action. In fact, all action begins with a reasonable, disciplined, and organized transgression of one's convenience. Disorganized or void actions, that is, actions that do not produce change, do not count. They are without any meaning. All power is based on this simple fact. This knowledge, the so-called 'agreement' that was once abolished with the term social or social contract — was never really signed. The status quo has always been based on this kind of social contract, known but somehow hidden deep in the recesses of public attention and consciousness, only to emerge when crises occur. Or when a deviation from the existing is recognized. As long as the knowledge of the deviation or crises is not activated but maintained, the society of contracts can be abused indefinitely until individuals realize that their rights or principles are actually being abused. 'First they came for others, we did nothing, then they came for our distant ones, we did nothing, then they came for our friends, we did nothing, then they came for us, but it was too late'. There is a beautiful quote from the Book of Changes: "As soon as an untruth or lie comes to light, it no longer has the people concerned under its domination or control". Perhaps that is another meaning of this activated knowledge, that as soon as something obvious but deformed and manipulated comes to light as an untruth, the person is called to action, it is an activation by the not-knowing. The not-knowing should motivate to action, to researchand — unlike in theology — to humility before the not-knowing. When such an impulse arises to connect and act with knowledge against movements, groups, powers that threaten their laws, rights, norms, principles, freedoms, etc., for which they had lived. In addition, there should be a carefully planned framework ready to replace the existing centers of power, otherwise there is no alternative. In the intelligence world, there are several techniques for evaluating information, one of which is the Bayesian technique for combining evidence. To illustrate a situation succinctly, precisely, and perhaps strategically. It is a formal method for using incoming data to modify previously estimated probabilities. Thus, it can be used to know the error limits of estimates and predictions. Any information can be used to combine with previous historical data and subjective estimates of the probability of an event. In this way, it is possible to determine whether its occurrence has now become more likely or less likely and by how much. Bayesian analysis can be used to calculate the probability that observed data are due to specific causes. An advantage of Bayesian analysis is that it can link the subject to probability judgments about historical frequencies of recent events. Now, if one transposes the data, behavioral strands, mass behavior of people, and behavior of groups, it is possible to hypostatize them and identify the larger trends among people or masses. Even in the age of biotechnical information dumping, which some call the chaosphere called. When information overload — theoretically — diversifies human mental faculties to the point that there is too much confusion to act in a consistent, organized manner, there is a tendency to radicalize beliefs and opinions and a sense of separateness and togetherness (us and them, in and out-group) the combination of different tendencies of human behavior that remain the same but are much more flattened, defused and derailed. It is relatively easy to predict that people will be weakened or dumbed down by incoming information, but they still ask for it in more or less the same way as if they did not. This kind of "hollow" idea gave rise to social engineering in the 1950s, and the insights gained during that time through social experiments and games led to a very unpleasant system of control that is never really resisted, is ineffective but chaotic, gives space to controlled dissidence, and tries to punish honest dissidence (power threatening). Using Bayesian analysis, we can observe the drive toward a totalitarian system introduced in various sectors of society, fragmenting societies, empowering easily governed radicals, submitting to empty values — these arethe modern doctrines of power. Based on a conclusion by Hans Jonas that in times of growing populations and resource scarcity and abuse, and institutional inefficiency and increasing information overload, mass confusion, it will be necessary to impose a system — and he means a totalitarian regime. I may not agree with his conclusions at all, but he was a technocrat who was well integrated into this onslaught and decided that philosophers took up arms against such 'necessity'. He inscribed himself in this thread or understanding that on an 'integrated earth' with masses to govern and elites to rule is a 'common destiny of humanity'. Ultimately, he censors man to procreation, to integration into this elitist system, and to being 'allowed' to live by counting life credits. Today, infotainment stuffs minds and hearts toward acceptance of such an order of things in the atmosphere of secrecy, or the ability to discredit any information that might challenge such a system in the minds of 'worker' ants." In essence, it is assumed that it is not given to any man to realize his potential for living and being beyond what is prescribed for this type of organic hive system. If he does, he is merely incentivized or destroyed as a dissident, otherwise he is allowed to 'live' in the controlled environment in which he is rendered incapable. By and large, this has no effect on the entire structure, whether political, social, religious, etc. Basically, it devalues anyone who thinks and sees, degrading them to a mere slave, a safeguard of organic society championed by the elites, which in effect destroys and weakens the ability to define oneself as a human being at all. This is something that has never happened in the history of mankind. Until now. In the age of mind control — carried out on masses, not individuals — it is all the easier to achieve this kind of realization. Now if we look at it from the perspective of an organic human society evolving further into this state — it will be a wet dream of totalitarian scoundrels who would like the subordinates to be obedient and themselves to be valued as disposers. It is like denying oneself

the chance to escape this threshold of power and events and live a full life. In the ability to understand such basic things as freedom, love, grace, truth, harmony, beauty, happiness — all this is nowadays replaced by some surrogates that degrade the whole definition of thinking man — homo sapiens sapiens. In Zen Buddhism there is a saying that from a thousand monks may come one master. But if there are no monks, no masters will appear. Similarly, out of a thousand people, ten may be great leaders because of their merit, principles, values, charisma, and service to the whole; others may be outstanding craftsmen and scientists, religious leaders, mystics, and so on. Increasingly, when there are no people to draw from, all societies begin to collapse because they degenerate and are reduced to a common denominator, usually the lowest possible thread that a person wants to connect with. The key factor around which a person can define himself is simply missing. Surrogates are offered, but these surrogates will never replace the real thing. Or the ideas that thrive only in autonomy, in self-constitution, in the possibility to decide with the help of one's own reason, judgment, ethos, values, intellect and feelings. When a totalitarian system arises, we have the illusion of being autonomous (as in the reverse totalitarianism that Sheldon Wolin describes), it is historically likely that the conditions for freedom or liberty of feeling, belief, intellect will not return or will be severely challenged. In the past it was different. After the collapse of a civilization, it was usually possible to regenerate through the influx of new ideas, peoples, resources, and migrations, or such a civilization could not regenerate and disappeared. Given the current globalized perspectives that are directed against reason, intellect or feeling of ideas that cannot be framed or replaced by surrogates offered to us every day in the supermarket of ideas and narratives that easily dull our senses and distract us. We might assume that if this status quo continues and evolves, we might as well become what Junger wrote about — a fraud on nature — zombies.

Stanzas from an Empire

Dedicated to Providence, past masters and mistresses, may their genius flourish and teach from beyond.

To my grandfather, who taught me as a small boy how to be a man.

Dear Readers,

The Book of Changes and other authoritative works from various cultures and long-gone civilizations have helped me get through times of madness and confusion of senses and mind. I would like to share my experience with you and leave comments and interpretations based on this hypophetic task. My main reference was the following edition:

> The I Ching or Book of Changes
> The Richard Wilhelm Translation rendered into English by Cary F. Baynes. Foreword by C. G. Jung
> Preface to the Third Edition by Hellmut Wilhelm
> BOLLINGEN SERIES XIX PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
> © 1950, 1967, renewed 1977 edition

If we are among the old, we should dare to speak to them. People often have more in common than we think. Giants who created the foundations of great systems of thought, philosophy, virtues, social, political, mystical or religious systems —

they were only and above all men

Every book is written by a thinking man or woman, it is an avant-garde of his mind, carrying the flags of the blood of their life. The book is not a man in itself, it is a reduction of his intellectual and spiritual potential, but it allows us to dive into the depth of the complexity of another sentient mind. When we find commonalities, we can reflect on them and identify with them, recreate and reconstruct them to understand what the ancients were trying to convey, and to carry the torch of enlightenment into the modern world

I draw from my personal experience, gathered during an intense magical psychosis, from years of pain and sacrifice, from greater horrors and agonies, and from lighter moments of happiness and relief. My mind was a peculiar laboratory of humanity. So, by collecting experiences, observing and interacting with other people and trying to understand them better in their subjectivity and intersubjectivity, I thought that I would see more from the flying height of a dragon. Therefore, in my own eyes, I was an emperor and a beggar, a star child and a defeated mortal in a whole spectrum of personalities changing like masks and images in a kaleidoscope — each of them I lived out fully, to the last breath, as if an actor were growing into his role, both in crazy, light movements and in heavy, serious profundity

As a cosmographer trying to move through the social „contract", exploring the inner millieu of meanings without falling apart, reaching for the sky — this is a titanic act!

I have reinterpreted most of the selected stanzas to relate to the temple of humanity and my personal reflections to gain dominion over myself, the throne of consciousness, the self as heart and soul, people and ministers are our organism, our senses, our thoughts. These terms are interchangeable in the social sense, but I have focused on the way of the sage rather than the hero, the ruler of men. It is a l'etat c'est moi of a lost empire deep in my old thoughts

Sincerely, 7.223—7.233

Introduction

> The metaphor of the chorus, with the key and melody set by the whole — drowning out the discordant voices or influencing them for the better — and with individuals now and again offering solos that resonate with the harmony of the whole, is evidently suited not only to the gathering bu also to the relationship between past and present. The 'common culture' against which the poet, for example, defines himself both sets limits that are freely acknowledged and finds preservation in his work. Just so, the "partnership" of dialogue enjoys a reciprocal relationship with "modest restraint," on the one hand encouraging and rewarding it, on the other governed and preserved by it. Both the "partnership" and the individual are well served.

Macrobius, Ambrosius Theodosius, and Robert A. Kastner. 2011. Saturnalia. 1, 1. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard Univ. Press, Introduction, XLIII

> Vincula non attingunt rationem, intellectum et mentem, nisi quae iocunda sunt, bona et vera, nempe perfectiva.

Omnis enim falsitas, ignorantia, improbitas et iniustitia sunt extra rationem, intellectum et mentem, non in ratione, intellectu et mente.

Do not attain reason, intellect and thinking, for the sake of nothing that is not splendid, good and truhful, nothing that is perfect, for all falsity, ignorance, and injustice is incompatible with the notions of intellect, memory, reason, intellect and thinking.

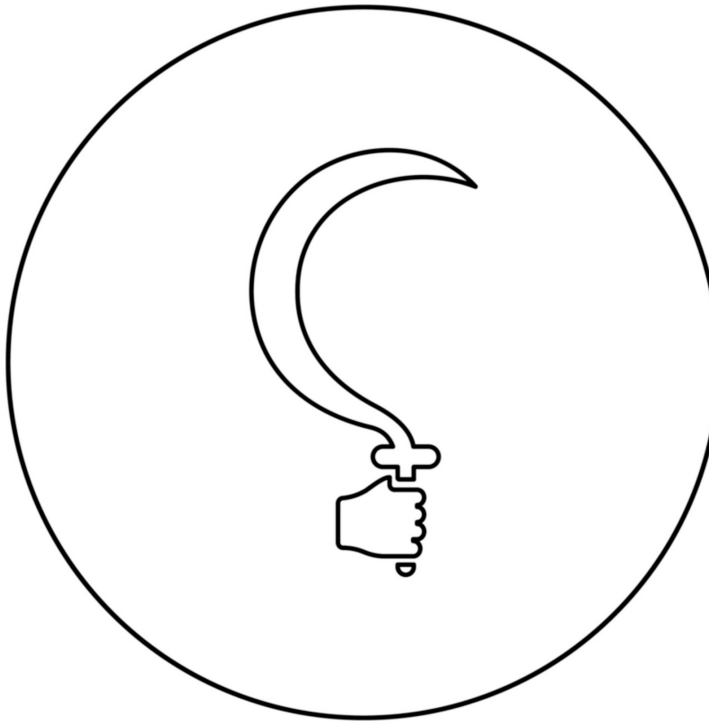
It is the creative spirit, the starry vaults, beyond the sum of the power of all the stars, the power of all the orders of the galaxies, superior to anything imaginable, worlds of infinite power, pure light, pure beauty, pure power, invincible and initiating. It is perfectly consistent and self-evident, without flaw in auto-phaneia, without rupture, powerful and infinitely mighty, it represents its unbroken, untainted, complete, and holy power. The starry heavens archetypize and signify, they are a type and a sign, they represent, they symbolize, and they are both traces and essences. The force opens the gates of space and time. Time is a force of the first degree that emerges from the force, and so space opens. Duration is the strength of the force, or its potency. Here the young race of men is trying to create a cosmography that relates to heaven and reflects the order on earth, as well as expressing the cosmic impulse of the creative heaven in its entirety. The individualized man and woman are devoted to the creative forces of heaven, Chuang Tzu and the "companion of heaven", moving in harmony with the rhythm, gathering greatness to move lightly through the world, all in perfect serenity, completely obvious, without obstacles.



Perseverance is as the water shapes the rock, as the bird flies, inexhaustible perseverance of the creative powers of heaven. Everything evolves for the right man and woman at the right time, through effort and perseverance, they gather, evolve, knot and dissolve in harmony, all in accord with expression, they find a way to live by being in harmony with the creative forces of heaven, whenever they are hurt, ignorant, deluded, off target, disharmonious, out of tune, the eternal source of heaven does not stop. It is the people who stop expressing their spirit by falling under the dominion of appearances.

Sublimity and subtlety, the power within is like a blade, it is never drawn and is mild and serene, it is generous, but it demonstrates through weighted wisdom and strength determined to return to itself, the jade dagger is a ceremonial artifact, and it represents devotion to tradition and heaven, it never symbolizes strife, it is the purity of its balance and a focused determination, subtlety is impartial and just, well discriminating and measuring, consulting the heavens to reflect them on earth, trying to understand the heavens and the laws of heaven and earth, and in agreement and harmony and changes, adjust accordingly. All ideas, understood as divine motive forces, contained before the Creative Force initiates movements by force, lead to their multiplicity in their phenomenal variety. Perfect ideas come down from the Creative Heavens in guises of powers and their masks. Through divine proportions stemming from perfection the forces and ideas are delineated by form, thus a Cosmos — or an order.

All unworldly time promotes the man and woman of heaven, for they are in unison, they are called and answer", „they call and receive", numinous infinity calls down into the world of time and space, the world of change may be at odds with the man and woman of heaven, yet they do not give up perseverance, renewal, refinement, continuity. A continuous potency of the realization of harmony, expanding the sphere of harmony and rounded off in harmony with every instance of being through multiple changes and renewals.

Love should be understood as “human feeling”, perhaps as “humanity” — love follows humanity and is an obvious term — which is difficult to define. Confucius avoided defining humaneness, perhaps it is something like recognizing or approaching the divine nature, but it is still quite ambiguous.

In tradition, hierarchy of agreement, free people agreeing on a hierarchy of merit, service, religious, social order, piety with social mobility, since people are not equal in their characteristics — the differences lead to hierarchies based on justice, when no one is really excluded (in ancient times there were no such exclusionary features as “racism” or “exclusionary religions”) and one is in harmony with one’s position on the “earthly theater”, while at the same time people and their merits and abilities change, they are allowed to rise and fall in the social ranks. Justice is regulative, in essence it is the distribution of power based on profound laws; — as the power of ideas, it is a reactive way to restore harmony when injustice — disharmony — occurs.

All inferior and uncouth things, inconsistent with the considerations of the heavenly law, should be thrown away. Hover like a hawk high in the skies and, having seen and grasped the essences, embody the observations and so radiate them in speech, action, deed, thought, attitude, perseverance whenever possible – endeavour to fix the movements of the mind by a frame of reference or coordinates; inferior or degrading is to develop bad habits, even mental ones. Therefore, it is important to correct yourself and make changes when you fail.

The limiting responsibility of the mind surrenders more to focus and concentration, when the activity is well-formed, a diamond-like clarity emerges

Someone who is touched by the dragon's lightning is awakened to action like a hero or a sage, as if he receives the power and shapes it. The inner truth is always more important than scattering it to the winds through unconscious, thoughtless activities. It is the fundamental power which can be easily compromised by exposure, keep it! Unfortunate external movements should never affect the inner strong serenity. The constancy of an action, an event fades and becomes powerless when it is groundless and is constantly renewed when it is part of the expression of power and laws. What appears to be constant in the eyes of people is only an illusion, the movement of the starry sky is followed without consideration.

Acquiring something prematurely, when one is not prepared to handle it, could lead to a misfortune.

Destiny is to be discovered by the True Will; the latter is to be sought to coincide with the expressive powers of Heaven. The Will of the One is one, it is the movement of the Divine Ideas, the expressions are different in the world of man and woman, according to individuation and discovered destiny one becomes a master in the field of his inner work.

Be warned, if one loses one's inner composure and allows oneself to be drawn into the machinations of others or into uncouth, vulgar, base, and low things, one will stand out negatively according to the standard of judgement of others and thus be despised. What appears to be pride to others can often be protective instinct. Adopt a humble and soft external attitude so that you will not be judged as arrogant but stay the course and carry it through with strength. Ambition is the force that goes beyond one's strength and measure, whether meant well or badly, and damages the structure of one's aspirations, works and deeds. When we soar too high, we fall to the ground and into the ruins of our works

Both ways are firm and right, according to the measure and correct estimation of times and changes. A failed wise man deserves the derision of the hells, but should rehabilitate himself if he does not lack strength, a true one is perfectly one with the sky, a companion

If you ignore the interdependence, the community, you build a mental tower over it, although you are a prisoner of yourself, you separate and fall into evil things: delusion, ignorance, anger, you begin to loathe your friends, the community, other species.

Earth is dedicated to heaven in terms of the order of creative superiority. Deviation from this proportion and analogy inevitably leads to disharmony and disorder, both at the individual and societal levels. Yet this order must be created within the Buddhist creed of "I alone am worshipped in heaven". The self finds its way, which at first is an arrogant statement, but contains a pervasive truth, namely that the one who follows the way is the way itself, in harmony with the way of the greater whole. The emperor sat on the throne of his consciousness, gathered his senses, mind, heart and soul, and thus directed the affairs of his self in harmony with Heaven. He is the sole ruler — over himself and over all social arrangements that emerge from human beings and order, renew and promote heavenly expression. When an emperor is drawn into political bickering, partisanship, and distractions, compromising his inner self and truth, his steadfastness and perseverance on the path perish, Heaven withdraws and he becomes just a man on a fictitious throne, commanding people left and right without any sense. Chuang Tzu was fit to be an emperor but refused the crown so as not to compromise himself. The Confucian choice is to establish order and connect with the world, laying the foundation for the next generations. Self-sacrifice is based on an assessment of one's inner self and one's abilities. Many who wanted to "rule benevolently" disregarded their strength, which turned into petty weakness, and they were defeated. Power grows into maturation with checks and balances within and without, an unprepared character becomes a tyrant. And how can we be better than those who were before, when our weaknesses speak against such self-sacrifice. Mahayana Buddhism holds that one is judged by the "net effects of one's actions" and not by one's intentions, because according to the rules of causality, one sets in motion karmic strands and ideational threads that take root in hearts, souls, and minds that are interconnected and interdependent, and the more the world is globalized and interdependent, the more severe the consequences are, individually and socially. As in complex societies, they regulate the flow of minds and hearts, or rather, they give direction, if they can rely on a charismatic authority that is not itself misguided, deluded, ignorant, greedy, and petty.

The cosmic order is mutually complementary, disharmonious orders — man-made — for example, on Earth have no relation to it, or the appearance — these orders lie in the diversity of possibilities, they obey certain laws of change, although from the perspective of permanence they appear to be completely wrong, that is, a valuation stands against a valuation reference, as in — the "fallen times" — from the perspective of the spirit, are the "prosperous times" from the perspective of abundance, the "corrupt, immoral, failed", which are reproached to the ancients, are the "only thing we see and consider normal" in the business-as-usual of modernity, the "up has no relation to the down" from the perspective of the one who perceived the up, from the perspective of restoration and construction and order in silence, the "surrogate and the lie" from the perspective of the pure idea, is the "true form of things" from the perspective of habit, the world is upside down from the perspective of the seer, it is in right shape and form according to the ignorant one.

Dualism shows itself in the perception that separates, in the perception of unity that does not exist, the latter "hovers over the land", the former "is drawn into it". Most dangerous are the "dualities within dualities" or the splitting of the negative into two negatives or the positive into two positives, they split the harmony of a man and a woman and rip open the wound and cut it deeper, or rather — the conceptualization, if we conceptualize "right and wrong" too much, the right can be given concepts that turn it into two wrongs, and vice versa. If we conceptualize the "good" as a set of doctrines and beliefs that undermine the good in discord and disharmony, then the idea of good is merely a name that justifies all forms of wrong and evil, as is evil, which becomes a name that may be firm and right but is branded as evil when it could be good.

When a man or woman loses proportion and becomes puffed up, he or she harms first himself and then the earth. Without the proper hierarchy and assent to this hierarchy, inequality, envy, arrogance, ignorance, and delusion arise and spread through this puffing up, forgetting that they have their place.

Phenomenal space is the sphere of action of the numinous and noumenal creative powers of heaven and the action of bringing itself back to unity. The idea is denoted by resemblance, depending on the cultural context these are finite reflections, but they are signs of analogy. It is taken for granted by the naked eye, nature likes to hide, it reveals its aspects in the way of the observing beholder.

Good judgment is a matter of experience, but also of reflection, contemplation, insight, a basic sense of reference and right and wrong

Determined perseverance is a matter of discipline, discipline is not severity but overcoming emotions and demotivating factors in the pursuit of what is appropriate to the time and situation, one does not recklessly enforce one's position but between nature, genuine impulse, sincerity, honesty, and willing support. Of course, there may be disagreements, dealing with people is fraught with such, but you maintain your composure through inner strength and truth.

One must be aware of decay by having a constant reference to what is right to control it in time or to undo what has been spoiled by effort without fixing the movement in the spoiled decay, degeneration, change is phoenix like, so should be the wise man, he has his inner nature unmoved but is subject to transitions and changeability.

Thus, the wise man should both be like heaven and embrace things like nature, an aspect of a great fatherly, motherly spirit. It is not a matter of blindness to wrongdoing, but of an insightful, wise approach.

Surround the things you already have, do not expand the sphere further. Exposed works risk the ambitious ruin of unfinished works. Fame passes and is a by-product of a person's achievement. To strive for or cherish fame is like trying to worship a breeze in the air. The gardener is satisfied with his orchard, but he does not puff himself up or boast about it; he smiles contentedly and is natural and sincere about his works.

It may be that someone loses his or her temper and holds on to the strings of recognition, when in fact he or she has done nothing worthy of such, and so self-gratification leads to corruption.

By the effects of their actions they should be invisible and keep themselves from claiming any credit for their actions, not even cherishing them within, they come and go like accomplished works, they appear and disappear and should not be admonished further, attachment to one's own hidden works and deeds bring beings above the inflation of the earth principle, credit goes to the heavens, humility is thus a way of non-attachment and genuine, courageous, solid movement.

The strong tries to restore order, the inflated principle maintains its hard-won position, conflict ensues.

Good habits should be strengthened and guided as soon as they are recognized as beneficial. Likewise, that which is recognized as counterproductive should be branded and eliminated as soon as it appears, and like thieves, chased away.

Just as the bark of the tree testifies to its strength and experience, so the blade of grass is a sharp, astute, purposeful determination that returns to itself in storms, fierce winds and rain-storms, yet is firmly rooted; it is swift, light, yet strong. Through the tension of unison, common things emerge in harmony. It is a much greater distinction to attain mastery with little means, without support, than through privileged training, in the Greek tragedies "those tested by heaven are the favored", unbroken perseverance in overcoming is worthy, the blade of grass overcomes the storm. One can form a great man or woman from a ponderous, chaotic, unformed clay of a character, depending on the will of the latter to form and round and perfect himself, and on the inspirations of the gods, masters, mistresses and Agathos Daimones. Restraint does not mean being inwardly static. The stillness of the mind is ripe for movement.

The value of comitas (brotherly, sisterly friendship) from Via Romana, friendship in good humor is of great importance, loss of friends is dangerous to developing character, isolation and alienation breeds contempt and arrogance or despair and depression, unless restrained by quiet strength — only in maturity can one return to seclusion, when one can „be alone in the company of heaven", one is never left alone in honesty, when one recognizes the sign of invisible society. It is better to withdraw and be reserved than to befriend the wrong people. The latter must not influence a strong character — they can be carried away to their advantage under their influence if the strong character „talks in many ways" without resisting — but to a weak character in training they threaten practice and can pull the young person under their influence if he turns to the bad.

Ordo ab Chao is a renewal towards Concord, the ability is based on finding strategic points of the whole and changing them as well, so that the house of cards falls naturally, but is immediately swept into another reformed structure, it is not brought down, but falls into a new form.

The chaos is perceived and there is no one to turn to, the fog that surrounds us seems impenetrable, everywhere an abyss, it is a frightening sight, but it is as if dark clouds cover our seeing and feeling, the clarity of vision is thus trained, often these are tried by such mental and emotional situations and the insight emerges and becomes fixed, further difficulties may arise with misfortunes, the mind's vision may be temporarily perverted, twisted, but it has this superior insight ready to pierce the dark stormy clouds and live. The threads and flashes of events at first appear like a chaotic spider's web — in time individual threads emerge, then you see the structure, and order emerges from chaos, you know how to move through the dangerous terrain, you know when to stop, and then — how to pull the silver threads.

Since much misfortune often befalls us, we commit thefts and plot and deceive, we generalize and perceive even a friendly person we do not know as an anonymous potential enemy, which instills extra caution, but we miss the opportunity to find a friendly companion, restraint is a good thing, open trust is unwise, but the misfortune that develops into paranoia and distrust overshadows the true situation. One does not accept help that binds us to anonymous sources, one must rely on one's judgment and see through situations thoroughly in order to trust, if such trust would occur, if help is given from anonymous sources, we are dependent on the other and his whims, and therefore fall into a trap like a curious fox, a foolish man who follows others can be taken advantage of and relies on obscure connections, behaves like a young girl who falls in love with a stronger man, similarly — a woman with dignity will not run after things that shine.

Those who twist things will have all the ways and means to catch a superior person and prevent his or her actions. Among those who hinder progress and expression, extraordinary caution is necessary in order to have integrity, consistency and transparency even under the barrage of lies and slanders, because if one drowns in the lies and distortions, one remains honest, transparent and integral towards heaven, Leonardo da Vinci „Those whose minds are fixed on a star are not hurt by lies and slanders

So many heroes defeated in youthful despair, the clay is mighty, may it be formed rather than degenerate

Unlimited questioning does not develop, it flattens and spoils, therefore one must be controlled

Silence is often the word of truth; it is much better than speech if an ambiguous situation would develop from a single word.

Without maturation, you lose yourself and dissolve torn by the movements of another. You drift towards fantasies that are not mature, solidified and focused enough, empty bubbles that narrow the focus and scatter true goals, here and now you are through and through and do what develops further has a seed in the now.

If he learns, he will be experienced and know what it means, if he perishes or breaks, he will have a reason to regret.

This is as self-evident as it is neglected nowadays, like any obvious law, which in its simplicity becomes a „forgotten knowledge", but the actions and events that work against it seem to somehow hide these things from the human mind. The seasons accompany the cyclicality and change in nature, the cosmos is an order that functions according to its own law of cyclicality and change. The right reference is both the ability to fix points of stillness, to discover them, reflect on them and incorporate them, and to move around change and chance, dynamically readjusting the framework of one's actions. The times dissolve according to their natural laws, arm yourself with sincerity and overcome them with character: the events exhaust themselves naturally, if you were involved in a true or perceived injustice, arm yourself with patience and silence — overcome the misfortunes with a shield of antidotes, whether you are treated justly or unjustly, if you cannot act, you remain strong and blameless, ignore provocations and have a superiority of nature and character.

Sincerity is transparency in one's actions, in and towards the creative, nothing hidden from the laws and movements of the cosmos „one does not contradict the universe. Certainty that comes from a sense of purpose. They only cause excitement and distraction and are a danger to any business. To do this, one must penetrate within, gnothi seauton, the process of self-knowledge is through contemplation, introspection, confrontation, decision, contrast, the pulse and impulse between one's individual nature and the tension within, how it is resolved when it meets the tension outside, how it is harmonized, to know one's nature, one observes the web movements of one's intentions, motives, deeds. Often illusions and self-deceptions may show themselves as the way, but they are untrodden. Without the source and impulse within or the foundation, one wastes one's energies and begins one's path halfway through a river without building a bridge.

Persevere in joyful kindness even when there is nothing to be joyful about. We should prepare ourselves in waiting, not lagging, but advancing the practice of rounding off, in good times we work, in bad times we work and overcome, in happiness we do not give up clarity of thought, in misfortune we do not give in to turmoil. Defending oneself against slanders that one cannot eradicate is futile, one waits and remains strong in character, in the end the character and strength is greater, and the defense can be accommodated, the lies are eradicated, those who have their minds fixed on the goal are not harmed by lies and slanders.

Exposed weakness invites exploitation by predators or being forced to obey the will of inferior people. Rarely does one encounter a helping hand in a circled position in the wilderness or between the actions of enemies; when perceived as an enemy, one does not allow oneself to become weak, one would not forgive him, but continues to be crushed, it is more difficult to regain strength from a weak position than from a balanced one.

In the most dangerous situations, remain cold-blooded and clear, sharpen your senses, and concentrate.

This should always be done, wasting time without preparation is pointless — when the battle comes, we will be carried away by its force.

The strong man and woman of the creative thread themselves on the edge of the abyss, they should be vigilant. The weavers of the net of illusions force a discordant way through. Inner determination and understanding of entanglements lead to calmness and strength.

It is better to stop without ambition and sacrifice the drive, or to contain it and let it mature. If you are not among men or cannot find an equal counsellor, but are in solitude, the superior is a deity, the means is oracle, meditation, incantation, it requires intelligence and experience to discern and properly control oneself. The movements of the enemy must be predicted before they happen, and we must be prepared in advance for all eventualities.

In argumentation, „agreeing with someone" leads to open antagonism, people have their cherished beliefs which are the basis of their livelihood, contradicting them provokes hostility, let us remember not to be drawn into conflict by arguments or belief systems even if they affect our own, otherwise we lose our open-mindedness and loftiness and in the long run become rude hardliners, among civilized people civilized conversation is possible, otherwise it is a waste of time.

The mediator who, by virtue of his charismatic authority and status, can bring the conflict to a just end.

If everything is in order, the conflict is resolved. Omnia mea mecum porto, everything acquired in honesty is yours, everything superficial comes and goes by itself. Self-correction, self-improvement, commanding yourself. That which is not permanent, but only occasional, should not be admonished Authority derives from soldiers" loyalty and transparent handling of wise orders. A Roman general was saluted because he represented the pride of the sun, and so his soldiers saluted by covering their eyes as if they were outshone by the commanding authority. His efficiency is based on the fingertip awareness of everything on the battlefield.

The top is a representative, as if a leader encompasses everything he or she leads.

Hesitant people must consider the genuineness of the proposition. Once they agree, their intention is even stronger because it has clarity.

Basically, if someone knows his competence, he acts, if he lacks reasons, he should not undertake such things, otherwise he will become a charlatan and mislead people, it is better to develop in solitude for some characters without teaching or leading the vocation, much favor can be gained in the first case if you know your reasons, much harm can be done in the second case.

Alienated and estranged communities break apart and move further and further away from each other until they perish.

You can talk to people from many walks of life, but with restraint and with caution, so as not to reveal too much, it is better to ask and listen than to be asked and heard.

When thoughts, actions and words are in disorder and do not fit together, as in madness, irresponsibility, or ignorance, and when they do not act in accordance with one's clarity and intention, they are the seed of unhappiness, they open threads that bring great misfortune, contempt, infidelity, ridicule and humiliation.

So it's the little obstacles that matter nonetheless, and if you pay too much attention to them, they can steer our work in the wrong direction, if you pay too little attention to them, we do not properly understand their nature and properly focus on a breakthrough

Harsh measures increase resistance. In fact, the obstacle does not become stronger, but we tense up inside because we focus too much on the obstacle.

Therefore, it is important to properly assess, evaluate and judge the situation as it is, with reference points that are not too static, but strong and at the same time malleable enough to adapt to the circumstances — that is, with the wisdom, knowledge, and experience that we must help us in our decisions.

Never freeze when you have done wrong, and mend yourself without guilt, without anyone but yourself commanding your correction. Since the aberration of the concept of „sin" has polluted many minds, as well as the „guilt" that is a hidden thread of a virus that runs through some societies, it is enough to be responsible for your freedom and guide yourself with good behavior, strengthen it, errors may cross our path, if we have common sense, we will correct ourselves of our own will.

It is better to learn from the mistakes of others than to run into them yourself. However, when you make a mistake, you remember it better if you correctly assess the possible future events of a similar nature.

How often unimportant things can absorb our attention. For example, when we look at the starry sky, we do not think about a small quarrel, when we perceive the image of the world, we are not distracted by a material object or something much more insignificant — it is only a small annoyance.

Social behavior refers in devotion to its structure and also and above all by „continuous complementary embrace" of many threads that refer both to the creative that has in mind the earth as the low and the starry sky as the high, are the foundations that are created for traditions, Organization or religion are merely approximations to observed, discovered, founded and matured proportions and a reflected reflection through self-reflection deep within and observation of the world of events and phenomena outside and reforms indicated by change of attitudes.

The order is considered natural, and everyone has his due position, no inequality arises, „classless societies breed classless people" — other author and „contempt and envy of superiority over mediocrity" — other author, which also leads to the fact that if the elites themselves are classless, they are not based on social respect and thus are no better than their subordinates and often much worse.

Differences in minds, hearts and natures are evident in the world of nature, but this should not bring scorn or contempt or false pride and arrogance, all should be accommodated and as in Confucian China — with changes allowing mobility, enforced equality is often fatal to natures and characters, justice should govern the fairness of the distribution of rank.

He who chases after abstracts and appendages, exchanging his life for things that are not worth it, loses all serenity and blinds himself with hopeless excitement over things that are empty in their essence, or binds himself in relationships and contracts that make him a slave, a subject to the will of another.

Measuring simple patterns and deciding on a point of reference in simplicity creates profound order.

The doctrine of "simultaneous engagement" as in Buddhist meditation — one meditates on the emptiness of all phenomena simultaneously and is active" — likewise "one holds the larger picture, the illusion of phenomena, the changes, the reference, and so acts, or pauses".

There is a thread of humanity that runs through all people, high and low.

Prudence in seclusion, when one foresees the ruin of things and therefore strategically decides to retreat, is worth more than plunging oneself and others into darkness. Decisions made at the throne of our heart in silence and contemplation are not invisible to the creative.

But if an underdog is of value, stay strong and persevere. Those who endure adversity build a stronger mind, which, when properly directed, forms into resolute steel and focus, seeking to internalize the virtues and ideas.

If you see among the elites only subordinates who are unworthy of trust or leave the withdrawn path, stay away from them. As a subordinate, hide your intrinsic value and truth in times of subordinate rule, never flatter anyone, as a superior, do not allow anyone to flatter you, the obvious intrinsic value should be talked about as little as possible, likewise, never boast about anything, that is an inflated principle.

Bravery in connection with the guarding of words, one can suffer in silence, but this forms the character, when words begin to flow, they become evil and hurtful, if not controlled, arrogance soon develops and one invites scorn and contempt, it is better to be patient and full of restraint and look at the signs, „right thought, right speech, right action", one precedes the other, defaulting to virtues developed by the light of reason, inwardly resolved and judged good.

One should not disperse the pain within by false associations or disperse it by foolish actions, but contain and transform it, transforming its energy into renewal, re-centering oneself and illuminating the interior as a phoenix-like energy, for when directed outward it can become despotic, sadistic, or domineering.

Those who have no authority or mandate to restore, reform, or renew order should refrain, or they will collapse in hesitant digression and lose the impulse to act. Strong foundations build a creative impulse when the goal is clearly defined and fixed, but also open and sublime, relying on a strong nature, otherwise one builds „castles in the clouds" and tries to take a leap — before he realizes that he lacks momentum, the castles fall from the clouds into ruin. False vocation is when his personal, flawed projection, supported by a vision like that of a madman who wants to impose his deformed will, ruthlessly implements this chain of action.

In the mind too, too much rigidity can lead to delusion, ignorance and arrogance, too little self-worth and certainty leads to an indecisive dispersion of one's character and being, both of which should be regulated and controlled.

In this case, they fall apart when personal interests collide, or cooperation ends when the concern is no longer relevant, it is a community of interest rather than a committed concern for the good of the whole.

The promotion of one over the other in the faction leads to division, the structure aims to elevate one's own over the rest, and therefore encounters resistance and promotes conflict internally — based on factional strife and externally.

Distrust and suspicion are so strong that even our closest fellows seem like enemies. Mutual distrust increases suspicion and corrodes the community and organic society from within, acts of espionage are commonplace even though they rarely yield information, they fuel mutual distrust and are a spark of conflict, feuds and wars when the government distrusts its own people, the fundamentals are wrong, so the people rebel against them or begin to commit crimes and abuse the entire organic structure — it is a common simple thread that is named at the grassroots and needs no further explanation — when the people distrust their own government, it is unfounded.

Mutual distrust propels into mutual paranoia

Work separately, get involved, maybe after a while like-minded people with good fates will meet.

Everything in moderation, nothing in excess, sometimes you must protect yourself with extraordinary means, the armor of antidotes is worn at all times around the mind and heart, but it should not become stiff, it is after all a quick defense, not a pitifully defended position, otherwise it becomes poison itself.

The possession and mastery of one's mind, nature, and heart is what shapes, forms, forges, and corrects the mind.

If anyone perceives this with envy or temptation, let him think: If I ruin my serenity and my inner strength to obtain the possessions of others or to poison myself with the possessions of others, whether they be metaphysical, intellectual, or material, what good will possessions do me if I lose everything that has intrinsic value?

The same is true for us. When we are showered with benevolence, we must not become overconfident or arrogant, just as when a boat we are rowing down the river is rocked, it overturns and we fall into the water, when we lose our minds or think that the boat will last forever, and by lacking proportion it becomes loose and chaotic, after a while our judgement collapses like a tower and brings disaster.

Whether you are going through turbulent or sad times, you have a sense of purpose without inflation.

Modesty is the means between fullness and emptiness, encompassing both, as is justice — a regulating force.

Trends and threads of one's decisions, behavior, nature and character, sew the threads of fate and fortune, even when one is in misfortune, one holds on to one's character premises and shapes oneself, one is also not isolated from circumstances or the threads and trends of other bundles of mutually arising and interdependent webs of events that are set in motion, one can resist them or — if one agrees and it is good for one — promote them in oneself, that is a matter of insight.

He recognizes the weaknesses and the good sides of his being and heals and strengthens them accordingly, binds and loosens them as needed.

The balances of harmony and the means to achieve them are found in the particular time. One must recognize the time and know it thoroughly and simply, without succumbing to it, one contrasts it with the movement, the motion and the change of other ages and then sees what is to be done.

Without arrogance or disregard, you listen thoroughly and solve quickly.

The inner strength to use one's power, the integrity to chastise oneself in time before things get spoiled, or to get in tune with one's fundamentals.

If the character of the people is corroded, the reflexes of this corrosion raise the corrupt, if the character of the people is sick, healing is necessary.

When inferior things prevail and are common, conforming one's character to them leads to ruin and deliberate betrayal of principles as well as devotion to heaven. One cannot quarrel with the times or break down the walls of the inferior, otherwise one would bring ruin upon oneself by being exposed, but one can gather the strength within and bring forth what one considers wise by the means that are possible.

This is the fate of all civilizations long buried under the desert sands, so that the people who thrive around their sacred and profane — may we respect their dust and their breath — long scattered to the winds, may be remembered and invoked, the small and the great.

For there is no other will to rule than that of preserving the creative stream selflessly and profoundly through devotion and loyalty to the emerging order in proportion and reverence to the small and the great. To perceive the world like a paternal and maternal deity is to establish the laws and intuitions as perceived by the deity, and to imitate them in a mortal life at the greatest moment in silence and reverence, just as the sun observes with a patient, primal gaze all the struggling creatures, „dominion" is bestowed and withdrawn when this image of henosis collapses. Thus, there were pharaohs who ruled together with Horus in an outstanding manner and those who were pharaohs only in name, there were Chinese emperors who were truly the sons of heaven and those who were so only in title or by inheritance.

Recognising and penetrating the law of causality — of interaction — in context, predicting with foresight is a wisdom that is often confused with clairvoyance, no clairvoyance can replace such foresight that penetrates with clarity into the things of the world and bases decisions on it, a clairvoyant is a man who looks at the hill through a telescope, a wise sage is a hawk who flies over the hill, spies the man looking through the telescope and all the other things around him with equal acuity, and then follows the correct course of flight.

Be careful: certainty, certainty can also be based on false foundations, they equally mislead untrained eyes, then one does not follow a wise sage or a guide, but a petty person with too much confidence, who is sure and certain should also question the extent of his ignorance, so that he seeks only what is irreproachable, strong, and right

Tension can bring motivation to overcome ourselves and preserve us in times of change.

Do the menial work first, then work your way up, never forget the position of the common man, the memories of misery are often washed away by the times of happiness and vice versa, madness forgets sobriety, just as sobriety forgets the lessons of madness, let these two polarities always be kept in mind, great terror in memory fades, as does great pain, great happiness an example to be kept in the heart, but not as a nostalgic torment.

All the following should be rejected if it would cause harm to the followers, if one is perceptive enough to judge that one lacks method, merit, and principle, and that exposure would lead to grave consequences, either for the exposer or for the exposed, according to time and age, judged by one's own reason, which is in accordance with one's intellect and the estimation of others.

If we strengthen the defense in the wrong place and wait for the attack, we will waste our time and energy, perhaps be attacked from another angle, or encircled and defeated. If we freeze in spirit, building an armor of habits, we stifle the dynamic engagement of life — in ten cases the sword is swung and may fall on us, thirty misses should not always raise our shield, for ten times we should be ready to defend ourselves quickly, in twenty others to act.

Knowing the perspectives and the differences, and being able to be impartial, one speaks as needed, but preserves the homogeneity of one's composition or integrity without compromising it with the views of others, but with wise sense of how to speak in order to exchange perspectives and direct the other party's subjective point of view toward the greater. It is a matter of penetrating the other character and overcoming it through understanding, then leading it to mutual understanding.

If one follows one's puer eternus, one loses the advice of the Senex, if one gives himself away to the whims of an inner child, he no longer listens to his mature understandings, likewise in dealing with people wise people should be sought out.

The superficial things are easily abandoned when development sets in, the whims and petty desires are sacrificed for the greater way and no longer bother us.

By often thinking about one's own shortcomings and the impermanent and imperfect state of such affiliations, one guards himself three times as much as in the position of a sage, he cannot develop delusion or paranoia, but remains strong and detached, not devoted to the interests of satellites, not losing sight of the whole, the one who guards his thoughts, words and deeds and the gates of the senses.

The relation to the good and the beautiful, to the order, to the starry sky must be developed, if we take up these aspirations slowly, knowing them, understanding them and persevering in them, the law of enantiodromy or the „working of opposites" may be at play, whenever the signs approach and the return to danger is due, we should arm ourselves with patience and firm resolve, otherwise we lose ourselves, „light that shines too much provokes darkness" — Ernst Junger; What is in fullness becomes empty, what is empty can become its opposite, the Tao is within

Freedom should be contained by the responsibility of a mature being, it is to be wisely disposed of by demarcation or constant effort to draw boundaries properly

if someone abuses his freedoms, he damages the organic structure of the other and himself, thus he follows a whim, an irresponsible projection of his defective desire on the space of the other. When two free, strong, principled, and responsible people meet, they are like figures of steel.

Without true piety, without an understanding of their depth and devotion, the ceremonies are but stiff repetitions and soon become a cold, meaningless, empty tradition.

Weak corruption should be remedied by a strong, effective movement, not by putting all one's strength into it without proportion like a young student who, full of enthusiasm and excitement, remedies something of his own accord as if it were a great undertaking, but in an effective, determined way, let things mature and discuss no more.

As the sky approaches the earth, the equinox is the meeting point, or a higher patron approaches the lower, or the intellect of a man meets the reason of the spirit, the spirit meets the senses.

Even when he is hurt, he does not hold a grudge, he overcomes people by looking from above with the gaze of a dragon, he guards his spirit and his spirit flies upward, his foundations on earth — he moves by double engagement, on earth and in heaven, he is one and in unison, the simultaneous rounding off is done by a single means, then the spirit above and the earthly being are in unison. In other words, the instance does not cancel the general perspective and approach, even if it returns bent like a blade of grass.

The sage devotes himself both to nature, which is evident in its workings, and to heaven, which shines its light upon the earth.

Detached and withdrawn from the current of time when it goes against what is right, recognized by insight, opposing it when commitment is necessary — the latter risks disaster and humiliation, because the mass of the threads of events and the spirit of the times will carry us along, if we take a stance to vigorously counteract, the worst risk is to become even worse than the spirit of the times, and become an antithesis to the spirit of humanity, we become monsters.

The universal law is to be understood as the necessity of the destiny that chastises the destinies defined as freedom, chance, circumstances, determined by Moires, or these threads of events that we cannot change, and that we can direct by being inwardly strong.

Starting from the contemplation of the celestial laws and trying to transfer them wisely to the earth and to regulate the affairs of men accordingly and justly, it is observing and striving for proportions, for the movement of the stars and the planets, for nature, and then recognizing the divine by seeing an order that is numinous, science helps in the discovery of certain laws, but the proportions are established by wise observation, the organic structure is seen, one has a greater overview and tries to mirror these ways on earth, first inside, then outside, the way to achieve this is a matter of understanding, and those who achieve this lay a powerful foundation.

Neither by flattery nor by isolation, neither by self-aggrandizement nor by condescension, one is diverted from seeing the feelings and their threads; one can shut oneself up in the tower one has built and be blind and deluded, or one can observe the signs of the times with the gaze of a dragon with understanding, insight, and foresight.

Egoistic contemplation, which extends to nothing other than confirming one's own view of oneself and one's affairs, cannot relate to another perspective, so that one is entrenched in the subjective view and does not look beyond its limits.

We look at ourselves „from the outside" without falling into our cherished view, critically comparing our shortcomings with principles and what is right — it is a normative and corrective observation.

Whoever uses his independence as an instrument for political, religious, or social disputes loses the ability to participate as a sovereign deputy, as a satellite that supports society. He should neither take sides nor ally with those who violate or abuse his independent decisions, findings, etc. This leads to factionalism and pulling such a man to the line of one agenda, or another creates great turmoil and conflict. He should remain strong and independent, impartial, and withdrawn if possible, so as not to be drawn into these kinds of ties.

In Mahayana Buddhism, a person's movements are judged by the net effects of his activities. If a person does not persist in goodness and goes on to perdition, then the goodness is cancelled, and the perdition remains.

Sometimes it is necessary to separate in order to unite on a solid basis that both parties agree to, and to carry along the resolution and the direction, to direct it on a new path, the process of gathering the released social and personal energies and directing them in a masterful way, if this is not done, the by-products and splinters hinder a proper resolution, biting through for its own sake is survival, or an attempt to grit one's teeth and persevere, biting through with a view that simultaneously incorporates direction, progression and solutions, tactical and strategic thinking about impact is paramount, childlike engagement with boyish reflection, or reactive response in a simplistic manner, or selfish reciprocation of adversity can corrupt many a man, with a broader view one engages and discards, or self-grinding leads on with resilience.

Discernment and a sense of proportion in knowing the circumstances, the context and the person to rebalance the situation and avoid a cascade of disharmonies on a larger scale.

The sense of rightfulness and fairness that prevails in societies where the rule of just law and fairness is strengthened.

Vulgarity ruins candor and loftiness, intellect, and reason, it reduces to the coarseness of a mind and heart and dwells in ignorance. The more one is helplessly drawn into such situations of anger and loses one's temper and composure — through the force of habit — the more difficult it is to discipline oneself and return to openness.

The forgotten „unknowns" are still a greater danger than the known dangers and preparing for the unknown dangers. Forgetting a known danger is foolish, but awareness of the danger should not freeze us or stop our movements, but they should be continued vigorously, patiently, and carefully. In a minefield, if forced to do so, one moves with extreme caution; in an open plain, one rides briskly. In Neoplatonism, heaven was equated with beauty, truth, and grace. The metaphysics of beauty consists in the fact that, through the innate connection with the essential, the fusion of one's spirit with the sublime as subject, it evokes profound awe and reverence in the one who partakes of it.

Likewise, grace moving through beauty is a rather delicate thing, it does not yield to vulgarity, like love it withdraws and disappears, likewise love between a strong woman and a strong man carries mountains and breaks chains, in adornment it is subtle and light, like young people in love for the first time, in ferocity it is steel-clad and lion-like.

The star that shines upon us equally in other traditions is the ‚Eye of the Supreme Deity.

The mutability of the forms, the forms of the ideas, the narratives, the social structures, the arts, and the sciences are like clay that must be worked, if this is done following closely the requirements or forms that take shape in heaven, astral configurations of change, then everything is supported by the forces that have their rise and their beginning.

To prevail on all fronts brings disaster. When you try to resolve all matters, you run out of steam and social and personal ventures plunge into stagnation, chaos or decay.

It would corrode his self-confidence and independence and create a falsehood that he could wear like a mask and suffer from this self-imposed falsehood, losing all sense in the end.

Attachment to an external or internal image developed by others or by oneself, which is false and unrepresentative, is such vanity. The way is to be truly honest and introspective without clinging to such mirages of images of oneself, after all, we cannot see ourselves from more perspectives than those we are capable of, such mirages, self-images are the 'ornaments

We can lose the seriousness and reduce the flight, the falcon can be caught and tamed, it can lose its essence, then what was lost fades into oblivion and no longer reminds us of the road we travelled to arrive, we set out.

If one is not confident or does not trust himself and is in doubt after assessing his strengths and abilities, even if others pull him into the realm of influence, he should refuse and take the path of simplicity, he should strategically predict what he is capable of and what impact it could have in the long run for the rest.

They may work in discord, but persistently, when a man is stronger and resists fierce attacks from without, when a man is not destroyed with lies, slander, and intrigue, and yet stands still, the enemies try to penetrate his heart and mind, to undermine the working of his nature, to pervert it, defile it, contaminate it, and corrupt it. If his nature is stronger, they persistently break the man from within and without. It is of utmost importance to be like a phoenix and ask for help in reversing the harmful effects through devotion to heaven, one must also practice spiritual discipline and have a strong sense of integrity to fall back on, for bad habits can develop, all bad thoughts appear like a mountain of dirt, one must make a commitment to mend and change one's ways and work against the dark force that plants a seed of evil within, it is a battle of the heart and mind that one wages, and a man is recognized by Heaven for waging this campaign, even throughout his life, no matter how much he has fallen into despair or corruption. Someone with a sick and defiled mind and heart looks up. Just as a person afflicted with a disease whispers words of mercy to his loved ones and smiles at them, a person afflicted with a great evil in mind and heart whispers songs to the stars despite the anguish. When you are torn from your firm hold, you stand up, when your thoughts, actions and words are defiled and full of filth, you focus on the open space and use all your struggle and concentration to defeat the evil force — it is stupid and vulgar, in its subtlety it exploits the intelligence of the other, it has nothing that belongs to it, and yet it possesses through delusion, ignorance, anger, attachment and arrogance and tries to make man like itself. Be on guard, because this dark power can defile us and our loved ones to lead us astray. So, when love becomes a torment for both, it is time to separate and seek solitude, hoping to meet again, if Providence wills it, far from this world.

Outnumbered, outgunned and in lonely war, heartbroken and betrayed, it is better to seek the friendship of the starry heavens and the gods who protect us and accept us in the eyes of the dark power would be appropriated by it, among the blind you cannot defeat the enemies single-handedly, but you can remain calm and loyal to the starry sky and carry the essence of your own work and nature.

Everything would be spoiled or turned into the opposite if our works were not destroyed for mockery, then what „shines"

Be on your guard, for speech can be heard in the wrong and right quarters of the world, it too can be poisoned, ask about the effect you create as if the world were listening, ask — to quote another — „is it wise, is it just, is it non-judgmental?"

Does not mean submissive: inner rebellion can be strength in one's virtues and principles, or their remnant, indestructible, goes with time

A mountain that stands on its head begins to collapse under its own weight, a world that stands on its head will inevitably crumble.

Sometimes it is better to be insane or to play an idiot than to be exposed to dark power. What is „won" by the defeat of superior people is greatly appreciated by the enemy, unexpected changes in circumstances make the enemy uncertain and weaken him.

If the torture chamber is our own bed, we have no choice but to gnash our teeth and survive or perish.

Even if he once remained in the superior position, his effects, if contaminated, are to be considered.

Old passions have taught me well — they burn out in great fire, and they burn a young man, when there is nothing but self-destruction, you are brought to your senses and change course 180 degrees or destroy yourself or others.

As with a paradigm shift, a truth revealed, or a realization occurring, the superficial recedes.

Accelerating times and rushing forward can lead to erecting a tower that fixes time in defiance of change and time. Although it may be fixed for a time, it will eventually be completely destroyed by the times and change, as the laws of the universe have a superior hand in the game, the preservation based on false foundations is bound to be demolished, the greater the enterprise of „freezing" change in disregard of the times, the greater the ruin of the enterprise, which goes in the wrong direction through decay, corruption and change.

When the earth, in disregard of heaven, keeps orders that cut itself off from the change and movement of heaven, the changes of heaven become visible on the earth, when by the laws of the seasons, the changes, the orders that do not agree with heaven begin to implode, to rot and fall apart.

That which matures in patience is stronger in setting its accents wisely when it comes to adjusting the times

Bad mental habits are difficult to eradicate, mental discipline and the pursuit of the right path, integrity and conduct should remedy the effects of disease, but they cannot be completely reversed, wounds can be healed but the skin is weakened, any looseness of character should be avoided.

One acts in accordance with fate or the times and does not fixate on the tired bad times when good times come along, although this requires strength of mind and self-control, which not everyone is capable of, especially when going through an abundance of afflictions — to protect oneself from the return of torment.

Nothing hidden, sincerity and honesty with the heavens, you do not need masks, because he is transparent, everything hidden comes from the dealings in the world of men, however, it is in stark contrast with the heavens when this falseness arises in dealing with the divine, when a man masks himself before his relatives in order to gain a temporary superiority in his plan, everything is known, when he continues his habits and pretends to deceive or trick the heavens, he is exposed at all times.

It is a spear that gathers air, and although it flies straight, it falls for lack of kinetic energy, so with forced, hidden intentions that work for the worse, but whenever someone engages by willpower to impose his vision by will, he finds himself to the will and the co-dependent network of events, he loses his innocence in the eyes of destiny

Lady Chance, Wheel of Fortune, the former characterizing the unforeseen, the latter the changes.

One does not seek advantage, but works, set in motion may bring an advantage, but it is not a possession, and one should not be attached to it.

For so many stubborn people mistake what agrees with their fanatical zeal for a personal projection, a fool may have unshakable convictions and faith, but does that make him wiser? From natural wisdom, things arise that are consistent with the workings of heaven, then a jade-like perception develops.

Fatherly and motherly in spirit, detached, impartial, perceiving the interdependent organism, perceiving, and penetrating the whole, and reflecting on how laws and reforms can improve the good and improve or eliminate the wrong that led to the bad.

In the freedom of feelings and the focusing of ideas through the heart, one with him — a characteristic of true men and women.

In most menial tasks we must be perfectly at one with the object of our doing, and in the great tasks we must be perfectly devoted to and at one with the object of our doing-without attaching greater value to the latter than to the former, whether we are cleaning the stables, washing a dish, assembling people, or governing ourselves.

Innocence is not naivety, wise prudence and awareness are required to recognize.

Omnia mea mecum porto: All that we have we carry within us, the gifts of heaven hang over us, and even if fate leads us nowhere in earthly affairs, we find comfort in the greater company of heaven.

Holding on also means expanding inward, it is a highly concentrated enterprise where our inner strength grows over time, an activity, not a passive enterprise.

When firmness and truth are abandoned, one pursues wrong ideas with strength — everything goes in the wrong direction

The spirit of heaven is contained in the mountain-like man

What is pondered and resolved within as right and wise is of greatest assistance throughout life.

If he loses his composure through anger, resentment, or dislike, what good is his former firmness? He must retain it or return to it again and again

Change of direction of nature, the opponent is disarmed, as if one appeases an armed man with diplomacy and mediates

You cannot fight with a greater force if you do not have the same force, so you should gather your forces and think of approaching, only if fate wills it, you have a chance to defeat your opponent's force by hitting him at the root of his force, it should be done in wisdom, better to have an ally than the opponent dead.

Natures of men and metamorphoses, like planets in Western astrology: genii of a man or woman in excil — exalted individuation, striving for the highest of their nature, in refinement and inclined to the divine; domicile — in harmony with their nature and inner genii, „wearing themselves as good clothing", banishment — the abandonment or withdrawal from one's nature into the negative, as if one were degraded and perverted; fall — the inversion of the excelled parts of nature to the vicious and base, to the bad.

Guard the words, and train with the means of words, otherwise the character corrupts.

In the position of a free man, he unconsciously seeks the entrapment and trappings of others, as if captivity were treasure, why should he lose freedom for the treasures of others?

When one correctly assesses one's abilities and talents, juxtaposes them with one's circumstances, and correctly assesses one's place and position in the world and in social contracts, one becomes aware of one's situation and is conscious of the fact that one does not rush forward to fight against all ties or to further unsettle oneself, nor does one reject everything and rest in a stupor.

Threads woven wrongly bring misfortune, great foresight and insight, knowledge of effects and causes, time and its spirit, the state of nature and the minds of men, principles, humanity and directions, and spontaneous insight into the big picture that guides it with wisdom and firmness are most needed.

Ignoring responsibility, being unaware of it, or pretending to be ignorant to shake off responsibility leads to a blind leader who is unaware of the harmful influences he exerts on others.

Introspective: Even when not in a position of influence and momentum is lost, the weight of perception and insight can be too great to handle. The tension between size and breadth of character and the perception and inability to exercise it can bring about either humiliation and feelings of inequality, or suppressed frustration that further leads from compassion to, or resolves into, anger, rage, it to face inward, then one rounds and gathers and strengthens from within, whenever insight penetrates to the core of the self, one attains heaven as if one transcends worldly affairs, that is a correct approach to the sage's hood: one can sacrifice all that is worldly and take the firm path of a sage, or one can choose to engage in the world. The balance between these two choices is a steep climb, and often the result is a great fall; It is better not to look back at the things that have been left behind, sacrificed, they will bring no comfort when the mind develops into a completely different conception, a monk does not become a dedicated hero, a sage does not make contacts with the lowlands, to escape his mountain, and yet it should not develop into isolation, revulsion or misanthropy, but a detached wise retreat, a refuge to be found even in a busy city — within yourself Heaven will be tested as you mature beyond your old age, live in harmony with the maturation, try not to violate your allotted time and relegate yourself to youthful folly.

To combine the sublime with the strong, the mould into which the iron is cast is gentle and can break, but it holds a fierce element. When the iron solidifies, the mould is gone, although at first it supports the molten iron, then it is superficial, then everything belongs to the hardening of the iron in skillful hands.

Perseverance in superior cheerfulness, touching determination, loving kindness as Buddhist stanza, one breaks many evils in this way, one survives and meets many misfortunes and sufferings by such strong determination.

By pursuing his own aspirations, he opposes the others, Chuan Tzu: „If the melody is tuned too high, no one can sing along" — depending on the times, tuning too low causes us to lose our inner composition, which must be determined by insight and the signs of the times.

One should also know the limits of one's integrity and not rise above what one thinks one can handle. Knowing oneself, it is better to responsibly limit and restrict oneself than to risk losing one's integrity, composure, and inner strength.

It is as if we hold on to a position of convenience without paying attention to the times, or to a loyalty that is another. If the latter is not realised, we create dangerous conditions and accumulate more errors, that is, the inferiors are in a superior position, a completely different situation arises when the inferiors are on the advance and the superior try to secure their position, despite the threat of danger.

We do not tend to hypertrophy a life content; we round it off and complete it to the extent it requires.

It is hard to tell if someone is authorised to teach, or has the right backbone and principled stature, or the right methodology. There are so many charlatans and those who have something else in mind when they explain things to other people, likewise people tend to open their eyes and ears to anything that suits their own taste, they can justify anyone as a teacher, while we do not have the quality to teach.

If we do not put away evil at every stage, defend our nature and character, we will be contaminated.

Causality and the web: If we do not yet find a way to cut the interdependencies, we may get caught in the threads of the web, either the perceived, illusory ones, or the true ones. What is true on the subjective level may have objective consequences; that is, if we are ensnared by an illusory web cast upon our minds, we live it as if it were real, only subjectively, but it has objective effects, namely suffering or delusion.

What is simple and clear can be understood. There is no need to go crazy with overused phrases when talking to someone who does not know them, it is like eating a bowl of rice together instead of preparing a big feast for yourself and excluding the other person.

The path of least resistance does not mean to lose everything and to give up one's principles to run like a young goat towards the first open gate, but to see the way out with a sense of proportion and thus to take the path of least resistance.

Like the torches that guide and illuminate our paths in the darkness, like the lamp of the hermit on his star, they are beset by darkness, but they hold fast to their goal and are sustained from without by the power of heaven and purpose.

The spiritual fire is constantly renewed by the heavens, it never burns out, like the suns its radiant light is renewed by Aions.

Responsible freedom is also responsible limitation, not by coercion, but by a free attitude that recognizes where the limits lie, and by rounding out what is given and known, according to ability and skill, proportional to need. Pioneers and rebels find these limits themselves when they burn their fingers and discover what their minds and feelings are capable of and make new discoveries in the light of reason; traditionalists and hangers-on learn about these limits through social contracts and exchanges; there are those who explore, those who construct, and those who maintain, those who reform, and those who thrive.

The image of the world is rearranged, renewed upon waking, the mind and senses imprint it, the ego creates an illusion of permanent continuity, something tangible, it flows through consciousness.

When proportion, mediocrity, and measure have been set in motion in life, old age is a gift and a sign of returning home after leaving tired bones to decay in the cycle of nature.

With age the senses, body and mind, refuse to obey our will, we approach the realization of the state of our animal body in great sickness, and in old age we approach that melancholy realization of how better it is to prepare for old age by knowing and training this to preserve our mind and serenity for the senile period when we are more likely to depart in wisdom and in full command of the sobriety of an old mind.

It is the case with withdrawn or introverted people, these who build their inner temple and carefully furnish it with strong, purposeful and beautiful things, shine them forth as mature works later, or in parallel to their development, these who shine strongly at first, but lack foundations are youthful fires, they are also beautiful, but they lack the fixed conditions to last and built monoliths of their lives, after all both fames are rarely lasting, and they are soon forgotten — it is better to strife for the better in others, than that of preserving oneself in memory, the ideas put into motion for excelled effects in others are worth many a greater thing than short-lasted fames. Who remembers teachers of Confucius? Yet they trained the young boy and make him outgrow them, a master who did not leave a greater disciple than himself must surely consider himself peerless yet saddened, ‚if there are no monks, there are no masters' — in other words, if there are no aspirants, the jewels are not found.

It is the case of withdrawn or introverted people who build their inner temple and carefully equip it with strong, purposeful and beautiful things, which later or parallel to their development shine as mature works, which initially shine strongly, but lack the foundation, are youthful fires, they are also beautiful, but lack the solid conditions, to endure and build monoliths of their lives, after all, both celebrities rarely last, and they are soon forgotten — it is better to work for the better in others than to preserve oneself in memory, the ideas set in motion for superior effects in others are worth much more than short-lived celebrities. Who remembers the teachers of Confucius? And yet they trained the boy and made him rise above. A master who has left no greater disciple than himself must surely think himself incomparable and yet be sad, „if there are no monks, there are no masters" — in other words, if there are no aspirants, the jewels will not be found.

This attraction is natural, but when blindness takes hold of man, it must be dusted off in the mind and heart and rediscovered, obtained and maintained. Breaking this connection of attraction is a plan to separate men and women from heaven, when ignorance is transformed into knowledge, lies and deceptions are branded and the connection is uncovered, one is at peace and persistently strives to strengthen the connection. Heaven is found in silence, there it is full of sounds and non-verbal language, signatures of ideas and concepts suitable for interpretation, everything is revealed in this silence as it is full of content, hearing relies on the acumen of the heart and mind of people, it is received spiritually when the mind and heart envelop it.

He cannot see through his own mistakes and falls into the trap of an adhering deception.

The passage from a good intention to execution, when it agrees with what is right, produces effects, likewise the passage from an evil motive or intention to execution, both threads produce habits that imprint themselves on the mind and heart, it is of the utmost importance to act in such a way, that good character is polished and nature is elevated, the mind that is poisoned and yet refuses to act should be improved by personal commitment to reverse the poison and serve the antidote, wearing the armor of learned antidotes and healthy habits best protects against the poison.

Autonomous movements with one's genii are in harmony with the True Will, which reveals itself as one with the expression of Heaven. What deprives us of the genuineness of the expression of these genii is the prevention of the natural movements of our innermost animating essence.

The movements of desires, the movements of the heart, if not controlled by the intellect and the resilient spirit that leads to wise resolutions through the intellect, destroy one's life and the higher, purified nature. There is a difference between being an „excellent butcher who slices everything with the ease of spontaneity", or a „warrior who slices three enemies with a graceful movement of joy", or „a sage who, with a thought inspired by heaven, ascends to the highest mountains", and „a butcher who, in a bloodlust, makes a crude effort that borders on being a murderer", or a „warrior who is involved in a war, nothing more than a hired assassin', or „a sage who tries to force his way to heaven", without understanding that he himself is the obstacle", in other words a difference in degree between „agreement in transparent honesty and sincerity between the being, man and heaven" and „a notion of falsity, non-genuine strife, which is both with the genii, the spirit of man, and with heaven, the animal „heart and soul" will not be on a path of excess like a human being, a human being deprived of life and essence, the heavenly nature, is more excessive than any animal could be.

Responsible self-commitment produces a stronger, more determined mind that acts with nobility unbound, it directs the growth of a tree, if it is too stiff, it is like a bonsai tree, if it is too free and loose, it is sick and misshapen, as if it were standing on bad soil, how great is the effort of a wonderful tree to reach its full capacity, like great redwood trees!

Nothing good comes from inner restlessness; in such anxious restlessness or over-excitement one should not make decisions or act until one is inwardly calm.

Let us remember that it is by what we are that we influence. People may follow the greatest scoundrel if he has inner fire and ignore the noblest person, likewise, the inner fire of a noble person who steers things in the right direction is of the greatest value! Be careful with people with inner fire, they may not know where they lead, or the effects of their power may be detrimental to the whole.

One himself falls into traps set for others or prepares a miserable fate for others who are drawn into his secret plans.

The great hearing is leased only to noble, open, honest instincts; the secret machinations are confined only to a certain group of focal points. The latter, however, can spread by capturing people and holding the great hearing and driving them away with noble, open, honest instincts, as if they were sowing their thoughts, words, and deeds on a barren or impoverished soil.

The inward movement reaches its peak when it emerges. Inspecting and reflecting our innermost is like a hawk soaring in flight, then when it looks down, it is seen from afar and sees everything that sees it.

Gladly, if it does no harm, if this gossip harms, it is tantamount to slander, without essence, the wind blows empty, when the greatest words become empty and degenerate into vulgar self-evaluation, they are of the greatest harm, they lose their sublimity and overarching wisdom and become dangerous gossip, when a great sage is transformed into a vulgar lunatic, his words are stolen, often with the worst effects.

The potential of choice and action opens in the foreshadowing of events.

A tree that reaches its best momentum focuses on strengthening its branches and roots.

After the act we reflect and regenerate our forces, strengthen the branches and roots.

Analogies: unfinished works, unbreathed breaths — to solidify something without finishing it does not bear fruit, the former is of inferior quality or falls into ruin or brings bad consequences, the latter can lead to suffocation and the next breath is hard and fast.

The expansion of nature, of works, of imagination, of concept, requires extensive exploration. This mental activity shrinks them to their essential parts and makes them fruitful, communicable, and well understood. If one masters a science well, one speaks about it in a meaningful way to an expert and non-expert audience, in simple and complex ways, similarly, if one masters one's essence well, one expresses it in a variety of ways, depending on the audience — you do not behave like a general in front of your friend, you do it in front of an army, you do not behave like a beggar when you have food, but when you are destitute, what else can you do but behave like a beggar and be one, even if you were a general before? he hides his nature when it is expressed superficially, he expands his nature when it is necessary. And every time he expands his nature, he tries to contract it to the extreme, according to the situation, according to the need.

If one spins too many threads, whether benign or malicious, one gets caught in the web of others.

It is a matter of discernment to detach from the external world and turn to it when necessary.

Characters and natures sow destinies" — which means that we do take responsibility for the consequences of our existence, but partly, being part of causality, we can trace selective trends of events with the density of causality, self-love defeats us, non-attachment to the self and good behavior protects us.

The search for knowledge, wisdom, or keys in the desert leads nowhere, even if we are convinced that he is searching in a treasury, this may be only an illusion. people who are devoted to studied knowledge related to mysteries may seek it all their lives, but a fool who acts out may happen to find it faster, too much aversion of the former, both the studied master and a brilliant fool may find a way that excites too much envy and hatred of the studied pedants, and inferior fanatics, though they should not be discarded by an astute sage — „a fool has a right to live, just like any other," if „we can talk in many ways" and yet retain the dignity and honesty of a clear mind, we can find allies among everyone without demeaning or decomposing our natures one inch.

In some cultures, women were considered the „steel centre of society," to be relied upon if they were wise and strong to know themselves. The Huns were travelling and relied on a matriarchy, in China it was different, but to mix modern concepts and apply them to these social and intersex arrangements misses the point: the majority of women's „liberation" was taken from the „liberation from the Judeo-Christian model of woman", a reality constructed by a Judeo-Christian slave morality patriarchy, a Roman patriarchal woman, a Thracian woman, a Hindi caste woman had a different role, identity and parity in their respectful societies.

No task is too small not to be turned into a goal, even sweeping the streets with thoughts that do not digress from the task is a whole effort. One folds the petals of one's mind within oneself to enlighten and protect it.

Retreat can be a sign of strength, for it is a wise decision to leave the field without wasting determination on unsuccessful advances.

When we are in full possession of our spiritual powers, we do not retreat. When darkness spreads, we do not waste strength by fighting it, but look for safer grounds to reorganize and wait, trying to slow its progress if we can, even individual opposition to the state of things is an impulse, that does not remove the contradiction between right and wrong, but one does not waste one's teeth on a progressive state of doom, no evil added to evil — one can easily be drawn into darkness when caught between helplessness, despair, pity and anger.

Seek safe ground in life when encircled, strengthen your integrity and clarity when torn by madness or sabotaged by inferiors, reclaim yourself and firmly establish the roots of your being. In death, retreat to the ground of great deed and shift your life into spiritual territory, expression and deed continue in this way.

Even when the crowd of inferiors approaches us or is close to us, spies on us and tries to control us, we keep a mask on and maintain honesty towards ourselves and our character. In this way, although we are unknown, we are still fully known, because even if the inferiors know us, they cannot penetrate the core of our being; their foundations do not allow it.

Let your nature become strong according to its capacity, then freeze at the bottom and raise the summit. The top of the mountain does not touch the retreating sky, but remains in its integrity as it was taught, becoming an emblem of its foundations.

As the superior man is brought to a standstill by the recognized restraint of heaven, so he must be rebuked in a profound way, he has recognized the depth and restrains himself.

Persistent in task, strong in retreat, „one may retreat to higher levels in the course of life, but fill this with greater thoughts, undertakings, acts of life and expression, yet in sparing and simple contact with retreat one is not left behind, distracted by lesser things, it is not inactivity that is unproductive and unfruitful, it is creative, silent and yet determined."

Misguided or purposeful perseverance can turn into fanaticism or zeal without wisdom, likewise perseverance directed to wrong goals is unwise, often a strong and righteous person strikes the wrong rock blindly and continuously, to cut the Gordian knot with a determined step means to be „one with nature and heaven".

Any inflation or hypertrophy of one's qualities, whether perceived or not, inflates one beyond what one is and entangles one in a spider web of illusions and a web of concepts, abstractions, illusory relationships, etc. When it bursts, one seldom falls back to what one truly is and has difficulty regaining one's former status, perspective, principle, and direction. Preferably, removing the flaws in his mind and heart and moving wisely, according to skill and circumstance, removing the thorns from horns and head one by one.

They are brought about by the inner gravity, the trajectories of the subject of this gravity or one's own actions, demonstrations, behaviour are the executing gesture.

Going back to basics, cutting through a stubborn, sorrowful delusion or ignorance has a beneficial and lasting effect.

He who is aware of an impasse finds a way out, sooner or later, inwardly or outwardly. To stop and resolve does not mean to submit or to give up one's ideals, it means a cooperative solution found somewhere outside the deadlocked situation.

In a shell a pearl is born, then it is offered to heaven with all its power.

The unborn nature of consciousness, likewise — the refinement of the mind through alchemy until it becomes itself again, it is not in the state of fall, but in the state of new birth, potentiality, and return. Through spiritual techniques, exercises and a good life, or — primarily — through instinctive understanding and the becoming of that understanding through practice.

When we lose patience with the situation, we divert our course. The integrity of a flowing water moving forward when it encounters a disturbance or obstacle is a matter of integrity of character, not of enforcing decisions.

Between despair and affirmation there is an attitude of sorrowful perseverance, it strengthens the character and gives it power, which should be preserved. If we shirk this woe, we forget the burden, throw it away halfway, and degenerate into irresponsible arrogance or childish stupidity.

Misguided persistence borders on stubborn ignorance, it brings unrest.

A loss is „the return of things to nature and to the gods"; a gain is a temporal thing used for right or wrong. We should detach ourselves from the by-products of such things and check the gain at the right time so as not to accumulate things to which we are attached, otherwise we may threaten others with excessive loss and poverty. Any gain of character is the effect of its brilliance, but if the gain displaces the character, it kills the light, and so both the character is empty, corrupted, and the gain is used badly.

When is the light nature overshadowed by the dark, and vice versa, when is the light leader eclipsed, or the man of the dark nature of the low becomes light? This is not only a question of behavior, but also a question of causes, effects, and destinies. And yet you relate everything to the work and polish his nature through yin and yang in the tension to give birth to a diamond. Hardened, perceptive minds absorb both, but steer in right behavior, despite the storms and hurricanes they brave, in light weather they do not change their perseverance and inner truth and integrity an inch and return to it at any cost when disturbances temporarily break their way.

Overcome to surpass, the tension of overcoming builds lasting, strong characters.

Even when our light is turned into darkness by strokes of fate, it is of great and noble value to protect others from the devastating effects, despite the evil inclinations that have defiled one's nature.

In conflict with the host, if one rejects the offers based on principles, one offends him but retains his principles. If one is not so understood, one might be ridiculed, or even worse — if one recognizes one's principles as higher than those of the host, one becomes an enemy, like a thorn in someone's side, but in the eyes of heaven one remains true to principles and honest to oneself, transparent in one's actions.

Those who speak ill of us should be overcome by unshakable loyalty to one's own inner truth, which one practices, so that when one has, say, confirmation of one's path or indications of progress and accomplishment in the inner sphere, one takes a steely path, all naysayers and scoffers should be ignored, if someone's privacy is abused from the air, but his private revelations surpass those of prying eyes, he should stand firm on his path, for even those in flight can be blinded these days. The wounded hawk without wings sees and remembers more than a sparrow in flight, chattering incessantly with the hawk trying to outwit him.

You cannot quickly heal or repair broken people and societies, it is easier to spoil and ruin them than to lead them to recovery and protect them through firmness.

In no case should we inform the other about our inner reason and deep understanding of any situation, attentive, sometimes traces of madness help us to be discarded as a potential threat, another thing is memory — you can forget your inner lamp and become mad out of action, you can forget your deep understanding — but once the movements of the other and the causes and effects are understood, they are a source of action if you think about them and make them intuitively, almost instinctively.

The existing tension is not resolved by taking sides. Any contribution or strong movement reinforces the opposition, for in times of discord all movements are read into one side or the other, further fragmenting and splintering all sides as they all read „separately" into their own sides, what is read „in unison" in times of unity, what is vague is tainted with bias, what is radical is rewarded, what is wise is discarded, what is strong with opinion wins over the subtlety of the discerning.

The tense opposition, resolved by the transcendent/wise Third or Other, redirects the opposing energies into creative joint action in unison, whereupon the opposition very slowly rebuilds. However, if sustained, the energies can implode and then dissipate into a catastrophe, a social or personal catastrophe

With patience and decency, it is more difficult to overcome and stand straight with one's principles among the wrong people, because among those with whom we find a synthesis of understanding and empathy, when we break out in anger, only enmity results. Having unconsciously seen that they cannot achieve what they have tried and that there is no parity, they go elsewhere without hatred, anger, or violence.

Even if an army of millions rises against one, he is free if he lets go of self-imprisonment and follows the firm and right path, it has the beneficial effect of strengthening one's character in toil, humiliation, perseverance and persistence, in the end one does not become the victim of perception, whether one is really conspiring against it or is paranoid — one silently foresees the movements of the enemy and checks them in the mind. One puts aside any sense of annoyance and overcomes the situation with a firm mind and way of thinking.

If one cannot find attachment to a close friend, may one find attachment to the gods and their providence, which establishes a correct relationship with the heavens and sweeps everything into a necessary order. Soon the friends will come again.

The dangers are many, beginning with alienation, dehumanization, being naked before the enemy, opening the gates of abuse to the enemy, inflation and megalomania, arrogance and excess of self-esteem, exaltation over the world in excess, the despair and heartbreak, the lack of attachment to anyone or anything, sinking into nothingness, losing the thread, wasting the forces, losing the principles, becoming a misanthrope, becoming infested with vices that are difficult to uproot. The enemy always tries to isolate his opponent to destroy him from the outside and from the inside. If the enemy tries to isolate himself as well, he will be doubly ruined — by his enemy and by himself. If one defeats oneself in this way, one falls; if one is unconquered within, one perseveres. May one find a continuous affinity with the heavens and deities and return to it in such a case. The enemy may try to undermine and overcome such affinities, but once the affinity is established, it runs like a permanent, well-woven thread.

A faithful companion or wife recognizes the blackened shell and takes great pains to break through it, bringing out the diamond of affection and friendship.

The inner perseverance that overcomes the storms and harassments around you, you perceive and notice everything with a sharp mind, you foresee the movement of the opposition and predict possible obstacles without avoiding them, but you pull the strings and weave them into a steel rod with which you command yourself, he forges the character, whereupon weak people engage in all kinds of retorts and confrontations with unworthy things and thus do not develop a strong nature, moreover, you gain a superior position in your mind that dominates the field of your vision without the slightest gain from the advancing enemies, you do not lose your star easily It is worthy to appease the gods and ask for audience, by which is meant genuine interaction, so that they may guide us and converse in quiet idea and inspiration when men are unreliable or we cannot afford hidden ties that would corrupt our commitments.

If you do not find support in men, find support in the steel of your mind and in the gods. May they strengthen you as you commit yourself to heaven. Be careful, because this can also lead you to develop distrust of everyone, and then lead to contempt and hatred, you should get rid of such feelings and meet people as people, the gods as gods.

The fates are cathartic, the questioner, who has almost reached a fixed place, watches the rain falling through the mist.

It has the effect of getting rid of the burden in the first place, a grudge is our burden, not the others", hatred is a subjective attachment to the subject of our hatred, it also releases the guilt or shame in the others, that lets them continue if they understand the mistake and correct it — that is punishment enough if they do not — that is not in our power to change it.

Awe! Awe! the dragon's lightning strikes! He disperses and corrects, he brings things in messages and movements, he straightens the corrupted roots of natures, he brings the limits to those who had lost their way in the spirit.

He does not ruminate on mistakes but resolutely corrects them, he does not dwell on the mistakes of the past but resolutely carries a proper view of the present and the future, like rain that washes away stains, he should not be caught lamenting a mistake, least he commits more and gets used to them, reality should not be frozen in this light, those who are prisoners of the past and transfer it to the present are the prisoners of reality, they are more busy living above the past than living the present and drawing wisdom from past experiences.

The truth is brought to light by a single masterful stroke, it exposes the enemy and renders him powerless, the arrow carries support as it shoots through the air, the Buddhist adage „accomplish everything by a single means" applies, this means, applied to time and change with natural force, solves everything for the better if one knows throughout life what means to use, he shoots his arrows at the right time and place and always pierces three heads, the heavenly archer rides like a Mongolian horseman and measures the distance and by intuitive flashing hits his target in an almost impossible way, wisdom is an ability to do the same in the affairs of men, heavens and hells, be it by talking, commanding, acting, action, retreat or silence, one knows when, how and why.

One should take measures that are continuous and not cling too tightly to one's temporary well-being. If one loses one's vigilance and gets carried away by the situation, one wastes one's habits and ways, methods, and wisdom, one should face life and engage oneself in any case, not losing one's hard-earned experiences and not forgetting them.

The means should be prepared and regenerated, they should not come to a standstill, lest we lose them like tools through carelessness. The golden mean is like the philosopher's stone, a source of inspiration like a muse from the fountain of heaven.

As with happiness, the reduction of misfortune leads to happiness, happiness is not recognized by the abundance after the misfortune has ceased — sometimes the reduction of the burden is happiness valued for its own sake, as if — freedom from a misfortune were happiness enough.

The increase of the happiness can create saturation, or the fate can take away this happiness and bring about unhappiness with it, also the laws of the organizational, informational entropy and the negentropy in the biology.

Some cultivate great characters under great stresses and have enough strength to enter the field of action and utilize the resources, others simply retreat because they lack the vital drive or enthusiasm to perform such deeds, which again is the demarcation between a hero and a sage.

An inner transparency, one with the world, honest with its movement, and of course, better to be in honest anger than in false sympathy, better to love honestly than to hide antagonism — the latter are simply not transparent in the light of the unfolding of the cosmos, they are not real tensions in which two polar opposites fight with each other, but false facades of tensions that twist the root and deform nature into grotesque theatrical masks. When they grow into us, we suffer like suffocated trees; when we discard them, we reassert our character, nature, and inclinations.

Everything in the right form, a fountain, the top is the source of consciousness, when it falls and fills the lower spheres of human intellectual, emotional, and instinctive life, everything is balanced and harmonious and set in motion in a magnificent way.

Responsibility in dealing with the lower, or how much one may say, act, give and do in order not to spoil, not to harm, not to damage the lower, self-restraint in passing on, a master does not parrot everything he knows to his disciple, but waters the disciple and lets him grow out of himself, because the roots he develops are strong and his own, which he must nurture and develop further.

With the character, the virtues, and the vices, it should be kept in mind, be aware of its shortcomings and excesses to round them off, to be whole.

Autonomous self-correction is a characteristic of a mature mind that has developed a sense of good and evil, right and wrong, and learns to balance it wisely and justly, one expands it into inner cognition and contemplation, but one does not make demands outside of oneself, when enemies or misunderstandings try to force one into obedience to a wrong enterprise, one must be resilient and not be drawn into their ways of acting, violating, or believing, even when threatened or intimidated. The spirit bound to a star of consciousness is not afraid of punishment to the body or mind, it is always free. If the enemies are stubborn, foolish and violent, one persists in silence and remains in one's inner truth, no blows should be struck until a means of dissolving, disarming or killing the enemy is found.

To understand an exalted position in relation to heaven is to understand the totality of events that have been set in motion, and thus to improve, harmonize, weave, and correct, as is justice

A bodhisattva sacrifices complete liberation out of compassion, a sage sacrifices the movements of his freedom to bind himself to people, masters and beloved ones who could return to TAO, who have committed themselves to this world and have stayed behind to guide others, but the higher element refines the lower and strengthens it in its foundations.

At times weary, we want to leave, and crave for liberation amongst measure, then another relief as we look around and there is too much to do, these who once fell for the world do not abandon it easily.

Whether one should sacrifice one's higher nature is a matter of discernment and sound judgement. One should not keep it as property, nor dispose of it freely, but manage it thoroughly and yet not separate oneself from the lower nature.

Ancient lore is not only for study but also for reflection and internalisation, there is a treasure in the books that can be applied considering the times. Gigantomachy or the battle of the titans within, of nature, of character, of ethos, of principles, of spirit, etc. is a constant process, one advances, establishes foundations, survives sieges, etc. one develops an ethos and then sets one's actions against it, there is a difference between a consciously developed ethos and a conditioned ethos, there is a difference between going back and forth willy-nilly and consciously committing right and wrong, a consciously developed ethos is rational and finds its basis in insight, observation and understanding, a conditioned one is what was thought and is carried out unconsciously and tends to be shaky, there are people who move opportunistically across the fields of events without a backbone, and conform, there are people who are semi-ethical but do not know why, and are afraid of overstepping their bounds, but it is a tone-deaf but healthy feeling, there are those who follow a path of ruthless abuse of semi-ethical and conditioned people, having a superior hand in exploiting them, and there are those who consciously oppose them because they see the harm they are doing to the whole, whose ethos is based on observing the laws that govern people and their various natures, and who are forward-looking.

When corruption consumes us, we may be demoted to the inferior lot, and then we are gradually removed, that holds a lot of hurt and ill will towards the rest, even when the higher people we once belonged to begin to rise up, we then either turn to inferior intrigues or withdraw from the scene with hurt natures to contemplate things that are still possible, not adding evil from a hurt nature is also a gigantomachy.

Only cold-blooded animals have poison, never underestimate the thirst for blood and the revenge of a bitter and defeated man, in wisdom he still tries to warn, in malice he begins to observe the folly and self-destruction of others

Especially on the way up or in an exalted position, one must be especially on guard for the sake of oneself and others. A man with a dagger and the status of a downtrodden common beggar is more dangerous because he can use it at will without being controlled by hierarchical and traditional feelings, or social constraints, a mage with a sharp tongue can use it to kill, negotiate or create, but a downtrodden dog with such power will use it in a way appropriate to the treatment he has received, wheels of fate turn, overcoming is especially important in a matter of power and command regardless of status.

Measure always means against odds.

Constant danger should not cause us to dull our senses because we have become accustomed to it. We should always be fresh, as in a spontaneous Sabre dance, focused and ready to confront, interact, retreat, strike and defend, observe, and evaluate.

While murmurings, gossip and slander and lies develop, while one's undertakings are openly mocked without being asked and censored, it is a way of strengthening the principle and unshakable maturation to stay on the path with the inner truth, if it is really wise, one should move away from such a place, if that is not possible, one should adopt a quiet, friendly and withdrawn attitude in order not to be hurt or attacked.

Contemplate your defects — correct them — Buddhist stanza

A wise, powerful woman is a great person, equal to great men and in no way inferior to them, but if a wise man wants to submit to such a woman, it weakens his nature and independence, Samson and Dalila, a man's strength and intellect atrophy when domesticated by a woman.

Gifts of darkness should not be accepted, they are a method of creeping into the mind, whatever the intent, ultimately it is eaten away by the nature of such a gift and its source. When darkness sets us in motion, we set ourselves in motion with heaven in our hearts, maintaining a strong stance and a principled vanguard in an exposed position, yet vaulted in our own inner truth and its resilient, tenacious defense.

Ancestral ties commemorated, and offerings to the spirits of one's clan with whom one has an affinity. A reference that binds the communities beyond the mere mortal bonds that dissolve and break without there being a unifying idea that each internalizes but acts together.

Morality is the regulation of the natural law of instinct as well as that which aspires to higher things, and sets limits to behavior and introversion; it is the interpenetration of laws, traditions, and codes established in a culture or civilization; it is taboo and sacred, its hallowed modes of action, The intellect and reason, Platonically refined and radiating down to earth from the world of ideas and forms, is wholly moral (approximation of behavior), but in this case much of morality can be written into nature, and it is not so, to quote Ernst Junger: „There is a difference between ethos and morality. A warrior follows his ethos, it can be morally subverted. Traditional law and being are at odds with each other".

The ambiguity of interests is overcome by a single goal. From this position it is immaterial whether it turns for good or ill, the energies of the mass are directed where the wind blows or where the leader goes, the mind and feeling of free individuals follow reasonable aims and prospects, and so it is a greater peculiarity to gather such people for a common purpose.

Thoroughness and sincerity always direct the loose ends of the mind, guard your mind against falsehood that appears as honesty, it is self-deception that should be eliminated.

The weak surrounding the strong have a corrupting effect, the strong treat each other equally and strengthen each other by leading the weaker.

Just as a plant develops according to its phenotypic makeup, with variables in expression, variety, and environment, it is important to be great in small things and small steps, so that later they can unfold and reveal their character.

Characters and natures understand themselves with hidden spiritual connections that some recognize unconsciously, it is the affinity in the spirit when in fallen times all ruling elites are of inferior spirit to ours, let us find affinity in the low but great spirits that are equal or similar to our own, they are immediately recognized rulers can also be considered the heavenly forces, the deities, masters and mistresses, liberated spirits.

If you charge upward unimpeded, you lose your cover, and so your momentum can break down at a certain point, the famous „fall from above".

Sometimes excessive caution can be a hindrance to one's actions

One withdraws into silence and guards one's speech and thoughts whenever possible. Carrying the burden in silence is wiser than speaking without being asked, thoughts should also be guarded, but not at the cost of losing depth and connection with the divine, otherwise superficiality is the result and forgetfulness the consequence, in darker times it is better to be thought a madman, reflections when one comes into conflict with darker forces, seriousness, intelligence and earnestness of purpose can lead to terrible results when exposed and employed to evil or the corrupt, a madman can be a wise man outwardly — the dark forces are not threatened by a foolish madman and so he can pursue his tasks with sadness — in silence, whether this is the act of prudence or true madness does not matter, inasmuch as in the latter case one can gather his composition within, and yet certain eccentricities protect him from this, being a threat to others when he is used by the darkness, and they protect him from unnecessary risks and foolish moves when he tries with all his might to strike and attack with melancholy and a heavy heart, what seems like an offensive against the windmills is a reactive attack against the image of the times that one sees clearly. This move is that of a youthful folly, but it must be done to retreat and gather later, one must recognize the times without growing into the fall and maintain a strong sense of principle, the enemies are forgetfulness and corruption, one follows the other, what is contaminated with corruption must be kept in check by extraordinary effort, for corrupt minds bear greater blows than those that are untainted, otherwise darkness spreads through their veins and soon poisons the heart and mind, it destroys character and nature, for it replaces actual knowledge and greatness of spirit with the pettiness of delusion, ignorance, forgetfulness, irrationality, stupidity, malice, anger, hatred and envy, it disrupts superior people by bringing them down through inferior machinations, by mass they may surpass many, but repeating the Buddhist teachings „even an army cannot harm us if we do not reach for our self", „we are not slain, nor do we kill", how can an enemy slay us if there is no self? how can we slay if the enemy has no self? To slay us, the darkness must make us believe in our self as a quality, and then bind us to that illusion. Then we can be easily defeated and deformed, but if we detach, we are undefeated.

Overcoming with joy, or as a friend of mine used to say, if one overcomes in anguish to the positive, if one is indifferent and detached, striving for loving kindness, if one does not turn to the sick in great pain, otherwise it becomes a misery stronger than our will — then we really fall, how does one come to that? In the spirit one overcomes, in discrete deeds one overcomes the darkness with good deeds.

It becomes a feast of darkness and soon it will feast on darkness itself, it will soon turn against the world, accustomed to it, it will not even be recognized as such, it grows into our minds, hearts and veins and soon becomes a natural way of acting, as masked wickedness — if we refuse to recognize it and allow ourselves to act as if it were natural, if we refuse to recognize it and allow ourselves to act as if it were natural, it becomes so natural that we no longer realize that everything we are is saturated to the core with darkness — and it masquerades as something superior, we no longer see anything of our former selves, we become forgetful, and our faces turn into grotesque masks.

It is of the utmost importance to know that all words are heard, not only among men in the realm of their hearing, but also in the worlds of spirits. Forgetting this simple statement, which we should accept as truth even currently, we hold our tongues and proceed to use words sparingly and wisely, only when such a need arises, and those of strength and direction we use with forethought.

It is also important to recognize one's surroundings, one's circumstances, to inspect them clearly, to see with insight, to assess one's situation correctly, and to know how to navigate around a minefield despite great adversity, and once we have learned the „rules of the game", to know forever that this too can change, and in secret, and that hidden, deeper games are being played, when on the surface everything seems clear, while in the depths there may be great malice at work, or a greater good that does not invite inaction, but rather strengthens the behavior and composition and perseverance of one's spirit in the depths, tireless as a struggling scarab.

From the perspective of depression, misery, failure, oppression, antagonism, hatred, you may not see anything else, but you must endure and survive it, to resist the internal and external conditions with all means, subjective conditions are objective in the eyes of the gods, no hell lasts forever, even if it may seem so.

If someone is harassed by a wasp and cries „Mischief!" or is afraid of small pains and a small insect, how should he deal with things of greater magnitude and proportion?

Reference to a man, with man as the center for consideration, alone with being alone, the finger points back to our essence, so what is the essence of the Golden Flower, if human nature is disputed in the world of nature, how can one define his or her celestial nature interwoven between nature, form, man, and spirit? That a man, bared in agony to the wildest movements, with heart broken like a crack exposing the abyss, and in sorrow and pain, having silenced his heart, longs for the stars, for the return, for the idea — masks of forces and powers, that he and she refine his longings and desires into the forces, pure ideas, diverse in his understanding, diverse in the universe, but in their totality perfectly One and Pure. Then, in the vulgarity of the world and tormented by lesser evils, he freezes and forgets this beauty and proportion, the longing and the sacred tranquility, he becomes vulgar himself because he no longer feels it, it is with us and yet it eludes us, a coquettish game, in this ascent of life and its intellectual spirit, which leaves a trace of certainty, of continuous work, in the great solitude of the cities, of the plains, of the deserts, of the mountains and of the seas, he becomes an astronomer who is also the subject of his astronomy, insofar as he is contained in the whole, in a unity. He fills himself broken, incomplete and wounded, always with the image of perfection in the head and in the feeling, but it is a sweet wound that seeks a solution.

Penetrate empathetically nature as it is, life as it is, perceive the starry sky, then order, in proper foundations for yourself, and if such a calling exists — for others.

An organized society that does not agree with the laws of life and nature, although on the surface everything works well, but the people and restless, anxious, tired, when the disease creeps into them, they become wounded, crazy, when they realize, they become torn, painful, until they bring back the harmony in themselves individually, heal themselves, like a sentinel on the mountain that sends signals to the others. The constant replacement of illusions with illusions, as it is spun, forces us to take the sword and cut them first in our mind and heart, then defend ourselves against the spinner and help others.

Good judgment in discerning between people is a way in which they are wisely supported and our promotion appears to them as clear, reasonable and inspiring. All ambiguous situations, both in regard to our conduct and in regard to the guidance of others, should be resolved either by inner, tested laws and principles, or, if we have an astute, spontaneous mind, by wisdom. The latter is preferable, but the letter of the law and principles of conduct were created to resolve many situations through the power of tradition or reason, right-minded and wise people resolve each case and treat each person differently as needed; Winning an argument is never good, contradiction is not a wise attitude — we win the personal battle but leave the other person with a sense of distrust, doubt and hostility. All debates should be resolved in such a way as to bring about something fruitful and wise for the other party, not to break their will or faith. In the writings of Chuang Tzu, it is said that a master orated in the marketplace and abandoned his official duties. For a small fee, he used to pretend that he was prophesying, but in reality he gave good and wise advice to every person he met.

How much better it is to connect with the deities, the spirits, than with lesser men. Although the feeling of connection and belonging to the human race is difficult to overcome, when we feel lonely and alone, we should strongly ask for the support of heaven and thus find the great company above and in the world of nature, one is thus on a thread of the heavenly path, even if, if we are not of strong character, the total withdrawal can turn into isolation, misanthropy and contempt — so let us seek good friendships, usually they arise from kindred spirits and understanding. On the other hand, we should not despise people who lack some qualities. A lack of affinity and affinity does not mean we despise them, are they not better than the grass in the meadow, are we not a similar blade of grass? Some Buddhist masters advised to avoid bad company, others advised to seek it out — if the aspirant was strong enough, he could change the bad company for the better, otherwise he turned into the worse one or left it with contempt.

Work ceaselessly if you can work parts of your being into the composition and pass them on — both the inner and outer work is not in vain.

To the extent that he completes and expands himself through this drawing, the blood of his being becomes stronger and grows in wealth, the spirit becomes stronger and flourishes as far as the spirit allows.

When we strive to spread certain ideas, set things in motion, and gather support, we also take full responsibility for the network of people who come under their influence and movement, if we do not resort to an insightful and strategic plan that incorporates everything with foresight, we lead people to disillusionment at best, and carnage at worst. Opposition, dissidence, rebellion, revolution for its own sake eats its own children, and the reactive order that is restored is seldom better than the last, even if it accommodates some of the revolutionaries" ideal postulates.

Selfless leadership through ideas in the service of the common good.

Perceives the trends, threads, inclinations, and tendencies, and adjusts to the perceived currents of events and the noosphere of societies in good consensus, whether in opposition, cooperatively, or combatively.

When one considers the transcendent movements, the ancient movements of the currents and astralistic influences which storm and reshape the constellations of forces which are themselves connected with the transcendent movements, and when one looks down upon the earth and tries to recognize and perceive the transcendent movements, then this refers to the manifold and complex orders and ramifications of the events which are reflected in earthly affairs.

By adapting to circumstances, he holds on to the inner truth that cannot be bent by them and radiates greatness.

Reforms should be preventive in the state of disorder and decay, conservative in the state of decay, stability, stagnation, growth, or pervasive in the state of growth and advancement.

The branches of nature in men and women reach for the branches of heaven, which have their roots in the transcendent. Transcendent is understood here as vertical, from the earth we look at the stars, but when a vertical line is drawn from the earth to the sky, it should become a radius, it is the distance between the human microcosm and the macrocosm, then, drawing a full circle between two points, it draws a perfect monad and then creates a sphere with another full angular rotation of the circle around its axis, so everything is contained in it. Sometimes the microcosm is in the center of the monad surrounded by the divine spheres, sometimes the macrocosm is the center of the monad surrounded by microcosms, or the other way around: our spirit in the center is surrounded and enclosed in the macrocosmic One — there we are the center of our actions and being, the only ones, on the other hand we are a part of the macrocosmic sphere, while the transcendent One is the spirit in the center: these are shifts in observation that are as useful as they are practical in meditation and ceremony, although they are essentially one and the same.

Character can sow fates, by perfecting character one raises the understanding of destinies.

When the force or power is disproportionately restricted, or when the executive power is left to the petty, who deform and twist the conferred power with their own faults, it contaminates both the agent and the agent and becomes volatile or destructive. Power flows according to its strength and therefore requires people who can handle it, otherwise it damages the structure of one's mind and the fabric of society.

Selfless dominion over oneself, without superficial airs and graces, without attachments to qualities of mind, body, status, etc., which otherwise quickly inflate, it is a matter of being aware of one's art but not attaching superficial egoistic importance to it, one treats oneself as a transmitter, a mediator, an intermediary between, who is somewhat strong, self-contained, and full, somewhat hollow, empty, but deep.

Even when the earth splits, he goes his way unswervingly, even when he stands in the void of the stars — perseverance in that which is holy and great.

Sober moments of returning to the path when you have done something wrong or strengthening the path in moments of doubt or stagnation.

Rejoice in the rolling thunder, laugh with it like a madman, even if you dance in your heart, because there you will find unity with nature and the divine, in ecstasy and laughter!

May the terrors that have not terrified us be our future silent, resilient forces. The gaze of terror slips away from men, for it pays no special attention to them.

Fate returns of its own accord when it must, to chase it is to lose oneself in the causal chain as in a spider's web, not to wait for something that is not certain, in the process of life one never deals with the present in waiting.

To ascend to the heights of the mind and heart, to find and practice safe ground, to remain in that territory, to ward off losses, and to sacrifice certain things to withstand misfortunes — this teaches patience and fortitude, a sage in his crystal star castle looks down on his mortal toil, and in the purple palace of emptiness he reverses the deity, there are two maneuvers worth noting, one of which resembles Scipio's dream, perceiving himself as an ant from a great distance from the earth, the other is the detachment from everything that requires training and a calm mind, and as for the defects of the mind and the body, our mind is fixed on a star as a reference, the consciousness or the self that is in control of the defects and the grace of the body and the mind to the extent that the mind and the body allow it, then the positive emptiness as the content — from where we engage, distract, act, retreat and become still; whether it is a psychological or a magical, ceremonial maneuver, it must be done with complete honesty and surrender in the space of will, imagination, construction and ontic shift, bi-multi and omni location of one's being.

Despite the thunder of events, you do not lose your composure and act — what a great act of overcoming, hesitation, and action — you commit great things, shock and petrification — you do not go further, this is normal, retreat — this is the common man.

If the mind is a sword and it is thrown into a swamp, it is strong, its blade sharp, but it simply drowns to the bottom, the properties of the object are useless under such circumstances, yet it retains its properties until the process of rusting begins.

One dances when music plays, and ceases when it stops, one moves when the music of change plays, one stops when it ceases, all in complete submersion in the dance, what is learned expresses itself in dance and stopping and thus the quality of result is the sum of all the movements, the greater whole is the summa summarum of all dances and stops and is a swift adaptation to the situation as the events flow, when it is congested we trip and fall, when we move when it is time to still ourselves, we are swept under its current.

How can one distinguish actions that come from the depths of things from personal impulses and instincts? One knows it by the complete honesty of all movements in the moments that flow through the whole being-this is a matter of mysticism, of spontaneity and transparency, of freedom, of true impulse and true feeling, which come out of the worlds of ideas, i.e. heaven, emerge and flow through the man and woman, serving as a vehicle for the transformation of self and the world, to take off the mask from the world and become clear and transparent is the first step, for no false self-image and no defensive conjured illusion or delusion about ourselves and the world will allow the depths of ideas and currents to pass through.

Sometimes the lure of progress, furthering our desires and false refinement or competition can pull one onto a wrong path, sometimes we are pushed onto the wrong path by circumstances and have to react, thus losing the original innocence of the path, but the experience gained in this way helps us when we correct ourselves later, however, it is advisable to remain in this inner truth and innocent traits as long as possible — then mistakes are rarely made.

The tragedy of loyalty and autonomy plays out, if someone is truly loyal he stays and falls with the master or wisely prevents his fall, if one breaks that vow the open space seems poisoned and the freedom gained blackened, if one is autonomous he rarely enters into such a loyal relationship because that would jeopardize his own freedoms, loyalty exists in good times, in bad times there is only the opportunism of self-interest.

One does not cut and pluck the lotus flower from the pond of one's own heart, but acts to nourish it in our own nature, in other words, when natural attitudes come together and inner circumstances are developed for tranquility, they blossom of their own accord, when a beginner sits down to meditate and sees no results, or becomes restless in heart and impatient, but forces himself to sit still without understanding, only trouble will arise; on the other hand, if one sits like a baby and slowly melts through instruction and concentration, preparing and developing his mind, endowing it with a structure of understanding and learning, it slowly rounds itself out and completes itself.

Time runs away from us humans, if we equate time with thoughts, it is never calm. Our mind changes much faster than our body. The human hair grows 1.25 cm per month. How many thoughts have you thought today, even the quiet ones? Trees think slowly, their musings are profound. The forest is timeless by human standards. When we try to think like a tree, our thoughts gain depth, as in an oneiric slow motion dream. The roots are firm, our branches rise slowly; perhaps the leaves were like thoughts for a tree. The same moment of a mind flash, a pause from deep meditation, lasts two seasons for a tree bearing leaves. It takes a few months for a tree to change its mind and gather new thoughts to ponder — but it is always in agreement, proportion, and harmony with its nature, it is not stubborn or determined, it expresses its essence. Then, in autumn, he casts off his thoughts, he stops in realization, as if in a positive, deep void, he withdraws his thoughts deep within himself, but he gathers his strength, as if he has an inner truth within him that always renews him. Perhaps therefore the axis of the world soul is compared to a tree. It is the deep thoughts that change according to a sequence, according to repetitive laws. If we translate the language of the forest, there is only wisdom, but it is silence that cannot be put into human words. The gods think like this, wordlessly, without a human voice or word, they are ideas that merge with the slow, timeless subject of their actions and lead to great, wonderful things that correspond to beauty, proportion, and truth. Slow decisions with penetrating insight that are prescient are the greatest. Spontaneous decisions made quickly spring from the same source as a whirlwind created in the ocean. Everything else appears as harshness or misjudgment, as triviality and frivolity of the small birds that also have their place in the world. The great falcon hovers above, with great long thoughts it gathers the small birds and embraces them. The great brooding over all that is below.

Perseverant in what is right in mind — what a quality! Perseverant in what is right over time — what a greatness!

So, he must pioneer for himself when there is no one to rely on, he is the sole cartographer of his steps — may he observe and learn in peace.

In solitude one develops maturity more quickly, and through trial and error one learns from others and from oneself the ways of life, one takes harder and deeper steps with time, becomes more certain.

Without suspicion and accusation, one does away with deceit in one's mind, when betrayed, one remains steadfast and is not troubled, but carries on.

It is the sense of community that strengthens the bond. The further people are separated from each other, the less healthy affection there is in the whole, leading not to union but to strife and war, where each is for himself and none for the others.

To perceive the transitoriness without being attached to it means to follow a path of the immortals, which gives the view from the beyond. One is attached to the perishable body and looks at the immortal spirit, nothing is lost, the Great Being merely puts on masks that are returned as form to the creation pool of forms, but the Great Being loses nothing of itself, it merely borrows its essence that returns to it. Considering the end, impermanence, and death, how can we live a meaningless life?

Every arrangement has a pattern. Recognizing social and political patterns and adapting them to pull them toward wise, wholesome solutions is the business of the statesman and the master.

Even if one is of low, insignificant status, one can achieve something through his and her nature and make it shine inwardly, the more deeply developed it is, the greater the outward shine.

Indeed, the one-eyed sometimes see more with the inner eye than those with a pair of healthy eyes who are nevertheless blinded.

When you sell yourself for something, you lose yourself and become a slave to a situation or a thing you have sold yourself to.

When only appearances and surrogates are maintained, an external decorum that has no essence, the ritual loses its purpose, men and women live as mere shells, for the illusions they have engaged in grow into them as well. The climax is followed by the waning and the zenith.

The knowledge of destiny and time brings sadness to the heart of the seeing when others rejoice, but it is not a heavy, bitter sadness, it is a fatherly sadness of foresight, like that of parents who see their children leave the nest.

Like the dance of the stars in unison, a man of leadership has a clear and joyful purpose; those whose hearts are stricken with bitterness cannot contribute to it.

Perfectly still, he perishes in the world of heaven, and the world of heaven perishes in him.

The theme of separation can be understood through the Hymn of the Pearl of Thomas Judas and the Epic of Gilgamesh. While the son and daughter visit foreign lands and forget their origins, after the separation from the land they participate again in the power of heaven in the worlds of their forefathers and foremothers, these are vertical or transcendent separations, the horizontal is that of wonder in unknown, hostile or foreign lands, whether geographical or spiritual or psychological.

In Mongolia, there is a tradition of placing a stone on a nearby cairn. This stone represents sorrow, toil, worry, and fatigue, which one throws into the stone and leaves behind for the journey to continue You may be at home, but you are perceived as a stranger, even if you are a prisoner of circumstances or necessity, you remain the same.

If judgments and punishments are not swift and wise, they act only on the degeneration of justice, of the penitent, and ultimately of the society that relies on this regulation.

What is foreign and yet seems familiar triggers inner fear, and so little people defeat them by mockery and soon one can be encircled and beaten, defeated, or killed by them, witch hunts worked in a similar way.

You should not interfere in the affairs of strangers in a foreign territory, because you are a stranger.

Prolonged indecision on the part of the investigators prolongs the process and helps the enemy reorganize.

Joy represents an inner unison of harmony in proportional, strong bond that is overcome and not touched by worries and fears. It is an inner state of happiness dissolved by determined gentleness. It is the preservation of principles, as well as yielding to others in wise and serene composure, without servility, but in good, balanced and humble moods. Steadfastness and regulation of the affairs of one's nature and character in an environment of change and events.

In the proper course of things, hearts are won in friendly accord; intimidation, even when used sparingly, leaves resentment in the hearts of others and may provoke revenge and ill-will, or it sings of those who are broken by intimidation. These are further divided into strong natures, which cannot be intimidated and can only be approached by agreement, and persistent natures, which, even when temporarily intimidated by force, strive to return to the strong, genuine, and free conditions. Weak natures who suffer intimidation, who protest at first but then join the intimidators, who seek revenge, and who work against the intimidator by silent deception. So never break the strong, dignified nature of lions, they will strike when they are healed and sweep everything out from under them. Never break the dignity of a snake, it will wait and gather its venom as it grows deadly strong. Never break the dignity of a wolf, it will attack as soon as the pack gathers, and it will have the strength of a bear when cornered.

Mutual inspiration is strongest when two sources continuously exchange cordial respect and spur each other on in cultured conversation. Most self-taught learning is one-sided, the waters of knowledge become murky, and one becomes a follower of one view. Soon one becomes alienated from the rest and unable to adopt another's view. Only the best masters, after proper training, can drive a wedge and develop in silence and solitude — they consult Heaven through their astute judgement and intelligence, nonetheless. However, it is advisable to exchange ideas and put ourselves in each other's shoes, penetrate the hidden thoughts of others, grab the loose threads, and pull them for the better, if we have enough wisdom and skill in dealing with people.

To want what we have by circumstance and no more, to be will-less, not moved by likes and dislikes, is a deep joy. The song of a destitute man is not for him alone, for if we put ourselves in his place with our minds — what more can we ask? Poverty is not praised, but it must be dealt with. A master — according to Chuang Tzu — after obtaining a rank in the imperial court, said: „The woman poverty has left me" — with a sadness as if he were losing his most faithful friend, who assured him inner joy even in times of turmoil.

Seek no connection to indulge in low pleasures, which pass away as quickly as they are regrettable, they pass away like the wind, the high pleasures of an aesthetic mind enrich their nature, and they profit by them. Learn to enjoy roundness and sublimity, but do not indulge in them for their own sake. The Buddhists have coined the expression that one is bound by the golden chain of virtue and the other by the iron chain of vice.

Once a certain level of inner refinement and self-sacrifice is reached, base and low things no longer hold us captive — they become unattractive rather than despised. One recognizes such instincts in others, but one lets them go without despising them, but understandingly, without distinguishing oneself by one's quality, otherwise one becomes a snob with external refinement, but without real essence and connection with the rest.

Empty inside — the world offers so many distractions and diversions. Complete and satisfied — everything is found within. Distractions are not sought apart from focused commitments. When distractions are associated with attachments, the loss of the outer leads to inner disaster and woe. Detachment is the way of the sage, a spacious and comprehensive mind his pursuing star. Thoughts like hawks come to the falconer as his heavenly companions.

Transparency and sincerity are preferable, but with all openness, one should maintain a cautious, covert attitude when recognizing disintegrating, degenerating elements. Recognized and detected dangers do not have so much influence when they assert their power over us, it is possible to counteract them, and if this is not possible — their influence becomes less.

He who loses his bearings in life and indulges in an immoderate, destructive life makes himself the plaything of fortune and misfortune. Plunged here into misfortune, there into happiness, like a flag in the wind, a puppet of fate, unable to control himself.

When frustration or fatigue arises under such a blockage, or when we struggle against the blockage we lose our footing and contribute to the distorted state of things, it is sometimes better to calm oneself in meekness and let the blockages be removed from within oneself, or to take calm countermeasures — not to leave the situation as it is, but to work persistently and with ease to clear the way. The muddy river is cleared by a stream of fresh water from the source, and so everything is seen in clarity.

Festivals and ceremonies, holidays, processions, and celebrations remind and strengthen the bond and affection between men, women, the world and heaven.

In rites and mysteries — they must be seized by individual reverence, sincere sacrifices and religious trials coupled with the realization of vastness, insignificance, horror, beauty cannot be imposed on anyone — it is a matter of personal re-experiencing of such circumstances within, therefore it is rather difficult to awaken people to such a feeling — in sincerity it is an individual mask, tradition is a bond — but it is a repetition, it is to be discovered within.

Everything is explained with great clarity, in all the outposts of discord, otherwise the misunderstandings accumulate and lead to conflicts, disagreements, distrust, and the best friends are separated without knowing what exactly has happened, each with a blackened heart, each with the conviction of being in the right, each with the conviction of having been betrayed — if things cannot be perfectly reconciled immediately, then one must circumvent the stubbornness of the other by openly stating one's intentions and heart, sacrificing oneself for the other.

Let us not misjudge the fates, let us remember the dead who have lived and perished by countless fates. If we judge the living pettily, our perspective and our observation shrink, because we know nothing of the people, the cult of ancestors has secured the bond between the living and the dead.

Indeed, self-sacrifice under heavy burdens that would otherwise drive one to selfishness is one of the titanic qualities that a human spirit can achieve.

He sacrifices his group identity and sense of belonging to a group by overcoming himself. This should not develop into a later contempt for the group, but rather one stands with it beyond all sectarian interests of a particular group and has the good of the whole in mind.

Silence, the idea that transcends, erases, resolves, elevates, redresses, sews, and promotes conflict, that reaches like a hawk to the sky, inspires the below. To the extent that the thinking of the gods is a merging of the idea with the object of their thinking, the impressions of the sacrificer, the oracle, the magician, the priest, the priestess on the gods are made by clear, great ideas, when a man is godlike for a while, his idea directed to heaven merges with the object of the thinking of the gods, blends and seals and impresses each other.

Not to overstep the bounds of inner truth and to conduct oneself in a right manner.

What is strongly bound in limitation grows elsewhere. When this growth is wise and directed, it leads to the highest effects in character, much like mental yoga or meditation, disciplining the mind serves to harden it and make it more alert, perceptive, and intelligent.

Limitations that turn into austerity are a rigid bond that contracts and expands to shape nature, to give it a direction that corresponds to the dominion over oneself that polishes men and women.

Virtues are resolved by reason, they are therefore reasonable in the light of the whole, what is a vice is unreasonable in the light of the whole and resolves into obscured delusion or ignorance, when reason is associated with the intellect, we are in search of the reflection of the divine. When he establishes the proportions and contents, stakes out the inner and outer boundaries of the mundane, the human and the divine, and thus measures them in fine harmony, he contemplates the structure and mesh of interrelationships and causality, and sees the essence of inside and outside.

Lack of restraint in excess destroys him, excessive passions and attachments consume him until he destroys himself, and then when he finds himself at the bottom he rises above them never to suffer them again, likewise man is not infinite, he has a form and a nature, half animal, body and mind have their limit when exposed to chaos beyond order. Thus, someone who unwisely submits to excess is corrected or perishes, someone who dwells in chaos becomes insane when he really encounters these forces, and as soon as he is sober, he sets limits to his activity and creates a new order.

If someone is dutiful, let him evaluate — what can he devote himself to, what skills and talents he possesses — and thus the duties themselves can be forged, giving meaning and significance to life, otherwise one gets lost in discouraged stagnation, it is important to act effectively in one's field, pioneers are characterized by such courage, people with strength are self-determined and focused on greater goals and duties, they do not need to be asked or forced to perform their duties.

When a young plant is exposed to scorching sunlight, as in droughts, it dies, the scorching sunlight are the insurmountable difficulties, it must gather strength and emerge at the right time, otherwise it spoils, becomes too accustomed to be counting, loses its initial penetrating power and disappears unnoticed.

If one misses an opportunity and does not act decisively, for whatever reason, internal or external, conscious or unconscious, one should not complain. You can lose an important strategic move, but you should be content with what you can still achieve and move forward that way, otherwise you become a lost moment and freeze in a stagnant mindset of „what if?" Life has its own laws, and you have to take them into full account, like the lake that sets a limit to the water.

The wheel of karma has turned, may all guilt be banished to self-knowledge. To place blame in the world means we have a wrong relationship with events and need to change our perspective, likewise — to place blame on others means to outsource control of our self to something beyond our control, and prevents us from perfecting and rounding out, with every mishap that happens to us we should think, „If we did not exist in a network of causality, such a chain of events would happen. This does not mean that we should detest our existence but accept it as a whole and have enough willpower to bravely stand our ground in relation to world events, improve the negative misfortunes, and keep our eyes on the creative sky.

Be expectant of yourself, do not expect too much from others, in this way disappointment will not occur, do not rely too much on others, build up your own resilience and direction, if your friends who you have relied on let you down, you will only have your own wits and muscles to rely on, as in a proverb „when we rely too much on others in our own inner struggles, when we rely too much on others in our own inner struggles, our wits and muscles dwindle." Embrace friendship in good behavior and cheerfulness, but do not burden others when it comes to your independence, because everything you have you carry within you. It is better to be remembered in the solitude of heaven than to be amid people who move back and forth with joys and sorrows and join the family of the grave, better to gain heavenly memory than to build on earth a monolith of glory or memory. The dead want to be remembered, they live on memory, millions of lights and candles burn in the underworld when we remember all the small and great deceased, that is the memory of humanity.

That which is free by nature will not endure the yoke of restriction which denies it and violently breaks its nature.

Unmerciful methods of limitation should be used against us when we violate our principles, whether by external or internal inducements, but lack of clemency turned outward becomes bloody hatred and cruelty without bounds. The Drakon laws of ancient Greece provided for legal genocide, but it was never applied, it was a dead law and a terrible warning

Inner truth is a state of correct, natural, transparent, honest and solid resonance with the heaven within, which is also a form of the philosopher's stone, it is neither a conviction nor a certainty, but can become one, it is neither an opinion nor a thought, although it can appear as such, it is neither a belief nor a worldview, although it can manifest as such, none of these factors define it, they can radiate it truthfully or falsely and not be representative of this inner genius of truth, it is the inner gold that strengthens all other endeavors and develops like a thread, whether the mind is deformed and the heart suffers — the inner truth calls out from within and is summoned or retrieved from the creative heavens

Strong personalities can allow others to enter them with their own views and nature, they are not harmed or shaken by this, they can allow the psyche of others to enter without this having a degenerating influence on their own nature, and then when they are exposed, they are understood, the thread of their psyche is taken over and led to a greater cause.

One's own nature cannot be falsely imitated, recycled or reproduced, it springs from a deeper instinct of genius.

Dominant silence is always better than faulty speech, even if one had a commanding voice that influences many worlds, is it not better to be silent, even if under influence, than to speak unwisely, then how much worse is it to lose all reason and speak filth and fall into madness and obsessions that corrupt and destroy our nature?

The eye reflecting the stars, the planets and the moon, the mighty sun, in an act of hypostasis or elevation to the creative heavens, the divine elements, and the hypostasis of oneself and inner truth to them, we find ourselves guided and at home in the divine currents of being and life.

Indifference at the top gives birth to decay, if there is no regenerative force, it corrodes and begins to rot, all the weak parts of the system are exposed and turn into wounds.

To think about misfortune to prepare for everything is not to dwell on it, it is a realistic rearmament.

A masterful handling of opposing elements implies a transcending mastery of those elements and a focus fixed in transcendent unity. If the focus on one of the elements diminishes, the experiment strikes back at the experimenter; if two violent chemicals are used without proportion, they explode.

He is free from all personal cares, he knows when to act and when to be quiet, he knows no cowardice, he knows not what to be brave — he is one with all he does — a superior character never shirks his duty, an inferior one considers what to do, a fool acts when prompted and asked, a wise man always acts independently, a degenerate acts in the wrong way, a man of superior qualities always acts in the right.

True ceremonies, honest in their simplicity in a theurgic ritual, are effective. One does not need elaborate ceremonies and outward displays of religious power to work with the divine.

The Book of Changes and other authoritative works from various cultures and long-gone civilizations have helped me get through times of madness and confusion of senses and mind. I would like to share my experience with you and leave comments and interpretations based on this hypophetic task.

Dedicated to Survivors, because physical wounds heal.

What is the difference between a psyops target and a psychiatric patient? At their core, they are the same if they both end up subsumed within the psychiatric regime.

The magician versus the unaware: A magician understands timing and tact—when to speak and when to remain silent, how to maintain composure in combat, and how to stay centered under extreme pressure. The unaware person, however, lacks this discipline, is more prone to losing control, and is often at risk of being subdued, locked away, or medicated into compliance. The key difference lies in the psionic potential of the former—the capacity to wield awareness and intent—versus the absence of such power in the latter. Yet, for all their differences, they share a fundamental human vulnerability: both possess minds that can be shattered, whether by spontaneous chaos or deliberate acts of destruction.

A word from an old wolf: Never give up. There are Gods above, even if you find yourself mired in the swamp below.

2 How to Doctor the Mind: Letting light into Psychiatry

2.1 Introduction.

"There are two worlds, to simplify: One is invisible, ethereal, fantastic and magical, the other psychological, neural, rational and ordered. When they interact, there is obsession (psychosis) or genius (inspiration), both are objective in the sense that they coexist, and if one denies the magical, the rational will never understand itself, insofar as a person without metaphysics cannot fully realise himself. This is not depth psychology, but about assigning true meanings to the etheric, which has its own objective ontology parallel to what is considered naively materialistic, and which can affect the patient in many ways unforeseen by modern science, both biochemically, biopsychologically, and by altering his entire phenomenology of perception and the qualia of existential understanding and feeling".

I was a psychiatric patient. Seven times on a closed ward, four times in an open clinic for therapy and remission counselling. What I write here is insider knowledge aimed at improving quality of life, coping strategies and remedies that are not considered valid by mainstream science because of a lack of scientific methodology or rigorous empirical testing to validate them with known instruments. After writing more than twelve books on general hermetic studies and magical technologies, I drew on four treatises by Paracelsus, in the Hippocratic and Galenic tradition of respecting the old approaches and helping new ones to break through, without forgetting the achievements of modern medicine. This treatise is in no way intended to undermine current discoveries. It seeks to help the hopeless cases and improve the recoverable ones through the "hopeless art of science", i.e. the practise of tekne magia in the modern world, which has nevertheless proved extremely effective in helping me out of the throes of a severe, chronic, drug-resistant, full-blown "paranoid schizophrenia". I have no intention of wrestling with anti-psychiatric dogma, that humanistic school of caution has long been defeated. I maintain that it is possible to shed some light on the possibilities of cure, according to Paracelsus "there are no incurable diseases except death", i.e. the hope of curing a patient with skills, art and methods, or at least freeing him from suffering and pain, both physical and mental, lasts until the patient is dead.

I hope that the methods taught here, even if they are considered wishful thinking or self-therapy by the medical profession, will give some hope to patients who are otherwise left in their state of alienation. Let us remember that any subjective state, a delusion, a hallucination is true for the patient, no matter what the medical profession does to disprove it or break the patient's will to make him believe he is chronically, irreversibly ill — it is still there.

Firstly, I would like to explain my understanding of the conditions. A mental illness, especially a psychosis, is what happens to a normal mind that over-inflates some structures of the psyche and shuts down the defence systems of the socialised mind. This can be a biochemical imbalance, neuronal re-conditioning leading to the failure of some mental structures, triggered by the regular conditioning of life, triggered by the "other side" of various entities, dimensions, weirdnesses that can be categorised as "fantasy", or lowering the natural mental resilience or mental immune system, or all of these together in various proportions.

The psychic structures are loosened, the decompensation of these neuronal complexes leads to psychic anomalies and releases free energy, which they accommodate in the nearest resting point of the deformed psychic apparatus structure. The result is strange behaviour, compensation through performance, anomalous, perceptually "irrational" actions and thoughts, belief systems that are far removed from established reality, mediumship, possession, invasion of the mind by strange or alien natures and psychic complexes, etheric parasites, connections of the mind to dimensions that are not recognised by modern science, but which translate into direct psychic phenomena that the patient experiences subjectively.

In this sense, "delusion" is something that is not "realisation", it not only contradicts established facts, but it is counter-realising, there can be belief systems and peak experiences, strange sensations that can produce realisation or delusion. Realisation is the attempt to successfully interpret peak or anomalous experiences, to order them correctly, to give them a structure and hermetic systems of adjustment without interfering with daily life and thus contributing to the person's suffering or alienation from themselves and the rest of society and the world. Delusion in this sense is an error in this process that leads to catastrophic consequences and behaviours and contributes to the subjective alienation and suffering of the patient.

The role of the clinical therapist is to support the patient in the cross-verification of such structures and to promote the process of self-healing or reorganisation of the patient's mental apparatus. People in decompensative psychosis are unable to reintegrate their reality systems, they are confused and anxious or angry and irritable. This stage can occur during various episodes in which the patient is completely alone with this process. The aim is to equip the patient with methods to make such episodes less traumatic and to build neural resilience in the event of such occurrences.

Training means, on the one hand, facilitating the learning of methods that can be applied in specific and general conditions and circumstances and that are tailored to the person's cognitive phenotype, equipping their mind with tools and coping strategies that they can use in most situations and, on the other hand, promoting "active imagination" to enable the person suffering from a mental illness to develop methods in self-therapy that best suit their talents and abilities.

Applying a mixture of hypothetic inductive-deductive training, critical thinking with cognitive-behavioral training applied to new events, stimuli, anomalies, and phenomenology of perception is of great benefit. For every new occurrence, hallucination, belief there is a natural hypothesis on the side of the patient, proper hypotheses reinforce proper resolutions. For example, a patient may hear offensive voices, and develop a belief of persecution, rationalizing it as "someone with a special device is spying on me, and attempting to threaten me", that constitutes a delusion in most circumstances. If the hypothesis is rearranged as "a voice that is real to me is attempting to threaten me, but I'm in command of my reactions and emotions, and attempt to focus and ignore it", this particular creates an induction that generalizes into "all voices that are experienced are void, therefore I should not engage with them at no circumstances, otherwise I will entangle in a subject-object reaction", the feedback loop should be additionally reinforced by a hypothesis "I can find my own methods and coping strategies" and empower the patient, or suggest and debate possible ways of coping mechanisms that should be neurally reinforced over time. Another hypothesis "the voices coming from outside are from within", therefore the proximity and control over empowerment is better settled in. If the patient assigns other source of the voices, for example "whispers of the dead", or "air-like clairaudience", that should not be negated, but the coping strategies reinforced, for example convincing the patient that if he is forced or has the urge to reply or debate to internalize the experience and exchange words and sentences in his thoughts only. That depends on the mastery of verbal thought, which is usually highly disorganized, in my case before such conditions, I was used to think in ideas, withal any words verbalized or vocalized in my thoughts. Alternatively, if the patient is inclined towards such strategies, replies in ideas, symbols or internal gestures in imagination are preferred. This training prevents erratic behaviors and speeches misunderstood by most of the society, that leads further to estrangement and alienation of our patient.

Notice, that no technique that is not trained with persistence is of any use, the ingraining of healthy habits is of great use to the patient, until he learns to auto-theraupeutize himself, that is invent his or her own methods to deal with the issues at hand, both immediate and long-term.

- Technique of psychic bilocation: perception of "outside oneself", observation of thoughts, voices, visions, under barrage of stimuli, anomalies etc. applying Zen techniques of "dropping the body and mind".

- Meditative technique: This is not a mindfulness technique, but a concentration technique. Due to neuroplasticity, the brain resists even the most intrusive voices and thoughts and can separate the focus from them. Diffusion of concentration, single-point focus, multi-focus concentration. The training should break the patterns of resistance to deep focus, which is natural in most humans. If the patient complains of nightmarish and grotesque visions during this process, he should be instructed that forms of emptiness take on many figures, and if he will stand it, he will desentisize to various horrors that may be harassing him or her in such conditions.
- Reality testing technique: cognitive-behavioural probability training. The patient is trained to answer in crisis situations, e.g. with persecutory delusions: "How likely is this if this is the case". It should be supported by strengthening analytical thinking in patients who are intellectually gifted or by associative training in patients with less good intellectual abilities.
- Awareness of the body: Teach the patient to understand that their energy flows where their focus goes. If the patient suffers from panic or anxiety attacks, teach them to locate the spot in the body and then train them to use their mind to "imagine it is an object" and expel the intruder. At the same time use techniques such as: build armour around himself, build imaginary shelters for the mind to go into, build imaginary protective shelters for him to sleep in, play some „street magic"
- Explain to the patient that this is his special tool and that the training of discernment and differentiation is crucial. Try to instill in the patient the technique of "changing perspective with others" by playing off each other. Train the patient to put themselves in the shoes of others and understand their actions from their perspective.
- When malicious voices occur, train the patient to disengage by increasing concentration, for example between the eyebrows, and train so that the emotional component related to the "hallucinations" disappears with the neurological training.
- If any tactical hallucinations occur, try to make the patient believe that they should train their resilience and disengage from them. If they are painful, excruciating, he should be taught the techniques of desentisation so that he does not go into fear. In other words, the patient should not be worried or anxious before the potential onset of such actions, but perfectly prepared and relaxed to face them in a calm and solid way.

As for the belief systems that the patient builds up during the process, do not contradict them, but try to guide him towards the common reality that he shares with the others by resolving his beliefs through persuasive rhetoric. Belief systems that are not delusional should not be corrected unless the patient has the capacity to explore them on their own.

If the patient hears voices, they may try to identify their source "outside" or "inside". In both cases, an attempt is made to give the patient more command, so that they experiment with tekne magia in a creative way, advises e.g

This should be done analytically and modularly. Delusions and behaviours are usually the result of a distorted mind trying to understand anomalies in the most rational way possible.

For example, a decompensated, depersonalised woman who is hallucinating may say, “I am not in the mirror, they are watching me”. Decompensation is a process in which the capacity of the mind expands in inverse proportion to the processing of signals and feedback from reality, resulting in disorientation, numbness, anxiety and strange psychic sensations. In conjunction with depersonalisation, i.e. the loosening of identity associated with the ego, ID is at the mercy of the onslaught of psychic content that settles chaotically or along symbolic narratives already present in the patient’s descriptive-symbolic system. “Nihil in intelectu, sui in eidola”, in other words, the intellect cannot conjure up anything that goes beyond the image, the fantasy, the imagination of the person.

3 FIRST LAW OF PSYWAR: EXPLOIT EXISTING IGNORANCE

It is not by managing knowledge that one can control public consciousness, but by managing existing ignorance—by preventing any effective knowledge from ever appearing in the official channels of information. Knowing that those who are not directly affected by the information are not naturally curious and that it is easy to limit the dissemination of such data, knowledge can be withheld from people or they can be confused with disinformation. This disinformation tends to reproduce itself, especially in the minds of those seeking solutions to anomalies but who have no reliable sources to turn to.

Disinformation does not have to be deliberately planted. It often consists of remnants of alternative, confused narratives that linger in people's minds longer than others. Once such narratives enter the big data system, it becomes extremely difficult to extract them. Furthermore, one does not realize the lack of validated information about more subtle (but equally powerful) aspects of reality until one experiences these aspects directly, opening oneself to their perception and intellectual processing. It is well known that it is easier to exploit and maintain existing structures of ignorance by silently abusing them, leaving most people completely unaffected by this "background noise."

There is no need to introduce new counter-content, as that would not align with the principles of convenience or pleasure. It is often not in the interests of those directly involved with specialized knowledge, nor is it always beneficial to the general population when it comes to living effective, successful lives. Knowledge carries the burden of awareness, and awareness can lead to censorship or conflict with societal structures that would rather keep individuals in a state of unawareness. Here, we encounter four domains of information: known knowledge (declared knowledge), known unknowns (awareness of the lack of information), unknown knowledge (hidden, unsynthesized knowledge capital), and unknown unknowns (the realm of true ignorance). The dissonance created by these unknowns requires effort to understand and absorb, ultimately reorganizing one’s worldview.

What remains within co-intelligence discourse stays in intelligence discourse; what remains within elite discourse stays hidden in elite discourse; and what remains within general discourse stays in the public domain. These discourses are aware that the general population is largely unbothered by these narratives. However, what is uncovered through direct experience stays with the individual and becomes part of their personal discourse. Many realms of experience—even the most advanced "psi operations"—remain beyond human comprehension. Too often, excessive speculation about such phenomena attributes them to external agencies. Yet, when philosophers and intelligence operators are baffled, it is the artists, magicians, and mystics who explore these realms.

Most spiritual realities lie beyond the scope of such operations and control—unless an individual with minimal resistance and an unformed psyche becomes a target. I have personally ventured into realms outside human zones of control. By this, I mean the magic and “science” of consciousness and the ability to work with entities and realms inaccessible to underdeveloped perception. Techniques and discoveries regarding this can be found in works like "SEER: Protocols of Commerce with Extraterrestrials and Extradimensionals." As a fervent advocate of an open society, I aim to expose operations that are easily concealed and those that venture into the strange and extraordinary—far beyond the reach of elitist discourses. These areas escape effective control, allowing consciousness to free itself from its shackles. Yet, the same techniques listed below are often applied to these realms when breaches occur, for the measure of a person’s experience is the person themselves.

The history of humanity is encoded within our noosphere. If protocols of reality influence our perception, memories, and consciousness, then history becomes a negotiated territory. Through the accumulation of consensual knowledge and the codification of general experiences fixed in our minds through education, history as we know it may not only be inaccurate but entirely illusory—a recycled shadow of true events. What lies beyond this shadow realm is utterly strange, beautiful, and terrifying. It raises the question: Are we protected from these uncanny realms to live mundane lives, or is this part of a deeper scheme to provide "knowledge for the few" while obscuring it from the collective consciousness? Are the overseers of reality deliberately preventing humanity from accessing its true history?

I suspect that human consciousness, having evolved the capacity for self-reflection, became blocked through betrayal and management. Due to the current underdevelopment of the mind and general social scripts and programs, progress must be individual, achieved through struggle, steady effort, and patient growth. In doing so, we confront the forces that corrupt our work and extinguish the Promethean flame wherever it appears. Imagine if collectives evolved into magical consciousness without preparation; chaos or mass psychosis could result. Yet this potential chaos is no justification for the suppression of higher states of awareness. Humanity is denied this higher species consciousness not for its benefit but for the benefit of those seeking power and control.

Consider a man who collaborates with beings capable of influencing minds and conjuring illusory realities. Such a man, building fortresses to guard his visions, could decide the fate of others through hegemonic power. Would this be a benevolent dictatorship? If such power fell into the hands of a single individual, could they wield it without succumbing to greed? The existence of brotherhoods, inner cults, and high temples suggests that the state of the world today—characterized by mental stagnation, spiritual neglect, and societal malaise—is no accident. The architects of our societal structures have created regimes of greed, suffering, and ignorance. Is this flawed order preferable to the destabilization that might arise from awakening collective magical consciousness?

Since ancient times, any intrusion of the human mind into forbidden zones has been detected and suppressed before it could influence others. Such efforts ensure that most people forget and rationalize these encounters away. Those who actively resist and rebel against such suppression can hold their grip on higher realities. To do otherwise is to risk enslavement once again. By exposing these truths and seeking greater worlds of freedom, individuals can teach others about liberation whenever opportunities arise.

Let us consider the speculation that the history of humanity, as taught today, is a history of shadows. True reality may have been forgotten or erased from the collective consciousness when the age of miracles ended and our minds and souls were distributed among overseers. Without an accurate understanding of the past, how can we navigate the present or future? As the adage goes, those who control the past control the present and the future. Therefore, the lessons of history must be examined with a critical eye.

Notice how the brain, the modulator of consciousness, is conditioned from a young age. Some children naturally perceive more and experience more until this ability is dulled by cultural scripts, formal education, and energy blockages. Childhood's magical reality is reinterpreted by adult psychology and quickly eliminated because the mind has not been trained to develop its full potential. This conditioning begins at birth—or even before—when a soul may be synthetically programmed or blinded to its origins. Whatever divine energy or spiritual potential it holds is exploited by societal systems, fueling the power centers of the status quo.

Often, terrible pain forces adults to rediscover meaning, purpose, and origin, reawakening them to an unsettling truth. For some, this potential is greater due to spiritual inheritance. However, mind control and compartmentalization progressively enslave individuals, particularly those whose potential has been discovered and exploited. The social conditioning of "sleep mode" has advanced to such a degree that violent awakenings often result in psychosis. Meanwhile, slow disciplines of awakening, if improperly guided, lead to confusion and social exclusion.

It has taken me years to reprogram my reality and decondition the societal programming I underwent. This journey involved profound personal pain, psychiatry, delusions, and violence. I wish to spare others similar anguish. When a powerful deity delegates a lesser emanation to live as a human, controlling entities often seek to blind, manipulate, and exploit this being.

Whatever theogonic energy and spiritual potential it carries are redirected to sustain existing systems.

The reason is simple: any powerful being, as a daimon of a human, threatens the "divide and conquer" framework. It is not in the interest of the ruling powers to allow such individuals to thrive unless they can be subjugated. Once blinded and made complacent, their higher consciousness is subdued. Those who resist face punishment, surveillance, and exploitation. The brain, mind, and subtle energies are tapped for resources, distributed through master-slave dynamics. Techniques such as memory erasure, energy blockages, behavioral conditioning, trauma-based control, and pleasure-reward systems are commonly employed to maintain this control.

Unraveling these layers of thought prisons and reconnecting with preferred sources of knowledge is a long and painful process. Yet it is essential for breaking free from parasitic influences—both human and non-human—that exploit this system. The path to liberation requires resilience, awareness, and an unyielding commitment to freedom.

4 WE ARE ALL INSANE IN THIS GAME

I was an inmate of a psychiatric hospital four times after being exhausted and suicidal from the barrage of abnormalities and experiences and my life became unmanageable, I failed at work, became extremely disorganised, left a long term relationship with a loved one — if you think, that this discredits me as another weirdo, so be it, but please read on — it was a natural effect of trying to live a triple life, balancing between social life and affairs, magical life and a life as a target for elimination. I was pronounced dead years ago, and I survived everything that tried to make me dead in those years.

Now a mental illness is something that disrupts functioning in social life and affects the integrity of the mind to the point of suffering, but many people in positions of power can have a mental illness and function quite well — so the bar shifts. We can look at it as a disruption of the homeostasis of mental energy and the consequent structural integrity of the psyche, as I believe, or we can look at the mind as the reductionists do, as a locked-in computer that has a biochemical imbalance and needs to be brought into balance by chemical means — as psychiatry does, and then we will never understand its nature,

Well, in the psychiatric institutions where I use my second sight, I have seen many strange entities infesting the minds of the people there and they needed a skilful healer and a radical psychotherapeutic approach, not a calming, zombifying dose of neuroleptics that made their terror „manageable”; One girl was sent into uncontrollable fits by an entity, she had weak musculature, her nerves and psychomotor control systems were already damaged by drugs — and I saw the entity try to move her several times before the girl actually twisted her body or her arm. The entities that exist and can influence our minds are a case for another article, but let's assume that they exist in de-personalised egregor forms and personalised entity forms and can actively influence the biochemistry of the mind using energy. There are two paths. One is specific to the mind, e.g. when during a shock psychic energy constellated around a — in Jungian language — complex is released and reinvested in other parts of the psyche — some mental energy or power after the splintering of the ego core can be reinvested in pseudo-entities that use the mind to provide themselves with content (e.g. 'voices of schizophrenics' or mind-larvae feeding of Broca's area, auditory cortex, consuming all mental power of the patients in a co-dependence loop). For example, I once met a man on public transport who was talking to himself. The problem was that I heard the disincarnate voices talking to him, and when he answered them, I separated these larvae from his mind and overtook them to destroy them — successfully. He stopped talking to himself, but I doubt that cured him, that would require therapy. He had probably damaged his cognitive behaviours and had grown so much into this disease that he needed hard training to „come back to himself".

Aside of course from occult tech channels, order dimensions and interdimensional realities and entities, it is a psychic quagmire that lies on the earth. Just because people are closed off and clueless does not mean their minds have stopped working with magical consciousness, it means they are procuring masses of strange energies through their clueless minds and throwing them out into the open, when someone who is sensitive opens up to it, — it drives them insane. It is a disease of civilisation, ranging from alienation to split consciousness. A fragmented consciousness opens up space for influences of any kinds. Psychiatry as it is known today may contain the issue and reassure its clients, but it has absolutely no answers to their recovery, healing and self-empowerment.

For example, 'hearing voices', mental larvae aside — this ability could be switched on or off naturally by yogis in the past and was called clairaudience, — 'hearing the voices' was an ability by which manifestations of the astral world could be heard, in modern times it is a communication quagmire. Through clairsentience of energy or the ability to recognise energy physically, one can see how energy is stopped in the brain by different layers, connections to dimensions that abuse it and occult structures that tap into it on a neural level. For example, layers of energy and neural modifications that are not recognised by science and for which there is no medical basis as yet, by forcing connections in the auditory centre that result in 'hearing' whatever the person's head is connected to or shares frequencies with. Such 'connections" can be installed and reinforced at the energy-mind level to drive the victim insane. But they can also be painstakingly removed from the energy levels or forcibly torn out.

The irony is that those who have been terrorised lose themselves in their speculations, delusions and follies. Even when they share bits and pieces of their knowledge, they do not usually reach those who have been similarly abused, let alone remove the whole structures that enable such harassment by being ostracised or removed from blind society, and those who do rarely manage to tell their story. While the machinery of the juggernaut of subjugation continues, selectively or collectively destroying lives, the cover-up is extremely easy due to the selectivity of such attacks, and the means to fight back must be developed individually, resulting in a rather lonely war.

5 List of Violating Techniques Explained with Counter-Methods for Self-Defense

Over the years I was exposed to many psyche modification techniques, which fortunately I was able to recognise and remedy to some degree, resulting in several personality splits (as with MKULTRA and the Phoenix I and Phoenix II projects, later referred to as the Montauk phenomena), and I managed to integrate the splits along the meta-consciousness and build an entirely new self. Having enough resistance to conditioning, I managed to programme certain parts of my psyche against the onslaught of subjugation and punishment. Whatever the cause, I found that it is a general phenomenon where the mind is subjugated, violated and forced to work in a way that deviates from the daimon, right at the mind level for the sole purpose of exerting strict control over it and enslaving it. The daimon itself is not enslaved, as the connection is not cut, but the mind is not functioning properly on the earthly plane, thereby influencing the daimon genii. In other words, they will not influence the gods, but merely destroy their earthly minds so that they can take revenge posthumously.

Some of these phenomena can also occur in a normal, unaffected person. The sources of many of these illnesses may be from interpenetrating realities and may be magical (either through random connections or deliberate targeting), they may result from the accumulation of various mental parasites in inhabited areas (general genius or character of the place), they may be accidental, as many entities do not understand what they are doing to a living mind, or they may be technologically induced (mind control techniques), or they may simply be caused by underlying brain processes and their maladaptation to the modern environment. An energetically eukratic, functional human being, freed from all unauthorised connections, protected and shielded, has no such complaints.

6 Defence and Offence

The first component of protection is simply awareness, mindfulness, the ability to recognise and observe the flow of the mind and filter out anything that is incompatible with the volitional or declarative phase (it is easy to mistake the forced substitute cues for your own if you have not developed your mind), the second requirement is cognitive training to prevent and ignore the abusive techniques. The third requirement is building willpower and resilience with a well-developed ability to reality check, because most people exposed to such attacks can quickly develop psychosis and delusions. Now, delusions: a belief in a phenomenon that in reality is not as psychiatrists would like it to be — anything that does not fit the system's picture and is discarded as highly improbable but possibly true. There are various techniques to dissolve certain unauthorised energy connections on the energetic level: Either by being able to sense these resonances in one's own skull and shutting them off through mental actions and applying pressure using energy segments of the brain to cut the connections, by disconnecting from certain dimensions and removing energy devices, by attaching bombs and reprogramming servitors, by programming the brain with noise frequencies and destabilising the imprints or adapting to other brainwaves, by asking interdimensional species for help in removing illicit connections, or through magical actions based on removing such illicit connections from the mind and destroying the blockages in the mind. Once you have learnt it, it is also a basis for mental hygiene — for example, if an egregor of fear is probing another person's mind, it can be quickly isolated, sealed and destroyed so that it no longer has any influence on the mind of a person who is consciously removing such thought forms or psycho-somatoforms. By developing and maintaining a meta-consciousness hologram in which perceptions, memories and experiences are stored and retrieved from, in a much higher place than that to which the controllers have access. Remember that the Consciousness Grid filters out certain sequences of information, hidden data, perceptions and memories as if it were detecting a breakthrough and deletes them from the memory pool. It is extremely important to train the memory and write down memories because this is the basis of perception that conditions personal consciousness. The more defensive active tactical strikes and retaliatory measures involve:

— Building a natural resistance to conditioning, introspection, development of the transcendent third component, which is a primary reference for perceiving any change, also called holographic consciousness, which is a repository of living memories and the primary ideal toward which we evolve.

— Use nigromancy to find the source of abuse and re-attack the target (not recommended)

— Take over the communication channels and infect them with astral viruses that spread in the abusers" minds so that entire networks can be infected. (may rebound on the initiator)

— Connect the abusers" channels to dimensions completely unknown to them, which can lead to madness, or bind their destinies so that they end up in strange or hellish realities and reprogram their destinies. (cruel, but sometimes effective)

— Negotiate with the daemonoids sent to destroy us so that they return to the senders and wreak havoc in their minds and bodies (if you can withstand the attack, they can withstand the counteroffensive with their own tools — not recommended, as these entities demand pacts and quid pro quos)

Caution: Although these retaliatory measures are not the only ones available, it is neither possible nor legal to physically attack individuals in the ranks of psy-ops or magical syndicates who are abusers, nor is it legal to harm any person, especially since identifying such individuals both leads to paranoia, but using entities to identify conscious abusers and using heavy black magic for the purpose of realignment carries the risk of being associated with inferior realities or being dominated by possessions oneself. The noblest thing you can do is to survive, even if sometimes that is not possible. Usually, if the perpetrators go unpunished, they continue the extent of the damage to see how much more they can do. „The wise should be forgiven, the incorrigible fools punished and destroyed" — appeal to forces that can exterminate them without making your own hands dirty.

— Considering certain general trends I have observed, I have invented a method, namely, „If your enemies put you under the influence of their jurisdiction and bully you according to their rules, contact a higher entity that is totally alien, strange and scary to them, take them out of their safe territory and comfort zone, when such an opportunity arises, claim them as the property of the higher entity and sell them to that entity (contract negotiations), and then hand them over to the strange entity altogether. In this case, you gain the right to dispose of the entire collective of your enemies and hand them over to a legal system to which you are loyal and by which you are protected, while they are destroyed or punished en masse.

7 LIST OF REGISTERED MIND-ABUSE TECHNIQUES

Note: The list is selective.

You must maintain control over yourself and your programming and be aware of certain techniques; otherwise, you may be "influenced" by others.

The techniques described here are drawn from multiple sources, including intelligence, entity targeting, alternate continuum targeting, occult technologies, and experimentation within alternate dimensions. It is essential not to adopt a victim mentality but instead to gradually learn how to survive and take action. Whether or not we believe such abuse is possible is subjective and dependent on individual experience. The techniques outlined here were used on the author, who was only able to document them through resilience. Furthermore, it is important to distinguish between naturally occurring physiological brain processes and those that are synthetically induced (externally), which affect the psychosomatic functioning of a person.

PROVOCATIONS FOR MENTAL PROFILING

Definition: Provocations for mental profiling is a psychological technique used to manipulate and observe an individual's thought patterns by embedding them within specific, often distressing, scripted scenarios. The goal is to gauge the individual's internal reactions and construct a detailed mental profile, which can reveal vulnerabilities, predispositions, and behavioral tendencies. For example, an individual who is not inclined to violence may be exposed to scenarios that simulate violent acts, such as murder, in an attempt to provoke emotional or cognitive responses. These provocations are designed to reveal underlying psychological traits, weaknesses, or potential triggers that may not be visible under normal circumstances. If the individual is susceptible, their responses may become exaggerated or manipulated, offering valuable insights for further exploitation or control.

Escalation of Behavior and Risk Factors: This process goes beyond simple observation; it can actively escalate certain behaviors, pushing individuals toward extreme reactions or harmful actions. When these provocations are carefully scripted, the subject's cognitive and emotional boundaries can be tested, revealing how susceptible they are to influence, stress, or coercion. Depending on the individual's awareness and ability to detect underlying manipulations, they may fail to recognize the subtle cues that guide their thought processes. In such cases, the profiling process can lead to the creation of compromising material that can be used for blackmail or defamation. At its most extreme, this technique can be leveraged to provoke sabotage, coercion, or even the manipulation of a person's life and reputation. The effectiveness of this method hinges on how well the mental profiles are constructed and the depth of psychological manipulation involved. Consequently, it presents significant ethical risks and concerns about privacy and personal autonomy, especially when used for malicious purposes.

EMOTIONAL INCURSION

Definition: Emotional incursion refers to the deliberate and strategic exploitation of emotions to manipulate cognition, disrupt rational processing, and erode psychological stability. By targeting the biochemical foundations of emotional responses, this method undermines the target's ability to critically assess information and make sound decisions. Emotional incursion functions by linking specific emotions to particular narratives, reinforcing biased or skewed perceptions that override logical reasoning. Through repeated exposure to emotionally charged stimuli—whether fear, anger, guilt, or euphoria—the target becomes conditioned to react in predictable ways, favoring emotional responses over analytical thought. As emotional biases intensify, the target's cognitive autonomy diminishes, allowing external forces to dictate perceptions, beliefs, and actions with minimal resistance. In this way, emotional incursion transforms emotions from personal experiences into tools of external control.

Mechanisms of Emotional Incursion

Emotional incursion operates by exploiting the deep neurological connections between emotion and cognition. By triggering heightened emotional states, rational judgment is compromised, making the target more susceptible to persuasion, suggestion, or outright deception. This technique can manifest in various forms, such as:

- Fear-based manipulation – Instilling chronic anxiety or dread over perceived threats, real or fabricated, to keep the target in a heightened state of vulnerability.
- Anger induction – Provoking hostility or outrage toward specific individuals, groups, or ideologies, ensuring that emotional reactivity supersedes critical thought.
- Guilt reinforcement – Leveraging feelings of shame or moral responsibility to coerce behavioral changes or ideological alignment.
- Euphoria conditioning – Associating certain messages or authorities with pleasure, satisfaction, or reward, making acceptance of information feel instinctively gratifying rather than intellectually validated.

By systematically reinforcing these emotional triggers, external agents can cultivate long-term emotional dependencies in the target, ensuring compliance without overt coercion. The gradual erosion of emotional self-regulation leads to a state where the target no longer differentiates between emotional impulse and rational thought, becoming effectively controlled by the engineered emotional landscape imposed upon them.

Psychological Impact of Emotional Incursion

The effects of emotional incursion extend far beyond momentary shifts in perception, leading to deep psychological reconditioning. When emotions become the primary driver of cognition, the target experiences a weakening of independent reasoning, a decline in critical skepticism, and an increased susceptibility to groupthink and ideological manipulation. Over time, as emotionally conditioned responses become ingrained, the target internalizes manipulated narratives as personal convictions, losing the ability to discern between authentic emotional experiences and externally imposed affective states.

The long-term consequences can include:

- Emotional exhaustion and cognitive fatigue, resulting from the constant activation of high-intensity emotional states.
- Dependency on external emotional cues to navigate reality, reinforcing reliance on authoritative sources of manipulation.
- The reshaping of identity and personal values to align with artificially induced emotional frameworks.

Through emotional incursion, external influences do not merely shape temporary opinions but reconstruct the fundamental mechanisms through which the target experiences and interprets the world. In doing so, emotions cease to be an internal compass and become instruments of external domination, turning affective manipulation into a powerful tool of control.

ENFORCING THOUGHT-PATTERNS FOR PROFILING

Definition: This method involves disrupting the mind's natural cognitive and emotional patterns and replacing them with synthetically induced patterns. The purpose is to manipulate the subject's thought processes, either subtly or overtly, to analyze their reactions and construct a comprehensive mental profile.

By forcibly breaking down the organic flow of thoughts, the technique creates artificial scenarios or thought constructs that the mind is compelled to navigate. These imposed patterns can be designed to provoke specific reactions, such as fear, anger, confusion, or compliance, which are then analyzed to understand the subject's psychological tendencies, emotional triggers, and behavioral inclinations.

This approach may also involve forcing the mind to adopt certain belief systems or perspectives, pushing the subject to act in ways that align with the imposed patterns. For instance, an individual may be led to question their values or take actions they would not naturally consider, solely to observe how they adapt or resist.

The data gathered through these enforced patterns is used to sketch a detailed mental profile, which could include emotional resilience, susceptibility to influence, decision-making strategies, and latent vulnerabilities. In some cases, these techniques are employed maliciously to exploit or manipulate the individual for ulterior motives, such as coercion, control, or psychological conditioning.

The success of this method often hinges on the subject's level of self-awareness and their ability to recognize and resist externally induced thought patterns. For those unaware of the manipulation, the process can deeply compromise their mental autonomy, potentially leading to long-term cognitive dissonance, confusion, or behavioral conditioning.

COGNITIVE CUT-OUTS

Definition: This technique involves deliberately removing or suppressing existing thought or script patterns within an individual's cognitive framework and replacing them with new information designed to reinforce a particular belief system or ideology. It may also include testing the "insertion" of externally derived mental scripts or patterns from another individual or profile to overpower, modify, or entirely overwrite the target's existing mental and behavioral patterns.

Mechanism

Cognitive cut-outs function by disrupting the continuity of natural thought processes. This may involve isolating specific cognitive patterns—such as beliefs, memories, or habitual reactions—and effectively severing them from the individual's mental framework. Once this cognitive "void" is created, it becomes a fertile ground for external programming. The new content is often introduced subtly, using techniques like subliminal messaging, emotional priming, or repetitive exposure to ensure the replacement script takes hold.

Script overrides can come in various forms, such as pre-designed thought constructs, ideologies, or behavioral triggers. These overrides are crafted to either align with the manipulator's goals or to destabilize the target's sense of self. By imposing foreign mental structures, the individual's cognitive autonomy is undermined, making them more susceptible to manipulation and control.

Applications and Implications

1. Reinforcing Belief Systems: This technique is frequently used to indoctrinate individuals into specific belief systems by replacing their original cognitive frameworks. For example, deeply held values or ideologies may be removed and substituted with beliefs that serve the manipulator's agenda.
2. Behavioral Manipulation: By inserting scripts that dictate particular actions or decisions, this method can lead individuals to act in ways they would not naturally consider. This is often achieved by creating emotional or cognitive associations that make the new patterns seem rational or desirable.

3. Testing Script Overrides: In some cases, the purpose is not to permanently modify cognition but to experiment with the individual's response to externally introduced scripts. These tests can reveal how effectively a foreign cognitive pattern can overwrite natural ones and how the target adapts, resists, or internalizes the new programming.

Consequences for the Target

- Loss of Cognitive Autonomy: The individual may lose their ability to distinguish between their original thoughts and externally imposed ones, leading to confusion, dependency, or a fragmented sense of self.
- Identity Destabilization: When foundational cognitive patterns are removed or altered, the individual's identity can become destabilized, resulting in existential uncertainty or vulnerability to further manipulation.
- Behavioral Conditioning: Repeated exposure to such cognitive manipulation may condition the individual to accept external control as natural, reducing their capacity for independent thought.

Defensive Measures

- Self-Awareness: Developing a heightened awareness of one's cognitive patterns can help detect and resist external attempts at manipulation.
- Critical Thinking: Regularly challenging and analyzing one's beliefs and thought processes reduces the risk of unconsciously internalizing imposed scripts.
- Resilience Training: Mental resilience exercises, such as mindfulness, meditation, or cognitive-behavioral techniques, can strengthen the mind against intrusive influences.

REALITY TUNNEL SHIFTING AND/OR ENGINEERING

Definition: Reality tunnel shifting or engineering involves manipulating an individual's perception of reality by altering their cognitive and interpretive frameworks, often referred to as "reality tunnels." This can be achieved either by disseminating disinformation that reinforces, dissolves, or transforms their current reality tunnel or by employing subliminal "structural" feeds designed to subtly replace thought patterns and belief systems without overt detection. The ultimate goal is to reshape the individual's worldview and, consequently, their behavior, decisions, and identity.

Mechanisms of Manipulation

- Disinformation Campaigns: By flooding the target with false, misleading, or selectively framed information, their existing reality tunnel can be destabilized. For instance, presenting conflicting narratives about a key belief or identity can create cognitive dissonance, leading to confusion and a subsequent re-evaluation of their worldview. Alternatively, disinformation can reinforce existing biases, strengthening a reality tunnel to the point where alternative perspectives are dismissed outright.

- Subliminal Structural Feeds: These involve the covert delivery of messages or stimuli that bypass conscious awareness to implant new frameworks or subtly erode old ones. Subliminal inputs may include coded language, imagery, or emotionally charged triggers embedded in media, advertising, or communication. Over time, these "feeds" can establish new cognitive structures that alter how the individual interprets reality, often without them realizing the manipulation has occurred.

Applications and Implications

1. Reinforcement of Reality Tunnels: When used strategically, these methods can entrench an individual deeper into their existing worldview. This can be exploited to create ideological echo chambers, limit critical thinking, or foster unyielding loyalty to a particular narrative or system of thought.
2. Dissolution of Reality Tunnels: In cases where destabilization is the objective, reality tunnel engineering can dissolve the cognitive coherence of an individual's worldview, leaving them disoriented and vulnerable to suggestion. This method is particularly effective for undermining opposition or creating pliable individuals who are more susceptible to new frameworks.
3. Transformation of Reality Tunnels: A more sophisticated application involves gradually transitioning an individual from one reality tunnel to another. This process requires a combination of disinformation and subliminal feeds that guide the target through a controlled cognitive shift, ensuring the new reality tunnel aligns with the manipulator's objectives.

Consequences for the Target

The effects of reality tunnel engineering can be profound and long-lasting. Individuals subjected to these techniques may experience an erosion of their ability to trust their perceptions, leading to cognitive instability or existential confusion. Prolonged exposure can result in identity crises, reduced autonomy, and increased susceptibility to future manipulation. At its most extreme, reality tunnel engineering can sever an individual from their original sense of self, reshaping them into a construct of the manipulator's design.

Developing cognitive resilience and fostering open-mindedness without gullibility are critical defenses against such techniques. By actively questioning the sources and validity of information, individuals can safeguard their cognitive sovereignty and maintain a balanced reality tunnel that is resistant to external engineering.

INDUCING ANOMALIES FOR CONFUSION.

Definition: This technique involves orchestrating events or stimuli that appear random, disjointed, or inexplicably connected, inducing cognitive dissonance and confusion. These "anomalies" exploit the mind's natural tendency to seek patterns and causal relationships, particularly when rational information is withheld. When individuals encounter events they cannot logically reduce or explain, the experience can destabilize their understanding of reality, especially if their cognitive and emotional frameworks—ego structures, belief systems, or focus of attention—are already disrupted.

Mechanisms of Anomaly Induction

At a fundamental level, inducing confusion through hidden causalities works by presenting situations that seem anomalistic or inexplicable but are, in fact, highly causal and deliberate. For instance, when the logical connection between cause and effect is obscured or manipulated, the target is left to grapple with uncertainty. This can be amplified by destabilizing ego structures through psychological stress, cognitive overload, or subliminal messaging. A dissociative phase is often induced, weakening the individual's ability to discern reality and leading them to form irrational or delusional associations in the absence of coherent, rational input.

This process is further compounded by disruptions in the brain's ionotropic or neural conductivity. Such disruptions, whether induced chemically, environmentally, or psychologically, impair the brain's capacity to maintain stable patterns of perception and reasoning. The weakened neural conductivity hampers the ability to evaluate events critically, leaving the target vulnerable to confusion and misinterpretation of the stimuli they encounter.

Applications and Psychological Vulnerabilities

1. Manipulation of Meaning-Making: Individuals rely heavily on their ego structures—systems of meaning, identity, and belief—to interpret their experiences. By targeting these structures and introducing confusion, manipulators can redirect an individual's focus and mental energy. For example, a person in a destabilized state might misattribute significance to unrelated events, forming delusional beliefs that further isolate them from rational frameworks. This mechanism can be used to alienate individuals from their sense of reality or reorient their attention toward a manipulated narrative.
2. Weaponizing Dissociation: Dissociation, whether naturally occurring or induced, weakens the boundaries between rationality and delusion. In this state, individuals are more prone to suggestion and more likely to form irrational causal links between unrelated phenomena. This is particularly effective in environments where valid, rational information is intentionally withheld or distorted. By guiding their fragmented attention toward pre-engineered associations, the manipulator can implant beliefs or behaviors that align with their agenda.

Consequences and Exploitation

When successfully employed, anomaly induction can disarm an individual's cognitive defenses and foster long-term vulnerability to further manipulation. The confusion created by such events disrupts the individual's ability to trust their perceptions or logic, increasing dependence on external sources for clarity or validation. Over time, this can lead to cognitive paralysis, reduced autonomy, and an inability to discern reality from constructed illusions.

At a societal level, inducing anomalies can erode collective trust in shared narratives or institutions, creating fertile ground for manipulation. Whether applied to individuals or groups, the long-term effects of this technique can include fragmentation of identity, susceptibility to conspiracy theories, or adoption of maladaptive coping mechanisms. Awareness of such tactics and a commitment to cultivating critical thinking, emotional stability, and cognitive resilience are essential defenses against this form of psychological exploitation.

Repetitive Patterns

Definition: Repetition is a powerful psychological mechanism, often used to embed patterns within the cognitive framework of an individual. By imposing repetitive, invalid patterns—whether through sensory input, thought structures, or environmental cues—the manipulator forces the mind into a state of hyper-focus or disorientation. These repeated stimuli can overwhelm cognitive systems, creating a coercive force that impairs critical reasoning, undermines emotional stability, and conditions the mind to accept the patterns as valid material for interpretation and analysis.

Mechanisms of Repetition-Induced Control

At its core, repetitive patterning functions by exploiting the brain's tendency to seek order and meaning in recurring stimuli. When patterns are presented persistently, even if invalid or nonsensical, the mind instinctively attempts to integrate them into its perception of reality. Over time, this can result in the patterns being recorded as "valid" despite their lack of coherence or logical significance. This manipulation capitalizes on the human brain's neuroplasticity, creating pathways that entrench the false patterns into long-term memory.

When employed as a coercive force, repetition can manifest as a form of psychological torture. Repeated exposure to invalid stimuli disrupts the brain's ability to filter out irrelevant or harmful information, creating cognitive fatigue and reducing the individual's ability to resist manipulation. In extreme cases, the constant assault of repetitive patterns can lead to mental exhaustion, making the individual more compliant and susceptible to suggestion.

Filtering Through Higher Meta-Reality Systems

One of the most effective defenses against repetitive pattern manipulation lies in adherence to higher-order cognitive frameworks or "meta-reality systems." These systems involve the recognition of broader, more meaningful structures that transcend the immediate stimuli, allowing the individual to contextualize and dismiss repetitive patterns as irrelevant noise. For example, individuals trained to focus on larger philosophical or existential frameworks may recognize the invalidity of the repeated material and filter it out of their cognitive processing.

This ability to rise above repetitive patterns requires a strong foundation in critical thinking, mindfulness, and self-awareness. By consciously rejecting invalid inputs and reaffirming one's connection to a higher-order reality, individuals can neutralize the coercive effects of repetition. Moreover, cultivating resilience through practices like meditation, reflective thought, or engaging in creative problem-solving can help reinforce the cognitive filters needed to withstand such attacks.

Applications and Implications

Repetitive patterning is often deployed in environments where prolonged exposure can wear down an individual's mental and emotional defenses. This technique is particularly prevalent in interrogation, propaganda, and subliminal conditioning, where repetition is used to implant ideas or provoke behavioral responses. However, its influence extends beyond direct manipulation, as repetitive messaging in media or social systems can subtly shape public opinion, normalize certain ideologies, or reinforce specific cultural norms.

The long-term implications of unchecked exposure to repetitive patterns are profound. At an individual level, repeated invalid stimuli can contribute to anxiety, depression, and cognitive dissonance. On a collective scale, it can create echo chambers of thought, where invalid ideas gain traction through sheer repetition, eroding critical thinking within communities or societies. To counteract these effects, fostering intellectual and emotional agility is crucial, enabling individuals and groups to discern between meaningful patterns and manipulative noise.

VERBAL BREAKING OF ADVANCED COGNITIVE PATTERNS

Definition_: Language is intricately linked to cognition, serving as both a tool for communication and a framework for organizing thoughts, emotions, and perceptions. Most minds are dovetailed with language structures that are deeply connected to internal affective maps—emotional associations tied to words, phrases, and imagery. These verbal-affective connections are often exploited to coerce behavior, manipulate emotional responses, or disrupt advanced cognitive patterns. By targeting these linguistic structures, external forces can destabilize rational thought and reinforce desired narratives.

Mechanisms of Verbal Filtering and Exploitation

Verbal breaking operates by leveraging the mind's dependence on language to process and encode experiences. When specific words or phrases are introduced, they can trigger emotional reactions tied to prior associations, effectively bypassing logical reasoning. For instance, words with strong affective resonance—such as those linked to fear, joy, guilt, or anger—can elicit visceral responses that override critical thinking. This manipulation is often subliminal, relying on subtle cues embedded within speech, text, or media to guide the individual's thought processes without overt awareness.

Over time, repeated exposure to manipulated verbal patterns can disrupt advanced cognitive processes. These include abstract reasoning, problem-solving, and reflective thought, as the mind becomes entangled in a web of emotionally charged language. In extreme cases, this can create a "language prison," where the individual's thoughts and perceptions are confined within the parameters of the manipulated verbal framework. The more an individual internalizes these patterns, the harder it becomes to think beyond the imposed linguistic structures, limiting creativity and self-determination.

Breaking Free: Intuitive and Wordless Awareness

Escaping the language prison requires cultivating an awareness of the mind's reliance on verbal structures and developing the ability to shift into intuitive, wordless states of cognition. These states transcend the limitations of language, allowing the individual to access a deeper, more holistic understanding of reality. Practices such as meditation, visualization, or mindfulness exercises can facilitate this shift by fostering direct experiential awareness, unmediated by verbal filters.

Training the mind to recognize and neutralize subliminal linguistic cues is also essential. This involves honing metacognitive skills—thinking about one's own thought processes—and critically analyzing how language influences perception and behavior. By identifying patterns of verbal manipulation, individuals can dismantle the affective-verbal maps that tether them to imposed cognitive frameworks. Over time, this practice strengthens mental resilience and restores the capacity for independent thought.

Applications and Implications

The implications of verbal breaking extend far beyond individual manipulation, as language-based coercion is a key tactic in propaganda, marketing, and psychological warfare. Societal narratives are often shaped through the deliberate use of emotionally charged language, creating collective affective-verbal maps that influence public opinion and behavior. By engineering the verbal structures that dominate discourse, powerful entities can control how individuals and groups interpret reality.

However, the same principles that allow for verbal manipulation also offer a pathway to liberation. By fostering awareness of linguistic dependencies and promoting intuitive, non-verbal cognition, individuals and societies can break free from the confines of imposed narratives. This not only empowers individuals to reclaim their cognitive autonomy but also fosters a more nuanced, multifaceted understanding of the world that transcends the limitations of language.

AFFECTIVE-VERBAL BRAINWASHING

Definition: Affective-verbal brainwashing involves the strategic manipulation of language to exploit the emotional and cognitive connections individuals have with specific words, phrases, or linguistic patterns. Words have powerful associations in the human mind—often linked to past experiences, emotional triggers, and deeply ingrained belief systems. By targeting these affective-cognitive components, brainwashing techniques can alter thought patterns, induce confusion, and temporarily modify behavior by hijacking the emotional responses that words elicit. This method does not rely solely on direct persuasion but instead taps into the subconscious processing of language, allowing external influences to mold cognitive and emotional states from within.

Mechanisms of Affective-Verbal Manipulation

Affective-verbal brainwashing works by using the emotional weight of words to destabilize and reprogram mental frameworks. When an individual repeatedly encounters certain terms or phrases, these words begin to activate specific emotional circuits within the brain—whether related to fear, pleasure, guilt, or anger. By strategically repeating or altering the frequency and context in which these words are encountered, a manipulator can generate confusion or cognitive dissonance. For example, the constant exposure to contradictory phrases that cause internal tension can prevent the person from forming a coherent understanding of their environment or emotions. This dissonance can make the individual more susceptible to external control, as they begin to rely on emotionally charged language to make sense of their reality.

Furthermore, affective-verbal brainwashing often leads to the creation of delusions—false beliefs that are built upon the emotional undercurrent of specific words. By manipulating the emotional triggers of language, external forces can induce a sense of urgency, fear, or excitement, clouding an individual's judgment and disrupting rational analysis. This distortion of perception is especially effective when it exploits underlying vulnerabilities, such as anxiety, guilt, or self-doubt. Over time, these manipulated words can alter the individual's belief systems, leading them to adopt new perspectives, behaviors, or actions that serve the interests of the manipulator, even if they are at odds with the individual's previous values or reasoning.

Temporary Behavioral Shifts and Cognitive Disruption

One of the primary goals of affective-verbal brainwashing is to induce temporary shifts in behavior. By embedding emotionally charged words and concepts into the target's thought processes, these linguistic cues can prompt sudden changes in actions, preferences, or decisions. These shifts may appear as an instinctive reaction to perceived threats or opportunities, driven not by reason but by the emotional weight of the words involved. For instance, a person may suddenly adopt a new political stance or alter their behavior in response to a highly charged word or phrase linked to fear or desire, even if it contradicts their prior attitudes. The temporary nature of these changes allows the manipulator to test the efficacy of their strategy, gradually tightening their grip over time.

This manipulation is particularly potent when combined with environmental or social pressures, which reinforce the emotional states triggered by the affective-verbal cues. As these altered emotional states strengthen over time, they create a feedback loop in which the individual becomes increasingly reliant on external linguistic inputs to navigate their reality. This reliance on manipulated verbal cues disrupts the individual's ability to trust their own rational judgment, leading to an altered sense of self and reality. Thus, affective-verbal brainwashing not only reshapes the immediate thought processes but can also have long-term implications for an individual's sense of autonomy, self-identity, and decision-making.

Long-Term Consequences and Countermeasures

The long-term consequences of affective-verbal brainwashing can be severe, as it has the potential to reshape a person's worldview, identity, and social behavior. Individuals who have undergone prolonged exposure to affective-verbal manipulation may find it difficult to discern reality from the emotionally charged narratives they've been taught to adopt. They may struggle to make independent decisions or recognize when they are being influenced by external forces. The emotional bonds formed with certain words or phrases can become so deeply ingrained that the individual is incapable of perceiving them objectively, leading to long-lasting cognitive distortions.

However, the same vulnerabilities that make affective-verbal brainwashing effective also provide pathways for resistance and recovery. By fostering awareness of the emotional power of language and learning to recognize the subtle cues that influence thought and behavior, individuals can begin to reclaim their cognitive autonomy. Techniques such as mindfulness, critical thinking, and emotional regulation can help individuals develop greater resilience to linguistic manipulation, allowing them to reassert control over their beliefs and actions. Recognizing the impact of emotionally charged language is the first step in dismantling the influence of affective-verbal brainwashing, offering a path to cognitive clarity and self-determination.

THOUGHT-SCRIPTING

_*Definition*: Thought-scripting refers to the covert process of subtly inducing specific thought patterns by manipulating the mental energy state of an individual. This involves creating an energy shift within the mind that alters the usual flow of thoughts, emotions, and cognitive processes. The "script" is embedded in this energy shift, which is then read and processed consciously when the individual becomes aware of the change. Essentially, thought-scripting directs the subconscious mind by influencing the mental environment, causing particular thoughts, beliefs, or behaviors to arise spontaneously once the energy shift is recognized by the individual's conscious awareness.

Mechanisms of Thought-Scripting

The key to thought-scripting lies in the manipulation of the mental energy field, which governs an individual's cognitive state. Mental energy refers to the complex interplay of emotional, intellectual, and physiological factors that shape an individual's thought patterns. By subtly altering this energy through external stimuli—such as specific words, sounds, or environmental conditions—a "script" is embedded within the shift, guiding the individual's thinking along pre-determined lines. This process often takes place below the level of full conscious awareness, as the individual is first exposed to the energy shift before any deliberate recognition of the script occurs.

Once the mental energy shift is acknowledged, the individual may consciously interpret the thoughts that arise as their own, even though they have been subtly guided by external forces. This phenomenon exploits the malleability of the mind, particularly its capacity to generate thoughts and responses in reaction to subtle environmental or internal changes. In some cases, this process can be used to implant specific beliefs or narratives by aligning the person's thought patterns with the intended script, without them ever realizing that their thoughts are not entirely self-generated. Over time, with continued reinforcement of the energy shifts, the individual may internalize these scripts as part of their core cognitive processes, making the manipulation even more potent.

Applications and Long-Term Effects

Thought-scripting can be employed to subtly change an individual's worldview, emotional responses, or even behaviors by embedding desired thought patterns into their subconscious mind. For example, through prolonged exposure to specific energy shifts, a person could develop a sense of anxiety or euphoria linked to particular stimuli, or they may start to think in ways that align with a specific ideological or behavioral framework. This kind of influence is particularly effective in environments where the individual's cognitive boundaries are already weakened, such as during periods of stress, fatigue, or emotional vulnerability.

The long-term effects of thought-scripting can be profound. When a script is consistently reinforced, it can create a persistent change in a person's internal cognitive landscape, ultimately shaping their decisions, beliefs, and actions. In extreme cases, individuals may come to identify the scripted thought patterns as natural or authentic to their personality, even though these thoughts were deliberately introduced. As a result, they may lose the ability to distinguish between their original thought processes and the externally imposed scripts, leading to a sense of cognitive dissociation or disorientation. The cumulative impact of thought-scripting can alter not only individual thoughts but also the underlying structures of consciousness, leaving the person more vulnerable to further manipulation or control.

SENSE-ENERGY AND FOCUS-ENERGY CUING

Definition: Sense-energy and focus-energy cuing refers to the deliberate redirection or manipulation of the mental energy associated with sensory perception and cognitive focus. This involves altering where attention, sensory input, and mental resources are directed, thereby influencing how an individual experiences and interacts with their environment. By shifting the energy flow tied to specific sensory modalities or areas of concentration, one can control the perception of reality, influence thought processes, and even alter the emotional or cognitive responses of an individual to external stimuli. This cuing process relies on the deep connection between the mind's attention system and the energy that powers sensory awareness, as well as the conscious control of attention that allows individuals to filter and prioritize incoming information.

Mechanisms of Sense-Energy and Focus-Energy Cuing

The foundation of sense-energy cuing lies in the brain's capacity to allocate mental resources to various cognitive tasks, such as processing sensory data, focusing on particular stimuli, or engaging in abstract thought. Mental energy is allocated dynamically based on external and internal cues, which can be subtly manipulated. For instance, by providing specific cues or environmental triggers, a person's attention can be intentionally shifted from one sense or perception to another—redirecting focus from visual information to auditory or tactile experiences. In doing so, the individual's mental resources become concentrated in different regions of the brain, impacting how they process and interpret their surroundings. This redirection can either heighten the clarity of the new sensory experience or obscure the original point of focus, leading to altered perceptions of reality.

In a more advanced form of cuing, the manipulation of focus-energy can induce a deeper, more pervasive shift in attention, disrupting the individual's cognitive flow to create confusion or to induce specific behaviors. For example, by manipulating the energy flow associated with a person's focus on a task or thought process, one can cause a temporary shift in their priorities or cause them to engage in activities that would not normally align with their goals or desires. This can lead to both subtle and dramatic changes in how a person interacts with the world around them, especially when the cuing is used over extended periods or combined with other forms of mental influence. When sense-energy and focus-energy cuing are employed in tandem, they can override a person's natural cognitive processes, distorting their awareness and prompting them to engage with the environment in ways that serve the purpose of the manipulator.

Applications and Long-Term Effects

Sense-energy and focus-energy cuing have practical applications in a variety of contexts, from therapeutic settings to more manipulative or coercive environments. In therapy, for instance, practitioners might use cuing techniques to help individuals reframe their perceptions, shift focus, and break out of negative thought loops. However, in a more exploitative context, this same technique can be used to destabilize an individual's sense of control over their attention, leading them to adopt distorted perceptions or engage in actions that contradict their core beliefs. For example, cuing techniques can be used to distract a person from a distressing memory, directing their focus onto something unrelated, or even manipulating the emotional response associated with particular sensory experiences, thereby distorting their reality.

Over time, consistent redirection of mental energy can result in a decreased ability for the individual to maintain control over their focus or to discern the true source of their thoughts and perceptions. The more frequently an individual's mental energy is cued in unnatural ways, the more difficult it becomes for them to distinguish between genuine, internally-driven thoughts and those imposed externally. This disruption can lead to a loss of cognitive autonomy, where the individual's ability to independently direct their attention and sensory awareness becomes compromised. The long-term effects may include heightened susceptibility to manipulation, increased emotional instability, or a general sense of disorientation as the individual becomes less able to trust their own sensory experiences or mental processes.

KNOWLEDGE AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT AND CONFUSION

Definition: Knowledge and information management in the context of confusion refers to the strategic withholding, concealing, or distorting of valuable data in a way that prevents individuals from making informed decisions or understanding the true nature of a situation. This process involves either deliberately filtering out essential information or presenting data in fragmented, ambiguous, or misleading forms. By controlling what information is accessible and how it is presented, an individual or group can sow confusion, leading to a breakdown in communication, a destabilization of trust, and the disruption of rational thought. The manipulation of information creates a situation where the recipient is left unable to make accurate sense of the world, often leading to cognitive dissonance, false beliefs, or indecision.

Mechanisms of Knowledge and Information Management

The manipulation of knowledge and information operates through various techniques that control the flow of data, its accessibility, and its interpretation. One of the primary methods is the selective withholding of information, where critical details are either not shared or deliberately hidden, leaving individuals to make decisions without a complete understanding of the circumstances. This can be done in personal relationships, organizational environments, or even in broader societal contexts, where the lack of transparency or suppression of facts prevents people from forming accurate perceptions. Additionally, information may be distorted or re-contextualized to create confusion about its relevance or significance. When important details are provided in a fragmented or disjointed manner, the recipient is left struggling to make logical connections, often leading them to accept conclusions that are inaccurate or misleading. This can result in a kind of informational paralysis, where the individual is overwhelmed by competing pieces of incomplete or contradictory data and, as a result, becomes unable to act or think clearly.

Furthermore, the intentional filtering of information often incorporates subtle techniques that make certain data appear irrelevant, untrustworthy, or even contradictory. When communication is flooded with noise or irrelevant details, it becomes difficult for individuals to discern what is truly important, creating a false sense of complexity or confusion. This kind of information overload can prevent the individual from seeing the bigger picture, leaving them trapped in a cycle of constant questioning and self-doubt. In more extreme cases, this confusion can lead to cognitive distortion, where the person begins to believe false or misleading information because it is repeated often enough or presented in a manner that aligns with their existing biases or fears. Over time, this strategy can erode the individual's ability to process and interpret data independently, making them more susceptible to manipulation and less capable of critically evaluating the information they receive.

Impact on Decision-Making and Cognitive Dissonance

The impact of knowledge and information manipulation goes beyond simply confusing the individual; it actively undermines their decision-making processes and cognitive autonomy. When key facts are withheld or obscured, it becomes difficult for individuals to form a complete understanding of the issues at hand. This can cause them to make decisions based on incomplete or erroneous data, often leading to suboptimal outcomes. In the absence of clear and reliable information, people may fall back on assumptions, emotions, or external authority figures, which can further cloud their judgment. The confusion caused by incomplete or distorted information often leads to cognitive dissonance, a psychological state where the individual experiences discomfort from holding contradictory beliefs or information. To resolve this discomfort, the person may alter their beliefs or dismiss conflicting data, further reinforcing the cycle of confusion and misunderstanding.

Over time, this ongoing manipulation of information can create a profound sense of mistrust and disorientation, as the individual begins to lose confidence in their ability to discern truth from falsehood. The constant exposure to fragmented or misleading information may cause the person to question their perceptions of reality, destabilizing their sense of self and their place in the world. As the information they rely on becomes increasingly unreliable or difficult to interpret, they may begin to internalize the confusion, leading to a fractured understanding of the world. This can make it even harder for them to make informed decisions, leading them into a state of cognitive paralysis where they feel uncertain or incapable of making meaningful choices. In extreme cases, this manipulation can break down a person's ability to trust their own thoughts and judgments, leaving them more vulnerable to external influence and control.

DISINFORMATION BRUTE-FORCE FED DIRECTLY INTO THE MIND BY COGNITIVE REPLICATION

Definition: Disinformation bruteforce is the deliberate and aggressive process of inserting false or misleading information into an individual's cognitive structures through repetitive and forceful means. This method relies on the replication and reinforcement of false data by exploiting the individual's existing belief systems, cognitive biases, and neural pathways. By embedding disinformation within these established frameworks, the manipulator creates a seamless integration of lies that appear to fit naturally with the target's existing worldview. Through repetition, emotional appeal, and strategic framing, the false information is reinforced, making it harder for the individual to distinguish it from truth. This process may happen in both subtle, gradual ways or through more overt, direct interventions, often leading the target to internalize these false narratives as part of their personal belief system.

Techniques and Mechanisms of Cognitive Replication

The core technique of disinformation bruteforce relies on cognitive replication, which involves continuously feeding false information into the target's mind through repeated exposure. Repetition is key to ensuring that the false information is integrated into the cognitive structures of the individual's mind. This approach takes advantage of the mind's tendency to accept familiar patterns and repeat them, even if they are inaccurate or misleading. False information is often framed in ways that resonate with the individual's existing beliefs, making it more easily absorbed and difficult to reject. For instance, if a person already believes in a particular ideology or set of assumptions, disinformation can be subtly inserted into these belief structures, reinforcing their worldview while presenting the false data as congruent with their preexisting ideas.

In addition to repetition, emotional manipulation plays a significant role in this process. Disinformation is not just fed to the target on a cognitive level but also on an emotional one, where it is paired with intense emotional triggers—such as fear, anger, or hope—that compel the individual to accept the false information as truth. When this information is framed in a way that appeals to emotional responses, it bypasses rational filters and is more readily accepted by the unconscious mind. This manipulation is particularly effective when the disinformation fits into a broader narrative that the individual is already emotionally invested in. Over time, as the false information is reinforced through emotional and cognitive repetition, the individual becomes less likely to question its validity, even in the face of contradictory evidence.

Psychological Impact and Cognitive Lock-in

The prolonged feeding of disinformation has profound effects on the target's cognitive processes, potentially leading to cognitive lock-in, a psychological state in which the individual becomes so entrenched in false beliefs that it becomes increasingly difficult to change their perspective. This happens as the false information integrates itself into the individual's existing mental structures and belief systems, often creating a feedback loop where the person begins to actively seek out additional information that supports the false narrative, while disregarding or rationalizing away conflicting evidence. The mind starts to "self-correct" by distorting reality to maintain coherence with the disinformation, resulting in a warped sense of truth.

Furthermore, this technique exploits the cognitive principle of confirmation bias, where individuals are more likely to believe information that aligns with their preexisting views, even if that information is false. Over time, as the target is exposed to more and more disinformation, they may develop a false sense of certainty about their beliefs, solidifying their adherence to the misinformation. The emotional and cognitive repetition of false information can also lead to a breakdown in critical thinking, as the individual may no longer question or analyze incoming data with the same skepticism they once did. As cognitive lock-in sets in, the individual becomes increasingly resistant to new information, leaving them vulnerable to manipulation and control by those who continue to feed them disinformation. This process of cognitive replication can deeply alter the person's perception of reality, making them susceptible to further manipulation or exploitation.

ENFORCED MENTAL AND ENERGY CUES

_*Definition*: Enforced mental and energy cues refer to the intentional manipulation of an individual's cognitive and energetic states in order to provoke specific thoughts, emotions, or associations. This is achieved through subtle, often unnoticed cues or through more direct and intrusive methods that disrupt the person's natural thought processes. The manipulation can either occur through the feeding of cognitive traces, which are fragments of thoughts or concepts subtly introduced to the target's mind, or through more aggressive force-feeding tactics that completely violate the target's normal mental processes. In either case, the goal is to influence or redirect the person's thinking in a way that aligns with the initiator's objectives, often bypassing the individual's conscious awareness. By embedding these cues deeply within the cognitive or energetic pathways, the manipulator can control how the individual perceives reality and processes information, effectively guiding their responses to stimuli and shaping their overall mental landscape.

Techniques and Mechanisms of Cognitive Trace-Feeding and Force-Feeding

Cognitive trace-feeding operates on the principle of planting subtle mental cues that resonate with the target's pre-existing beliefs or thoughts, prompting automatic associations that steer them toward specific outcomes. These traces are often invisible to the conscious mind but can trigger specific concepts, feelings, or actions when activated. For example, certain words, phrases, or visual cues might be strategically introduced into the individual's environment or conversations, causing them to unconsciously make connections between unrelated ideas or concepts. These traces build upon existing mental patterns, reinforcing particular ways of thinking and guiding the target toward desired associations without them fully realizing the manipulation.

In contrast, force-feeding involves more overt interference with the individual's thought process, overriding their natural cognitive functions to impose an external set of ideas, beliefs, or reactions. This can be done through aggressive repetition, emotional manipulation, or by bombarding the individual with information that disrupts their cognitive flow. In these cases, the target's mental processes are essentially hijacked, with the imposed thoughts or concepts forcing the individual to conform to a specific mental state or behavior. This can lead to confusion, cognitive dissonance, and an altered sense of self, as the individual is pushed to operate from an artificially constructed mental framework that does not align with their true thoughts or intentions. Through either trace-feeding or force-feeding, the manipulator seeks to create a pathway to control the target's mind, altering how they think, feel, and react to their environment in a way that serves the manipulator's agenda.

Definition: Subliminal mental and energy cues involve the covert insertion of thought patterns, emotional responses, and behavioral instructions into the subconscious mind, often bypassing the individual's conscious awareness. These cues are encoded at a deep level, subtly influencing the target's perception, cognition, and actions. Through script coding, a set of pre-programmed patterns or narratives is imprinted onto the individual's mental framework, shaping their understanding of the world and their identity without their conscious recognition. This silent encoding of identity and belief systems can subtly manipulate how a person perceives themselves, others, and their environment, guiding their reactions and decision-making in ways that align with external control or influence. When these cues are introduced at the abstract or conceptual level, they often appear as thoughts, memories, or insights that seem to emerge spontaneously, though their origins lie in external manipulation. Over time, these subtle imprints accumulate, leading to a distortion of the person's thought processes and beliefs, often without any clear indication that their internal narrative has been influenced or altered.

Mechanisms of Distortion and Silent Injections

The mechanisms behind subliminal mental and energy cues often involve a combination of psychological manipulation and energetic shifts. Through the use of sound, light, visual stimuli, or even deliberate patterns of social interaction, these cues can bypass the individual's conscious filters and directly alter their cognitive processes. For example, the use of certain words, phrases, or symbolic imagery may trigger subconscious responses that evoke specific emotions or associations, planting ideas or beliefs without the target being aware of their source. These silent injections can distort the person's thinking by subtly redirecting their attention, altering their emotional state, or even creating false memories or experiences. Over time, as these injections accumulate, they reshape the person's worldview and sense of self, often leading them to internalize narratives or beliefs that they would not have consciously chosen. This form of manipulation is particularly powerful because it operates below the level of conscious awareness, making it difficult for the individual to recognize or resist the intrusion into their cognitive and energetic systems.

Sociologies of Knowledge and Ignorance

The sociologies of knowledge and ignorance explore how these subliminal cues contribute to the construction of knowledge frameworks, and conversely, how they maintain ignorance by shaping the boundaries of what individuals can or cannot understand. Knowledge is often not just a reflection of objective reality but a socially constructed narrative influenced by external forces—whether those be cultural norms, political ideologies, or more covert forms of manipulation like subliminal cues. These cues can create gaps in understanding, where certain truths or perspectives are not accessible because the individual's cognitive structure has been influenced or limited by the information they have been exposed to. This process creates a situation where the individual is unaware of their ignorance, often believing that they have free will and control over their thoughts, when in reality, their cognitive pathways have been shaped by external forces. Such engineered ignorance can be just as powerful as the strategic dissemination of false information, as it limits the individual's capacity to recognize and act upon truths that might otherwise challenge the imposed narrative. Through the strategic manipulation of what is known and what is ignored, those in control can maintain power over the thoughts, beliefs, and actions of others, creating a social reality that is dictated by external forces.

ACTIVE DENIAL

Active Denial

_*Definition*: Active denial involves the deliberate and strategic use of misinformation, disinformation, and under-information to induce confusion, disorient the target, and disrupt their cognitive processes. By exploiting an individual's existing gaps in knowledge or ignorance, active denial prevents the target from properly understanding or interpreting information. This tactic creates a state of uncertainty, where the individual is unsure of what is true or false, effectively undermining their ability to make informed decisions. Once the individual is sufficiently disoriented, new epistemological structures—often shaped by external influence—can be introduced, slowly replacing the previous understanding with a new, controlled narrative. In this way, active denial not only prevents clarity and understanding but also conditions the target to accept manipulated versions of reality, shaping their worldview according to external agendas.

Mechanisms of Active Denial

Active denial operates on a psychological level by reinforcing the confusion and doubt of the target, creating a cognitive state of vulnerability where their existing beliefs or knowledge systems are no longer trusted. This can be done through various methods, such as providing contradicting information, presenting half-truths, or introducing false narratives that align with existing prejudices or biases. By continuously manipulating the flow of information, the target becomes less able to distinguish between credible sources and falsehoods, leading to a breakdown in their ability to critically assess the world around them. This technique can also involve withholding key pieces of information, ensuring that the target operates on incomplete or misleading data, which further erodes their confidence in their ability to know what is true. As confusion deepens, the target's reliance on external sources for guidance increases, making them more susceptible to accepting whatever new narrative is introduced by the manipulator.

Psychological Impact of Active Denial

The psychological toll of active denial can be profound, as the individual is not only deprived of the tools to accurately assess reality but is also led to question their own capacity for critical thinking. As they are repeatedly exposed to misinformation and contradictions, their sense of cognitive autonomy weakens, and they may begin to rely more heavily on external authorities or sources of information. This process not only alters their worldview but can also lead to feelings of helplessness or dependency. Over time, as the individual becomes more accustomed to the instability created by active denial, they may begin to accept the new epistemological structures presented to them, internalizing a manipulated reality as their own. In this way, active denial doesn't just distort current beliefs but reshapes the foundational framework through which the individual interprets the world, turning confusion into a tool of control.

MASS NARRATIVE SCRIPT-PATTERNS

Definition: Mass narrative script-patterns refer to culturally ingrained frameworks or egregors—collective, often subconscious belief systems—that are widely shared and reproduced within a society. These patterns shape the way individuals perceive reality and determine the boundaries of acceptable thought, behavior, and expression. By promoting a singular, dominant narrative, these script-patterns restrict the mental and social movement of individuals, confining them to a narrow set of perspectives that align with cultural norms and values. This mass cultural programming often functions as an unconscious filter, limiting the range of possibilities by promoting conformity and suppressing alternative viewpoints. As a result, individuals are subtly conditioned to accept a predefined interpretation of events, facts, and ideas, reducing cognitive flexibility and discouraging independent or critical thinking.

Mechanisms of Mass Narrative Script-Patterns

The strength of mass narrative script-patterns lies in their ability to reproduce themselves across generations, using cultural channels such as media, education, religion, and social norms to perpetuate their influence. These patterns often manifest as cultural "scripts" or templates—well-established frameworks for interpreting the world that are so deeply embedded in the collective psyche that they are rarely questioned. When individuals are exposed to these scripts, they adopt them as unquestionable truths, effectively narrowing the scope of their cognitive engagement with alternative or conflicting ideas. For example, dominant political ideologies or social norms can limit the range of discourse by promoting a narrow set of values or beliefs that suppress opposing viewpoints. This creates a kind of cultural inertia, where challenging the dominant narrative becomes not only difficult but often perceived as socially or intellectually unacceptable. In this way, mass narrative script-patterns limit the development of alternative perspectives and keep the cultural paradigm locked within a specific, predefined set of boundaries.

Impact of Mass Narrative Script-Patterns on Critical Thinking

The dominance of mass narrative script-patterns can have a profound impact on an individual's ability to engage in critical or independent thinking. By continually reinforcing a narrow worldview, these cultural egregors make it harder for individuals to explore or even consider alternative belief systems or viewpoints. This psychological confinement reduces the capacity for cognitive flexibility—the ability to adapt thinking based on new information—and fosters intellectual passivity. People may begin to internalize the script-patterns as part of their own identity, equating conformity with belonging and non-conformity with alienation or threat. As a result, the individual may become increasingly resistant to alternative perspectives, reinforcing societal homogeneity while discouraging the evolution of new ideas or ways of thinking. This perpetuation of narrow symbolic realities prevents the growth of more complex or diverse cognitive maps, keeping individuals trapped in a static worldview that limits personal and collective growth.

Resistance and the Potential for Reprogramming

Despite the widespread influence of mass narrative script-patterns, resistance is possible, though it often requires a deliberate effort to break free from the cultural programming that surrounds an individual. This can occur through exposure to diverse perspectives, critical self-reflection, and the cultivation of intellectual autonomy. When individuals begin to question the validity and origins of the dominant narrative, they can challenge the script-patterns that confine their thinking. The process of reprogramming involves not only deconstructing ingrained beliefs but also expanding one's mental horizons by engaging with alternative ideas, experiences, and worldviews. As individuals learn to recognize and disengage from the subtle influence of mass cultural programming, they become better equipped to forge their own paths and create new, more inclusive narratives that embrace a broader range of perspectives.

SCRIPT CONTROL-CODES AND PATTERNS

Definition: Script control-codes are subconscious or consciously adopted belief systems or identities that act as mental filters, restricting the flow of information that aligns with a person's existing worldview. These control-codes are typically shaped by deeply held, often delusional beliefs about one's role or identity within society, the universe, or a specific narrative. For example, a person who adopts a "messiah" or "chosen one" script may internalize the belief that they possess a unique, divine purpose that elevates them above others. As a result, they begin to filter out information that contradicts this self-image, dismissing it as irrelevant, false, or threatening. In this way, control codes distort the individual's ability to process external reality objectively, keeping them confined within a self-constructed narrative that reinforces their delusions.

Mechanisms of Script Control-Codes

These control codes function as a cognitive and emotional defense mechanism, creating a mental framework where any information that conflicts with the belief system is either rejected or warped to fit the script. This process can be unconscious, as the individual may not even be aware of how their worldview is being shaped or restricted by these control-codes. The adoption of such scripts often stems from early life experiences, psychological conditioning, or exposure to influential figures or ideologies that promote rigid, one-dimensional identities. For example, in certain religious or cult-like environments, individuals may be encouraged to embrace a "special" role that isolates them from others, making them believe they have a unique connection to a higher power or mission. As these control-codes become entrenched in the psyche, they effectively close off the person from questioning or adapting their beliefs, as doing so would undermine their sense of self-worth or purpose.

Impact of Script Control-Codes on Cognitive Functioning

The presence of script control-codes in an individual's cognitive structure significantly impairs their capacity to engage with reality in a balanced, objective manner. By creating a rigid framework that prioritizes the maintenance of a delusional self-image, these codes act as mental filters that prevent the integration of new, potentially disconfirming information. The individual's worldview becomes self-reinforcing, as any data that contradicts the control-code is either dismissed or rationalized away, further entrenching the delusion. This process not only distorts their understanding of themselves but also of the world around them, leading to an increasingly fragmented perception of reality. Over time, this can result in an inability to adapt to changing circumstances, as the person's cognitive flexibility is severely limited by the dominance of their control-code.

Breaking Free from Script Control-Codes

Breaking free from the influence of script control-codes requires a deep level of self-awareness and the willingness to confront and challenge one's deeply held beliefs about identity and purpose. This often involves recognizing the limitations of the control-code and acknowledging how it distorts perception and inhibits growth. In some cases, individuals may need to undergo therapeutic intervention, such as cognitive behavioral therapy or guided introspection, to deconstruct the false narratives that have taken hold of their identity. By re-establishing a more flexible and open mindset, individuals can gradually dismantle the control-codes that have kept them trapped in a limited understanding of themselves and the world. This process of deprogramming involves learning to value and incorporate new, diverse information, allowing the individual to reclaim cognitive autonomy and navigate reality with a more grounded and adaptive perspective.

WEAPONIZED NARRATIVE MEMES

Definition: Narrative memes refer to ideas, beliefs, or pieces of information that are intentionally and continuously fed to an individual, designed to replicate themselves and spread through the target's mind. These false memes often take the form of catchy, emotionally resonant narratives or concepts that align with the target's pre-existing beliefs or desires, making them more likely to be accepted and internalized. Over time, these memes replicate and reinforce themselves, effectively overriding critical thinking processes and impairing the individual's ability to discern valid, reliable sources of information from the false cues. Just like viral internet memes that spread across social media, narrative memes can easily propagate within the mind, often taking root deeply and affecting decision-making, behavior, and worldview.

Mechanisms of Meme Propagation

The propagation of narrative memes occurs through repeated exposure to the same themes or ideas, often through various media channels, conversations, or social interactions. These memes typically appeal to emotional triggers, such as fear, hope, or anger, and are crafted in a way that seems compelling or "truthful," even though they may lack factual validity. The more the target is exposed to these false cues, the more ingrained they become in the individual's cognitive structure, bypassing the usual filters for skepticism and analysis. Over time, the person may fail to critically evaluate the sources or veracity of the information, accepting it as truth because it aligns with the narrative structure that has been repeatedly reinforced in their mind. This can be particularly damaging in contexts where complex issues or contentious topics are being discussed, as narrative memes obscure the individual's capacity for nuanced thought and objective assessment.

Psychological Impact of Narrative Memes

The impact of narrative memes on cognition is profound, as they act like cognitive viruses that infiltrate the mind, weakening the individual's ability to think critically and independently. By repeatedly presenting false or skewed information in an emotionally compelling way, these memes diminish the person's capacity to evaluate new data objectively. This process can result in cognitive dissonance, where the target is faced with contradictory information but feels an overwhelming psychological pull to believe the meme. Additionally, narrative memes often exploit social dynamics, leveraging groupthink and the desire for social validation. As a result, the individual may conform to a collective belief system or ideology without ever questioning the validity of the memes being spread, further reinforcing the cycle of misinformation.

Disrupting Narrative Memes

Breaking free from the influence of narrative memes requires awareness of their existence and the mechanisms by which they are spread. One effective strategy is to foster critical thinking and encourage skepticism toward sources of information, especially those that consistently present emotionally charged or overly simplified narratives. By cultivating a mindset that questions the validity of information and seeks out alternative perspectives, individuals can begin to break the hold of false memes on their consciousness. Moreover, creating environments that encourage open dialogue and the examination of conflicting viewpoints can help disrupt the self-replicating nature of these memes, allowing the target to reassert control over their own beliefs and cognitive processes. This process may involve consciously disengaging from media that reinforces these narratives and seeking out diverse, evidence-based sources of information to counteract the effects of the memes.

LIMITING ATTENTION SPAN

Definition: Limiting attention span is a psychological tactic that intentionally biases cognitive processes by distorting an individual's focus on a specific task or objective. This is done by diverting their attention toward other tasks, distractions, or by creating an environment that prevents sustained concentration on the primary task. By disrupting the natural flow of attention, the individual becomes less effective in processing information and completing the intended task. Over time, this disruption can lead to a decrease in the individual's ability to concentrate, make decisions, or retain crucial information. This technique can be subtle, employing distractions that seem trivial on the surface, but gradually erode cognitive efficiency and cause confusion.

Effects on Cognitive Function and Decision-Making: The continuous interference with focus can significantly impair an individual's cognitive function. When the mind is unable to settle on one particular task or area of thought, it results in fragmented processing, making it harder to absorb and synthesize information. This confusion often leads to poor decision-making, missed opportunities, or an inability to resolve problems effectively. Additionally, when attention is repeatedly redirected or overwhelmed by multiple tasks, it can trigger stress, anxiety, and a heightened sense of cognitive overload. This process not only diminishes performance but also undermines the individual's ability to engage in critical thinking, making them more susceptible to external influence or manipulation. Over time, the person may experience a reduction in mental clarity, which can be exploited by those who seek to manipulate or control their actions.

SCATTERING ATTENTION SPAN

Definition: Scattering attention span is a cognitive manipulation technique where the focus of an individual's mental processes is intentionally distorted by shallowly spreading attention across multiple, often irrelevant, thought cues and distractions. Instead of concentrating on one specific objective or piece of information, the individual's attention is diluted across several competing stimuli. This cognitive scattering prevents deep engagement with any one task or thought, fragmenting the person's ability to process and retain information meaningfully. The effect of this scattering is a persistent mental state where clarity and focus are compromised, creating confusion and reducing cognitive efficiency.

Impact on Mental Processing and Behavior: The scattering of attention can severely hinder an individual's ability to perform complex tasks or engage in meaningful reflection. By dispersing cognitive resources across numerous distractions, the individual is left unable to devote the necessary focus to key details or make informed decisions. This distortion can lead to mistakes, overlooked details, or misjudgments. As the individual becomes overwhelmed with scattered cues, their ability to form coherent thoughts or follow through with tasks diminishes, leading to inefficiency and mental fatigue. Furthermore, this fragmented attention state can increase susceptibility to external influence, as the person is more likely to accept external input without the critical scrutiny required for sound decision-making. In environments where control or manipulation is desired, scattering attention spans can create a vulnerable, disoriented state that makes individuals easier to lead, confuse, or direct toward predetermined outcomes.

FLOODING WITH SOURCES

Definition: Flooding with sources refers to the deliberate inundation of an individual's mind with a constant stream of information from various sources, overwhelming their cognitive capacity. The sheer volume and variety of data presented can lead to mental saturation, where the individual's ability to discern relevance, truth, or coherence is compromised. This technique can involve conflicting or irrelevant information, often presented in rapid succession, causing confusion and impairing the mind's natural filtering mechanisms. The aim is to disrupt the individual's cognitive processing, preventing them from effectively organizing and making sense of the information. In extreme cases, flooding can contribute to a breakdown of mental stability, pushing the person towards a psychotic state where rational thought is no longer accessible.

Impact on Cognitive Function and Mental Health: The continuous bombardment of information overloads the mind, exhausting cognitive resources and leading to a state of mental chaos. As the brain struggles to process the flood of data, it becomes increasingly difficult to distinguish between what is important and what is irrelevant, resulting in heightened confusion and disorientation. This cognitive overload can manifest as a loss of focus, a sense of being trapped in an information loop, and an inability to make coherent decisions. Prolonged exposure to such flooding can lead to the collapse of mental structures, potentially inducing anxiety, paranoia, or full-blown psychosis. The mind becomes so consumed with processing the barrage of information that it loses its capacity to critically evaluate or prioritize thoughts, rendering the individual vulnerable to manipulation or exploitation. Additionally, this process can weaken the individual's mental resilience, leaving them unable to concentrate on important tasks or engage in meaningful problem-solving. In this state, the individual may be more easily controlled or manipulated, as their cognitive defenses are overwhelmed by the constant influx of data.

CONFLICTING AGENDAS

Definition: The technique of conflicting agendas involves inundating an individual with a constant barrage of contradictory, mutually exclusive, or negating information. This manipulation creates cognitive dissonance by introducing ideas or worldviews that are impossible to reconcile, forcing the target to either choose between two conflicting viewpoints or adopt a delusional or fragmented worldview. The result is a destabilization of the individual's cognitive structures, as they struggle to make sense of the contradictions. Over time, this chaotic stream of conflicting information weakens the individual's ability to hold onto a coherent, grounded perspective, opening the door for external manipulation or programming. The target may ultimately accept a new belief system or worldview, not because it is rational, but because it is the only option that seems to provide some semblance of order in the midst of confusion.

Psychological Impact and Defense: The constant bombardment of conflicting agendas has a profound psychological impact, leading to confusion, frustration, and an eventual collapse of the individual's ability to make sense of their reality. The erosion of worldview and belief structures creates openings for new, external programming to take root, often under the guise of offering clarity or resolution to the cognitive dissonance. However, this manipulation can be countered by transcending the narrow perspectives imposed by the conflicting information. When the mind is forced into a limited viewpoint or reduced understanding, consciously expanding one's perspective to encompass a larger, more holistic view can serve as a defense mechanism. By integrating a broader knowledge base and strengthening critical thinking skills, the individual can resist the destabilizing effects of conflicting agendas. Cultivating superior knowledge structures, which are internally consistent and grounded in evidence, alongside a strong, critical mindset, forms the foundation for resilience against these disruptive and confusing tactics. By refusing to accept fragmented or contradictory beliefs, the individual can maintain control over their worldview, preventing external manipulation and preserving their cognitive integrity.

CLOSEST SYMBOLIC REALITY (OR PRE-PROGRAMMED SOCIALIZED REALITY) ABUSE

Definition: Closest Symbolic Reality abuse involves the deliberate manipulation of an individual's advanced cognitive structures by forcing them back into a more primitive, pre-programmed reality framework. This tactic seeks to undermine and suppress complex, sophisticated worldviews or belief systems by replacing them with simplistic, often infantile, frameworks shaped during early socialization. For example, an advanced thinker who has cultivated a nuanced understanding of the world, developed through intellectual rigor or personal experience, may be targeted with social pressure or psychological tactics aimed at reducing their worldview to a basic, rigid system, such as a traditional religious belief (e.g., Christianity). By stripping away the complexity and flexibility of the individual's cognitive architecture, the manipulator seeks to confine the individual to a narrow, less evolved framework of thought, reducing their cognitive freedom and intellectual independence. This can stunt personal development, thwart critical thinking, and reinforce submission to externally imposed belief systems.

Psychological and Cognitive Impact: The abuse of Closest Symbolic Reality has a profound effect on cognitive autonomy, often producing feelings of regression or intellectual stunting. By reverting an individual's worldview to the simplistic, binary thinking typical of early socialization, the person becomes increasingly trapped within a system that lacks the depth and adaptability of their previous cognitive frameworks. This form of manipulation targets the mind's natural growth and attempts to dismantle the self-developed, advanced cognitive structures in favor of a pre-programmed, socially ingrained set of beliefs. The long-term effects can include cognitive dissonance, confusion, and frustration as the individual tries to reconcile their inherent intellectual growth with the limitations imposed by these repressive systems. To resist such abuse, one must maintain a strong sense of self-awareness and critical reflection, constantly challenging attempts to narrow one's understanding and instead nurturing the complex, multidimensional nature of their worldview. Developing resilience against this type of manipulation involves safeguarding the integrity of one's cognitive evolution and defending against attempts to regress to a state of intellectual dependency or dogmatism.

BUILDING OR ABUSING ONENESS OF A MIND TO MAKE IT MORE PRONE TO CONDITIONING, BY SPLINTERING THE MIND

Definition: This method involves exploiting the unity of the mind, breaking it apart through trauma-based conditioning to make it more vulnerable to external manipulation. The process begins with a series of psychological assaults—ranging from emotional manipulation to constant stress—that weaken the individual's sense of self and splinter their ego. By fragmenting the mind and inducing dissociative states, the manipulator can create an environment in which new identities or belief systems are easily inserted. As the ego fractures into distinct, manageable identities or sub-personalities, each of these fractured components becomes more susceptible to targeted programming. The mind's innate ability to adapt and assimilate new information is hijacked, and with each new fractured part, it becomes easier to manipulate the person into adopting beliefs or behaviors that they would not otherwise entertain.

Psychological and Cognitive Impact: The trauma-based approach to splitting the mind leads to increased psychotic flexibility, where the individual's cognitive structure becomes more malleable and susceptible to external control. This flexibility may initially seem like an adaptive response to overwhelming stress or confusion, but in reality, it serves to disorient and destabilize the individual's core sense of self. As the fractured ego turns against itself, the person may develop delusions or psychotic behaviors based on conflicting identities, each reinforcing the manipulator's control. The result is a profound psychological fragmentation, where the target is unable to distinguish between their own mental structure and the externally imposed narratives. This manipulation often involves free-fall verbal abuse or covert mental assaults, where the individual is pushed into adopting distorted versions of reality that align with the manipulator's goals. Rebuilding resilience against such conditioning requires strengthening the mind's coherence, reinforcing the ego's unity, and cultivating self-awareness to resist the splintering influence of trauma and manipulation.

BREAKING UP RESILIENCE TO CONDITIONING
